Mr. Norris: I am very confident. It is extraordinary that the Labour party should wail about lack of investment, given that it invested only about a quarter of the amount that the Government are now investing. Now that we have launched a massive programme of investment to improve the Northern line, Labour Members have the sheer cheek to complain about the disruption that may be caused. Passengers see with their own eyes the improvements that are being made and they wholly reject the hon. Lady's thesis.

Mr. Dykes: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of my constituents travel on the Northern line from Edgware and Colindale stations? When the new trains start to run at the end of the year, will he ensure that their introduction is accompanied by improvements in infrastructure and electronic arrangements on the line as there have been many mistakes, failures and disappointments so far?

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend is right: as well as introducing new trains, we need to give thought to signalling, power supply and track quality. We are already undertaking an extensive programme of refurbishment and improvement at stations so that we can improve the overall quality of the service offered to my hon. Friend's constituents. We are also looking for ways in which we can further harness private finance to make improvements at a rate that would not be possible if we relied solely on the taxpayer for funds. That is the key. We have the prospect of delivering £1 billion-worth of improvements to the Northern line, and the private sector can provide the vast majority of the money.

West Coast Main Line

5. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much was spent on safety improvements on the west coast main line in 1995. [17996]

The Minister for Railways and Roads (Mr. John Watts): Railtrack's expenditure on renewal and maintenance of the west coast main line in 1994-95 totalled £129 million. Expenditure on safety cannot be identified separately. Expenditure by Railtrack and train operators provides a mixture of safety and other benefits.

Mr. Cunningham: Given events at the weekend—especially the smash in Staffordshire—does the Minister not think it about time that safety expenditure was separately identified, so that hon. Members could scrutinise it?

Is the Minister aware that there are frequent breakdowns on the Euston to Birmingham line? Last month there were delays of up to an hour and a half. Many passengers were stranded and had to get on the next train, where they found that there were no seats and became involved in rows with conductors about using first-class accommodation. Does the Minister consider that satisfactory?

Mr. Watts: Nearly all expenditure on improving and maintaining infrastructure has some safety benefits. That is why it is not possible to make the false distinction suggested by the hon. Gentleman. As for the west coast main line generally, the hon. Gentleman will know that Railtrack has a large investment plan, the first stage of which will be the letting of a contract to develop a new signalling system later this month.

Mr. Cash: Does my hon. Friend accept that the scene which resulted from the horrendous accident in my constituency of Stafford at the weekend was absolutely deplorable, that it was a miracle that lives were not lost on a substantial scale and that the proposal for an internal inquiry is wholly inappropriate? Does he agree that there should be a full and complete public inquiry to deal with all aspects of the accident, including not only safety issues but rail track, maintenance and planning considerations? Houses were immediately adjacent to a railway embankment and were therefore at very considerable risk.

Mr. Watts: First, I should like to extend my sympathy to my hon. Friend's constituents, particularly to the relatives of the postal worker who died in the crash. I hope that my hon. Friend will be reassured to know that my right hon. Friend Secretary of State has asked the Health and Safety Commission to ask the Health and Safety Executive to carry out an independent investigation, to prepare a special report and for the report to be made public as soon as possible. In the meantime, Railtrack, the train operator and Her Majesty's railway inspectorate are carrying out technical investigations to see whether there are any immediate lessons to be learnt.

Mr. Chidgey: Does the Minister recall the derailment outside Euston station on 14 December last year, which led to widespread disruption and delay to train services? Will he tell the House why, despite earlier warnings from contractors about dangerous conditions on the track, Railtrack failed to take any action to prevent that accident, bearing it in mind that such negligent inaction by British Rail would have led automatically to dismissal of the staff concerned?

Mr. Watts: Railtrack already had plans for work on the track in the vicinity of Euston. The hon. Gentleman will know that the Health and Safety Executive issued an improvement notice—not a prohibition or closure notice—giving Railtrack a year to bring the track up to standard. There is no question that safety will be compromised.

Mr. Thurnham: Will the Minister give the House further details of the new investment in signalling equipment? Is not that investment very important and long overdue, and how long will it take to come into effect?

Mr. Watts: It is difficult to be precise about how long development of the new signalling system will take. The contract will be let later this month, which will add significantly to the line's capacity and provide inbuilt automatic train protection. In parallel with that development work, Railtrack will undertake a large investment programme in track and power supplies.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The Minister knows that less than a fortnight ago the Health and Safety Executive issued a notice in relation to that particular area of the west coast main line, making it very clear that urgent and necessary work was required. It is a miracle that more Post Office workers did not lose their lives. Is it not clear from Railtrack's immediate response, which sought to give an instant diagnosis of the problem, that privatisation has fragmented companies and that, instead of improving safety for passengers, we have argument, disputation and real dangers to everyone using the system?

Mr. Watts: With regard to fragmentation, the hon. Lady knows that there will be a single rail network in the ownership and operation of Railtrack. I think that she and other hon. Members would be unwise to speculate on the causes of the accident.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Railtrack did.

Mr. Watts: The preliminary information from Railtrack's investigation team is that there is not yet any evidence of track defect, vandalism or signalling irregularity. The hon. Lady should be willing, as I am, to await the outcome of the independent investigation that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked the Health and Safety Executive to carry out.

Ms Short: I am sure that the Minister would not mean to mislead the House. Does he agree that the improvement notice issued by the Health and Safety Executive to Railtrack about the incident at Euston is unprecedented and that an order of that kind was never necessary to make British Rail comply with safety conditions? Will the Minister confirm that the recent health and safety report on Railtrack was very critical indeed? Is he not concerned that Railtrack is so incompetent that it cannot give safety certificates for £450 million-worth of rolling stock that has already been bought but which is lying idle? Does he agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) that it is disgraceful that Railtrack should seek to absolve itself of responsibility for the terrible accident at Stafford before there has been an inquiry? Given all of that, does the Minister agree that it would be absolutely wrong to allow Railtrack to be floated before its safety standards have been sorted out?

Mr. Watts: No. The picture that the hon. Lady tries to paint is completely false. The HSE said that there is no decline in overall health and safety standards. Indeed, in terms of significant train accidents on the network, there was a fall of eight last year—to 110, with 32 fatalities, excluding trespassers and suicides, which is the lowest level ever. The true picture is quite different from that which the hon. Lady tries misleadingly to paint whenever she appears on television.

Motorway Repairs

6. Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the speed with which motorway repairs are undertaken. [17997]

Mr. Watts: My right hon. Friend receives representations from a range of individuals and organisations about the speed with which motorway repairs are undertaken.

Sir David Knox: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that motorway repairs are undertaken in the minimum possible time? Does he agree that hold-ups caused by motorway repairs are very costly to industry? Has he any proposals to speed things up?

Mr. Watts: My hon. Friend is right in that we can never be satisfied with the performance. The lane rental system has been introduced for virtually all major maintenance contracts and lane rental contracts are completed on average 30 per cent. faster than conventional contracts. As for the cost of delays, the use of lane rental has so far saved more than 5,000 days of disruption at an estimated saving of £120 million in road user costs since it was introduced in 1984.

Oil Pollution

7. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about progress to clear up oil deposits. [17998]

Sir George Young: I share the concern of people along the coast about the oil spilt when the tanker Sea Empress grounded at the entrance to Milford Haven. I am anxious that the beautiful and environmentally sensitive coastline should be quickly restored. Very good progress is being made with the clean-up. At sea, recovery of oil is effectively completed, and I expect that the work on the shoreline will be substantially completed by Easter.

Mr. Banks: We must not allow the public spotlight to move away from what looks like being perhaps the worst ecological disaster since the Torrey Canyon—[Interruption.] I think that "Tory" Canyon was the right pronunciation. Someone needs to swing for the current disaster. It cannot be acceptable for everyone to say, "It was nobody's fault." We want someone's head on a plate—or at least I do. Will the Secretary of State assure us that sufficient resources are still being made available for the clean-up operations and that the compensation fund is not likely to be exhausted? Can he give us any up-to-date figure for the extent of sea bird mortality in the area and also the number of sea mammals to have suffered as a result of the Sea Empress disaster?

Sir George Young: The Torrey Canyon disaster took place under a Labour Government, and the then Prime Minister ordered that the ship be bombed. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that we have made considerable progress in dealing with such accidents since then.

With regard to the recent accident, the hon. Gentleman will know that I have established no fewer than three inquiries to find out exactly what went wrong. The inquiries will be independent and their findings will be published. There has been no shortage of resources for the clean-up process. I pay tribute to all the people involved in that process, both at sea and on the beaches, many of whom worked long hours in darkness doing a messy and uncomfortable task. I understand that the funds available will be more than adequate to meet compensation claims.

On the hon. Gentleman's last question, more than 2,500 dead birds have been recovered. More than 3,000 live birds have been recovered and are being cleaned up before release. A count of mammals conducted on Skomer Island 10 days ago showed about 80 oiled seals—three to five badly oiled, 40 moderately oiled and the rest lightly oiled.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that oil deposits are constantly being caused around our coastline—including the North Yorkshire coast, where the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has one of its best sanctuaries, at Bempton cliffs in my constituency—by tankers and other ships sluicing out oil into the North sea and other waters, and that there is evidence that the practice has been increasing in recent months? What plans does my right hon. Friend have to ensure that that disgusting practice is stopped?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the fact that, day in and day out, an unacceptable amount of damage is caused by ships cleaning out their tanks. I assure him that my Department devotes substantial resources to detecting, where possible, the offenders and prosecuting them. We shall soon be publishing a draft Bill implementing a number of the Donaldson recommendations which require legislation. Some of those will deal with port waste facilities.

Mr. Ainger: Throughout Question Time today, the Secretary of State has referred to his inquiry as independent, but that is not the view taken in my constituency, in the rest of Wales and by many people throughout this country. Will he confirm that the terms of reference that he has given his so-called independent inquiry, to be undertaken by the marine accident investigation branch, makes no mention of the availability of salvage tugs, of the Donaldson inquiry recommendations, of the issue of single hulls versus double hulls, of the safety of port operations generally in and around Milford Haven, or of the need to examine current salvage law? As the MAIB inquiry is not comprehensive and its two-page interim report published only last Thursday contained five factual mistakes, does he now accept that much more information has emerged since his last statement to the House on this matter and that we need a full and independent inquiry, ideally under Lord Donaldson? As a major ecological disaster has taken place, will the Minister explain why we had an independent inquiry into the Braer and not into the Sea Empress?

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The MAIB inquiry into the Braer accident was exactly the same as the one that we have established into this one. The Donaldson report was not an inquiry into the Braer accident, but a wide-ranging look at a range of issues dealing with marine pollution and safety at sea.

I made it absolutely clear in my recent statement to the House that the inquiry will cover a number of the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised in the first part of his question. For example, it will cover whether enough tugs were available. It will also cover whether it would have made any difference if the Sea Empress had been a double-hulled rather than a single-hulled vessel. He should not therefore imply that the MAIB is not independent or that it will not consider certain specific issues when I have made it absolutely clear to the House that it will. Nor should he undermine the MAIB's independent status as it publishes its reports without fear or favour and has criticised my Department in the past.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that the penalties to deal with those who jettison oil upon the seas are sufficiently strong, and is such behaviour being policed enough?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is right to again draw attention to that matter. It is often quite difficult, having discovered the oil, to trace the vessel responsible for depositing it. Where possible, we shall track it down and take people to court. Substantial penalties are available against those who offend in this anti-social way.

Mr. Llwyd: In his answers about Milford Haven, the Secretary of State has been most complacent. I might save him some time in the context of the forthcoming inquiry by telling him that the Coastguard Agency advised that a heavy-duty salvage tug was available in west Wales for two days in December and for one day in January. The disaster happened in February and, to the best of my knowledge, a tug was not available. Is not it about time that the Government, if they really do learn from reports, implemented their recommendations?

Sir George Young: Of course if we establish inquiries we should take note of recommendations. I have announced that, of the 103 Donaldson recommendations, we have accepted 86. Since I made that announcement we have accepted a further five. Some of those that we are not taking forward immediately require international agreement and we have to reach that through the International Maritime Organisation. Others require legislation, and I shall soon publish a draft Bill that will take forward some recommendations that require legislation.

Public Transport Works (Compensation)

8. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to review the rules covering compensation following railway, underground and other public transport works. [17999]

Mr. Norris: We have no plans to review part I of the Land Compensation Act 1973, under which compensation is payable upon completion of public works.

Mr. Hughes: That is the answer that I feared. May I try to persuade the Minister to look again at two issues which colleagues have raised in relation to the channel tunnel rail link? My concerns relate to the Jubilee line and its consequences. First, if a business is adversely affected and the property is taken or partly taken, could we guarantee that the owner is put back into no worse a position than he would have been in if the works had not taken place? Secondly, in relation to public legislation or public works—railways or an underground system—the rules state that if a building is physically touched, compensation is payable. However, if the building is not touched, although there may be a huge hole a yard from the front door so that for years no one can find the door, let alone use it, compensation is not payable. Will the Minister look at the illogicality of the division between a building being physically affected and the clear effect on work, profit and viability of all the other consequences of the works?

Mr. Norris: The hon. Gentleman is being assiduous in prosecuting the interests of his constituents, particularly those in Borough High street, which I know, in relation to the Jubilee line extension. I hope that in all fairness he will understand when I say that I would prefer not to be drawn into negotiations on compensation claims that affect a number of his constituents. On his second point, he is aware that there are substantial provisions to allow for compensation and purchase of affected property where the property is not required for the scheme but is clearly blighted by it. New rules in relation to that were recently published by my Department following the Owen case.

I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman has among his constituents some shopkeepers and property owners who are finding it difficult to establish a link between the loss that they suffer and the statutory compensation that is available. I stress that that will always be a difficult area. Limitless compensation for blight or perceived blight in relation to any public sector works would put most of them beyond the purse or reach of the taxpayer or of the Government.

Dr. Twinn: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is a link between planning delays and the lack of compensation or levels of compensation? If the Government relaxed their rules and looked at the French system of compensation, they might get much more public sympathy for public investment in infrastructure.

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend, whose constituency contains the north circular road, knows that the average time between a good idea and that idea being rolled out as a piece of tarmac is 13 and a half years, of which 11 and a half are spent in the planning and public inquiry process. I have heard it suggested that we should adopt more generous compensation methods to truncate those inquiries. I hope that he will appreciate that that is a potentially extremely expensive course of action. In general, our compensation scheme attempts to put people who are affected in the same position as they would have been had the scheme not taken place. That involves negotiation, and on occasions, leads to delay. My hon. Friend's alternative, seductive as it may be in its simplicity, would in practice be a very expensive option.

Mr. William O'Brien: In view of the length of time that the rules of compensation have been in effect, does the Minister not think that it is time for a review, especially with regard to motorway and highway planning, for which the full information on pollution emissions is not being made available? If we are to have a proper and fair system of compensation, all information should be made available and the rules on compensation for blight should be updated through a review.

Mr. Norris: Following recent action in the Court of Appeal, we issued new guidelines on compensation precisely to try to relate more sympathetically to the position of property owners, especially with regard to discretionary purchase. As I said in answer to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), this is a very difficult area. Inevitably, if one considers all the cases where there may be some blight, a line has to be drawn and some people who are affected by schemes fall outside it. If the hon. Gentleman has any particular cases in mind, I would of course be very happy to look at them.

Sir Alan Haselhurst: Is it not totally unsatisfactory that claimants against Stansted airport in my constituency are having to wait about four years, if not longer, before a settlement figure is reached? Is it not totally indefensible that the British Airports Authority should take upwards of four months after a settlement has been agreed to pay compensation? Does my hon. Friend accept that we need to look at the matter?

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend has been extremely assiduous on behalf of his constituents who have been affected by noise at Stansted. He has made his own point in his own way. I am sure that the BAA will want to reflect on what he has said.

Trans-European Transport Networks

9. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will next meet his European Union counterparts to discuss trans-European transport networks. [18000]

Mr. Watts: My noble Friend the Minister for Aviation and Shipping is deputising for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at a meeting of the Council of Ministers today, at which the transport networks will be discussed.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank the Minister for that reply. As part of his brief, is he putting forward proposals for a technical study on the electrification of the trans-European network railway line between London and south Wales that goes on to Ireland? If that is so, will further funding be made available for the electrification of that line?

Mr. Watts: The railway line from London to south Wales is already a high-speed line. As part of our TEN bid for the coming year, we are bidding for funding for a feasibility study on the upgrading of the Great Western lines to the south-west.

Sir Donald Thompson: Will my hon. Friend take a trip round the motorways of France to see how empty they are simply because of high tolls? Does he agree that the most environmentally friendly method of moving traffic is along free motorways?

Mr. Watts: The free movement of traffic on motorways is certainly convenient for road users and can greatly reduce the pollution caused by the same traffic moving slowly on congested and less suitable roads.

Marine Pollution

10. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the ability of Government agencies to respond to marine pollution incidents. [18001]

Sir George Young: The Coastguard Agency's marine pollution control unit is the Government's lead body for responding to pollution incidents. The MPCU is a long-established and internationally respected unit with specific responsibilities for operations to deal with pollution at sea from ships. The unit maintains the national contingency plan, which co-ordinates the response of the other central and local government bodies involved. It has stockpiles of equipment and is ready to initiate immediate response operations anywhere around the United Kingdom coast in the event of a spill.

Mr. Jones: Does the Minister agree that the accident to the Sea Empress caused 250 tonnes of oil to spill into the sea, but the salvage operation over the next week caused 70,000 tonnes of oil to be spilled? Will he respond to the letter that he recently received from the National Trust, which listed 33 other organisations that are calling for an independent public inquiry into the accident? Will he listen to those demands, or have the Government something to hide?

Sir George Young: The Government have nothing to hide, which is why we have set up an independent inquiry. Of course I shall respond to the National Trust. The hon. Gentleman referred to requests for a full public inquiry, but that would involve legal representation of parties and lengthy adversarial public hearings and it would be extremely time-consuming. My priority is to find out, as quickly as possible, what went wrong, to establish the cause of the accident and to learn any relevant lessons. That is best done by an expert, independent investigation following the usual procedures set up by Parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Child Care Voucher Scheme

30. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what was the cost of the staff child care voucher scheme in the current financial year to date. [18022]

Mr. A. J. Beith (on behalf of the House of Commons Commission): The expenditure on the child care voucher scheme since its inception on 1 April 1995 to date is £45,109.

Mr. Corbyn: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that answer. Does he concede that while it must be of some assistance to people to use the voucher scheme to put their children in nurseries near to their homes, is not it time that the Commission examined the likely cost and feasibility of running a proper nursery in this building, so that the children of staff and Members can be looked after in a place of safety within the building—thus bringing us up to date with the 20th century before it has passed us by? Any other large institution would have workplace child care facilities, such as a nursery. This building has absolutely nothing.

Mr. Beith: The Commission has examined that possibility and the House has debated it. I take it that since the last time that the hon. Gentleman asked me a question on that matter, he has not persuaded the Administration and Accommodation Committees, from which the Commission takes advice, that progress can be made on such a scheme.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Is not it the case that hon. Members may issue child care vouchers to their own staff, to be debited against their office cost allowance? Bearing in mind the enthusiasm of a number of hon. Members on this issue, can the right hon. Gentleman tell us how many do so?

Mr. Beith: Hon. Members may do what the hon. Gentleman suggests, but establishing how many do so would require a question of the Leader of the House.

Jopling Reforms

31. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will make a statement on the cost of implementing the Jopling reforms. [18023]

Mr. Beith: There have been both direct costs and direct savings for the House's votes arising from the implementation of the Jopling reforms. There have been extra reporting and security costs because total sitting hours have actually increased, but with fewer sittings of the House continuing after 10.30 pm there have been savings in overtime, night allowances and late-night transport. The net effect so far has been an estimated reduction in costs of some £80,000.

Mr. Greenway: Have the staff responded happily to the more social hours that they are now enjoying? Does the right hon. Gentleman think that any more could be done to implement the Jopling reforms with a view to making life more acceptable to lady Members as well as gentlemen Members, in the way demanded in discussions outside the House?

Mr. Beith: As an individual Member, I should like more of the Jopling reforms to be carried out. However, the Commission's job is to make provision for the decisions that the House has made. As far as I am aware, the staff continue to work well and effectively in support of the arrangements, although the Commission has not canvassed opinion on whether they prefer them to the previous arrangements.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that against the financial savings must be weighed the very real fact that the increase in hours is entirely in debates where votes cannot be taken? Back-Bench Members have actually lost an advantage that they had previously, namely, that votes could be taken on Fridays—which is not now possible on the Adjournment debates. Although there is undoubtedly some positive benefit from the reforms, it is important that the House does not lose sight of the reason why we are here, which—saving the right hon. Gentleman's grace—is not to save money for his Commission, but to do a job for our constituents.

Mr. Beith: All those points were raised in the debates on the reforms. As far as I am aware, the reforms were not influenced by considerations of whether they would save money or not save money. The relatively complex balance I have just described indicates that it would be hard to argue for the reforms on that basis.

TRANSPORT

Marine Pollution

11. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the role of the salvors in the Sea Empress accident. [18002]

Sir George Young: As I announced in my recent statement, the marine accident investigation branch will examine the detail of the salvage operation as well as the causes of the original accident.

Mr. Dalyell: Can a system possibly be right in which the sole aim of the salvor is to save the ship?

Sir George Young: The system would not be right if that were the way in which it was structured; it is not structured like that. The reward due to the salvor is based on the value of the ship and the cargo that is salved. However, the contract also provides for an additional reward if, by his efforts, the salvor prevents or minimises environmental damage. In that way, the contract encourages the salvor to minimise environmental damage.

Dr. Spink: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that it is not yet at all certain that the accident and the disaster would have been averted or lessened if the ship had been double-hulled? Can he confirm that the inquiry will address that question?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is by no means certain that if the ship had been double-hulled, the disaster might have been avoided. He will be interested to learn that during the inquiry, we will simulate the accident to see whether a double hull would have made any difference.

12. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the recommendations contained in "Safer Ships and Cleaner Seas" have been accepted by his Department; and how many of these are now in practice. [18003]

Sir George Young: The Government accepted 86 of the 103 recommendations in the report when they published their response a year ago. They have since accepted a further five, and are considering another eight; only four have been rejected. Of the accepted recommendations, half have been implemented and action is being taken on all the others.

Dr. Godman: Has the Secretary of State made a definite timetable for the implementation of the recommendations on marine environmental high-risk areas? If he has such a timetable, will he outline the measures that would be taken in such areas to minimise the risk of accidents? He will not be surprised to hear me say that I think that the first such area should be the Minches.

Sir George Young: The hon. Gentleman asks about recommendation 59 of the Donaldson report that so-called MEHRAs—marine environmental high-risk areas—should be established. We first need to establish whether the existing voluntary arrangements for routing are working. Our survey suggests that they are, but we will consult on the results. We also need to discuss with the EC the proposals for environmentally sensitive areas because international agreement will be needed on the definition of such areas before they can be implemented.

Sir Patrick Cormack: When can we expect to see appropriate tugs in all the appropriate places?

Sir George Young: My hon. Friend will be interested to hear that we propose shortly to publish the so-called Belton report, which carried forward the Donaldson recommendations on the priorities for the location of tugs. We have implemented, as my hon. Friend knows, the priority recommendation that tugs should be situated at the Minches and at Dover. The Belton report will shed further light on the succeeding priorities.

Rail Privatisation

14. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the franchising of rail services. [18005]

Mr. Watts: The franchising programme is making good progress. Fourteen of the 25 train operating companies, representing 61 per cent. of passenger revenue in the financial year 1994-95, have either been franchised or are in the process of being sold.

Mr. Bayley: Do the Government still subscribe to the view that rail privatisation will bring increased competition? If so, do they regard it as a failure of policy that Wisconsin Transportation now owns all four freight companies? Is it true that the previous Secretary of State for Transport, the right hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), went to the United States to encourage Wisconsin Transportation to bid for all four companies? What plans do the Government have to prevent private rail operators from taking over one another and creating massive private rail monopolies?

Mr. Watts: Train freight companies are not franchised, which was the point of the hon. Gentleman's original question, but sold. With his wide knowledge of transport, the hon. Gentleman will recognise that Railfreight has plenty of competitors, notably from the road haulage industry, and it was the verdict of the market that Railfreight would be stronger with the three companies in common ownership, because that view was reflected in all of the bids.

Mr. Lidington: Is my hon. Friend aware of the widespread concern in my constituency that the public service obligations required of bidders for the Chiltern franchise are not compatible with the proposed freight service sought by Central Railways Ltd.? Will he therefore issue clear guidance so that bidders for the Chiltern franchise and the customers who value the Chiltern passenger service know exactly where they stand?

Mr. Watts: No subsequent proposal can pose any threat to the continuation of passenger services, which are protected and guaranteed for the first time by passenger service requirements.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ministerial Accountability

33. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Lord President of the Council what procedural measures he proposes to increase the accountability of Ministers to the House. [18024]

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The Government will contribute to the Public Service Committee's examination of ministerial accountability in the light of the Scott report. Sir Richard made no specific recommendations about the procedural arrangements of the House, but I am always ready to consider suggestions on procedural matters from hon. Members or from the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Bayley: In response to the Scott report, the Government claimed, ad nauseam, that Ministers had not knowingly misled Parliament, but the word "knowingly" was added to "Questions of Procedure for Ministers" only in July last year. Was it simply added to provide an alibi for the Government in the knowledge that the Scott report was coming? Will the Leader of the House consider removing the word from "Questions of Procedure for Ministers" so that Ministers who transgress must do what Lord Carrington more honourably did after the outbreak of hostilities in the south Atlantic, and resign?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman seems to be attempting to rerun a substantial debate that we have already had. If the Public Service Committee wishes to raise such points, no doubt they will be considered, but I find it a bit difficult to see why something that is done unknowingly should incur the wrath that the hon. Gentleman would like to bestow on it.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will my right hon. Friend look again at Friday sittings? Non-sitting Fridays deny Back-Bench Members of Parliament a valuable opportunity to table a private notice question. They also deny Ministers what can be a valuable opportunity to make a ministerial statement at 11 am on a matter quite unforeseen and of great national importance.

Mr. Newton: My general view is that the House collectively feels that the changes that were made following the Jopling report have been working rather well—including those that come up in a later question—and have given considerably increased opportunities to Back-Bench Members. I have no plans for a change at present.

Mr. Spearing: Would not the accountability of Ministers be improved if the suggestion by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)—in a later question on the Order Paper—for a Question Time on European Union matters were adopted? Would it not also be entirely compatible with protocol 13 of the treaty of Maastricht? Would not the Government be in a stronger position in respect of their colleagues in the European Union if they adopted the proposal of my hon. Friend and reverted to the practice before 1979?

Mr. Newton: The question whether there should be a dedicated Question Time on European matters has been looked at once or twice in the past and has not seemed to be a good idea. The Scrutiny Committee, which is currently conducting a further inquiry into the operation of scrutiny arrangements, might wish to make such a suggestion, although I am not aware at present that it is looking at that.

Adjournment Debates

34. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Lord President of the Council how many subjects have been raised in Adjournment debates since the change in Sessional Orders became effective in January 1995. [18025]

Mr. Newton: I assume that my hon. Friend is interested in private Members' Adjournment debates. There have been 190 daily and 188 Wednesday morning Adjournment debates since the change in Sessional Orders became effective. I should add for the sake of completeness that there have also been 41 Government debates on the Adjournment.

Mr. Marshall: May I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer and for the success of his reforms, which have confounded the sceptics, increased the amount of time available to private Members and enabled many more topics to be raised than were raised under the previous system?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend may utter those kind words. I shall receive them with the pleasure that they deserve.

EU Question Time

37. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will bring forward proposals for a specific Question Time for European Union matters. [18029]

Mr. Newton: I have no plans to do so, in case that was not clear from my earlier answer.

Mr. Banks: May I refer the right hon. Gentleman to the question asked earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing)? He said that the practice of allocating a specific time to Common Market questions was scrapped. I believe that that was in 1979, after the election. Why was it scrapped? Surely it is wrong that we should have to rely on the luck of the draw in order to raise European Union issues when clearly Europe is one of the most significant matters, if not the most significant matter that the House is currently discussing. Why cannot we have a change? Is it because the Conservative Government are too embarrassed about answering questions from their own Back Benchers on the European Union?

Mr. Newton: I have some information about the history. I understand that the European Community slot was abolished in 1985, following pressure from some hon. Members and discussions through the usual channels. The matter was then looked at again in 1989, when my predecessor, the official Opposition and the Clerk of the House expressed scepticism about the reinstatement of such a slot.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Have you had a request from a Minister to make a statement? You will be aware that the Government's scheme to privatise the Recruitment and Assessment Services Agency was defeated in another place on Friday by 124 votes to 64. You will also be aware that the Prime Minister said, with regard to the privatisation of the Post Office, "We are democrats. If there is no majority, we do not proceed." This House needs a statement from the Government on how they intend to proceed. Are they to abandon the scheme? Are they to report it to a Select Committee? Or are they to bring it to this House for a debate and vote?

Madam Speaker: As far as my authority is concerned, I can answer only the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's question. I have not been told that any Minister is seeking to make a statement on the matter that the right hon. Gentleman raises.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I ask for your guidance. It is an unhappy subject relating to the printing of the embossed notepaper of the House of Commons, which carries the portcullis. It has come to my attention that the proprietor of the firm which prints it—Wilprint of Cardiff—was sent down for corruption for four months just before Christmas and came out in January. The portcullis and all our proceedings have to be seen to be entirely above board and free of even the most indirect taint of corruption. Could you explain to me how I should draw the matter to the attention of the proper authorities so that we can ensure that the portcullis of the House and the notepaper on which we write carry the respect that we always thought they had?

Madam Speaker: I had hoped to call the hon. Gentleman to put a supplementary question to the right hon. Member answering for the House of Commons Commission today, but it was not appropriate. Now that the hon. Gentleman has raised the matter, which is new to me, I shall take it up with the Serjeant at Arms to see what can be done. The hon. Gentleman may also care to put a question to the House of Commons Commission so that we are all aware what the answer is.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker. If the people of Cardiff do not want the work, there are many fine printers in Harrow who do.

Madam Speaker: We have very good printers in West Bromwich, West, too.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Aggrieved Members are always in a weak position to raise points of order, but I am fortified by the fact that I was lucky enough, by virtue of the low number of questions to the Commission, to be called today. From that position of strength, may I ask whether it is satisfactory that in 45 minutes we should have had only 10 questions on transport? When I first came here, 25 to 30 questions were got through.

Madam Speaker: I am absolutely delighted to have the support of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). He is a regular attender in the Chamber and must have heard me many times urging hon. Members to put short questions and Ministers to give brisk answers. We do not proceed through the Order Paper as briskly and effectively as I would like. I keep records every day of how far we proceed and every few months, I give them to the Leader of the House and the shadow Leader of the House in the hope that they will urge Ministers and Front-Bench and Back-Bench Members to proceed more efficiently at Question Time. I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman has raised the matter, which enables me once again to urge all hon. Members and Ministers to deal more briskly with questions.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You referred to regular attendance. Do you think that the thin attendance in the Chamber outside of Prime Minister's Question Time on Tuesday and Thursday—there were fewer than 40 Back Benchers present for questions today—is linked with the fact that the media have stopped reporting the House? Is it not unfortunate that the heart of our parliamentary democracy is not being reported by the serious press?

Madam Speaker: Are we having a question-and-answer session? I have lots of views about why the serious press does not report the House as I think that it should, but this is not the appropriate time for me to express them. The time may come when I can do so and then I will do it very forcefully.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. How times change. I was reading in the Library the other day that on 29 February 1968,. Members started on a Thursday with overseas aid and got to Question 33. That was followed by the Prime Minister, Harold Wilson, who answered Eric Heffer twice—Questions 4 and 5. At that time, the press reported everything that went on in the House. I think that there is a law that says that the press reports in inverse proportion to the number of questions asked in the House of Commons.

Madam Speaker: I remember a time in the House when Members did not put supplementary questions. That dates me.

ESTIMATES DAY

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1995-96

Class XIII, Vote 4

Department of Social Security

[Relevant documents: The Fifth Report from the Social Security Committee of Session 1994-95 on the Work of the Department of Social Security and its Agencies (House of Commons Paper No. 382); the Government Reply thereto (Cm. 3148); and the Social Security Departmental Report: The Government's Expenditure Plans 1995-96 to 1997-98 (Cm. 2813).]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a further supplementary sum not exceeding £19,355,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to complete or defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on administration, for agency payments, the promotion of Government policy on disability issues, and for certain other services including grants to local authorities and voluntary organisations.—[Mr. Andrew Mitchell.]

3.37 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): I am grateful for the opportunity for this debate, for which we thank the Liaison Committee and partly also the Department, whose supplementary estimate is such that it will allow hon. Members to speak on any aspect of its work and remain in order. I spent some time trying to think of an aspect of the Department's work that would be out of order, but I could not think of one. Perhaps other hon. Members will be more effective than me in that respect.

In opening the debate, I shall concentrate on one topic to which we gave some prominence in our fifth report on the work of the Department and its agencies and which we debated in the House last week, debated in Committee and have another opportunity to debate today—fraud. I wish to take the debate on and suggest some changes in its nuances that I believe are important not only for the House but for the taxpayers—those who are in work and who contribute £15 every day from their pay towards underwriting the social security budget.

First, I emphasise the importance of housing benefit fraud committed by landlords rather than that committed by claimants. Those who have heard me speak before know that I think fraud is wrong full stop, but as any Administration will have limited resources to combat fraud, it is sensible to deploy the resources in those areas where it is most prevalent. I fear that there may have been a difference in emphasis between the Select Committee on Social Security and the Secretary of State on that. When we questioned him on that aspect on Wednesday, we talked about evidence of landlord fraud and he said to the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes), "Not evidence—assertions".

I was referring to the evidence that the London borough of Haringey has put together. It has carried out a survey of landlords who have more than 30 claims paid direct to them every week. On the first 15 cases, the borough has carried out 1,300 visits so far—that is one borough, for a survey that is, so far, incomplete. That contrasts vividly with the Government's survey of housing benefit fraud, which they carried out throughout the country and which covered 4,500 claims. I am talking not about 4,500 investigations, but about 4,500 claimants, who were asked about their claims. If they could remember accurately what they had said when they first claimed benefit, no further investigations were undertaken.

Although the Government publicised that as a fraud survey, it was slightly misleading to the House and to those outside to do so because they were testing people's memories. I have a bad memory and would probably have failed to answer the questions correctly. I would not be able to remember what I said when I originally made a claim, which might have spurred the Government into further action by suggesting that there was fraud. The Government undertook, not a fraud inquiry, but a test of memory.

Let us consider the Haringey inquiry about which the Secretary of State was somewhat dismissive in the Select Committee. It was not carrying out a memory test. It has called at properties to question landlords and claimants where a landlord has more than 30 housing benefit claims paid directly to him in any one week. The council checked the national insurance number of each claimant and asked for further evidence from utility bills. It also checked in other boroughs whether double claims were being made and studied council tax payments.

For this debate, I asked Haringey to give us information on the first 15 landlords on which it called. I emphasise that those were landlords who had more than 30 housing benefit claims paid directly to them each week. I asked Haringey what the fraud rate was. Obviously, I will not read out the names of the landlords concerned or their agents as that would be unfair. I will refer to them by number.

The first landlord called on as part of the survey had 112 housing benefit claims paid direct to him each week—more than £13,000 was paid direct to that landlord in housing benefit—and 25 per cent. were shown by the Haringey anti-fraud inquiry to be fraudulent. The second landlord had 111 direct claims for housing benefit paid to him each week, totalling more than £13,000 of public money, and the fraud rate was 23 per cent. The third landlord had only 39 direct claims for housing benefit paid to him each week, totalling almost £3,000 a week of public money, and the fraud rate was 67 per cent.

The fourth landlord had 46 direct payments made to him every week, totalling some £4,000, and 26 per cent. were found to be fraudulent. The fifth landlord had 111 claims directly paid to him or her every week, totalling some £11,000, and 16 per cent. were shown to be fraudulent. The sixth landlord had 121 direct payments made to him every week, totalling almost £8,000 from public funds, and 15 per cent. were shown to be fraudulently claimed. The seventh landlord had 141 claims paid directly to him or her every week, totalling almost £9,000 from public funds, and 11 per cent. were fraudulently claimed.

The eighth landlord had 42 claims paid directly, totalling almost £8,000 a week, and 33 per cent. were shown to be fraudulent. The ninth landlord had 112 claims paid directly, totalling almost £11,000 a week, and 59 per cent. were shown to be fraudulent. The 10th landlord had 69 claims paid directly each week, totalling more than £6,000 of public funds, and 29 per cent. were found to be fraudulent. The 11th landlord had 58 claims paid directly to him or her a week, totalling more than £7,000, and 15 per cent. were shown to be fraudulent.

The 12th landlord had 100 direct housing payments paid to him each week, totalling almost £17,000, and 10 per cent. were found to be fraudulent. The 13th landlord had 192 housing benefit claims paid directly to him a week, totalling £19,000, and 14 per cent. were shown to be fraudulent. The 14th landlord had 46 direct payments paid each week, totalling £4,000, and the fraud rate was 42 per cent. The 15th landlord had 62 direct claims paid each week, totalling more than £9,000 of public funds, and the fraud rate was more than 16 per cent.

I have put those cases on the record, without naming the landlords or their agents, because I want to support the hon. Member for Harrow, West, who is also a member of the Select Committee on Social Security. When he raised this question with the Secretary of State for Social Security, he was slightly terse with him and said that it was not evidence but assertions. The survey was conducted in Haringey—which happens to be a Labour authority, but would be matched by Westminster. Westminster is equally effective against fraud and it is carrying out a survey of all landlords who have more than 30 claims in housing benefits paid directly to them each week.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Peter Lilley): For the record, my remark about assertions did not relate to the Haringey survey—which sounds extremely interesting. My only remark about the survey was that it involved 15 landlords and, obviously, we will investigate it and study the findings. We have absolutely no vested interest in understating the level of fraud. We are simply here to detect fraud, and to prevent and to deter it in the future. As such, we are at one with the Chairman of the Select Committee on Social Security.

Mr. Field: I have no wish to score points, to be accused by hon. Friends who serve on the Committee of being vicious in the debate or even to be welcomed as crossing the Floor by my own side, as happened in our previous debate. I merely wish to place the evidence on record.

The Secretary of State made a very important contribution to our Select Committee hearing. He said that anti-fraud officers see fraud everywhere—I wish that that were true of all anti-fraud officers, but let us take that statement as being true—and that the important implication of that is that those people should be in the driving seat when we design programmes to combat fraud. He said that they know more about the subject than us and even some officers in the Department, because they are up against it every day. I shall return to that.

It is correct that I have cited only 15 of the 16 cases of which the Secretary of State has heard, and Haringey's survey will be a total survey of all those larger landlords in Haringey, but 1,300 visits have already been made in that borough. That contrasts with a national survey of only 4,500 inquiries by the Department.

I emphasised that in the Haringey survey, national insurance records, utility bills and council tax payment records have been checked and checks have been made with other boroughs, to verify whether claimants exist or are a creation of the landlord. That is a very different exercise from the memory test, which is what I suggest that the Secretary of State was undertaking when he inquired into housing benefit fraud.

I do not oppose memory tests. I merely suggest—I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell), will consider this argument when he replies, or at least convey it to the Department—that the type of inquiry that Haringey has conducted needs to be done throughout the country, so that we do not test claimants' memories but examine what landlords are doing.

Some landlords draw very substantial sums from public funds. They are in a unique position, because they receive a large benefit now, which, even if it is not paid directly into their bank account, goes into their bank account. Every other benefit that the Secretary of State for Social Security pays on the taxpayer's behalf goes to claimants for them to spend. This is a direct transfer payment to a specific group, so it is a very special group. Therefore, a survey similar to the work that Haringey has done should be conducted for the entire country.

Had Westminster, not Haringey, been mentioned in the Select Committee, I would have telephoned Westminster city council and asked for equivalent information to that which Haringey has given us. Both authorities are outstanding in London in combating fraud.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): On the basis of the sample that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, will he estimate housing benefit fraud throughout the country? Is that fraud perpetrated only by the landlord, or is there a conspiracy between landlord and tenant?

Mr. Field: I am doubly grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention because it gives me the opportunity to make it clear that I am not suggesting that fraud is a one-way traffic, undertaken only by landlords. I am saying that it is important that the limited resources that at any one time the Treasury will allow the Department to have to counter fraud are deployed as effectively as possible and that, if we are interested in reducing the social security budget, especially the part boosted by fraud, our efforts should primarily go into areas where the gains will be quickest and biggest; and I am suggesting that the biggest gains would be from landlords. It is difficult for claimants to run a housing benefit fraud racket for any length of time. That is not to say that some of us do not have clever constituents who manage to do that, but it is difficult to do so without the landlord's help. Haringey is finding that many of the tenants whom it checks up on do not exist: they are fictitious tenants created by the landlord or previous tenants who have been recycled by the landlord.

That issue takes me neatly on to my second point. I gained a mere inference from what the Secretary of State said during our discussions last Wednesday that concerned me. I questioned the extent of child benefit fraud.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Before my hon. Friend leaves the subject of housing benefit, I wish to make a further point. He will recall that during the interview that we had with the Secretary of State last Wednesday, I asked a question about the public spending consequences of the deregulation of rents. Typically, a former council-owned property could be rented for £150 a week in London, whereas the council rent would be about £50 a week, both of which rents might well be paid with housing benefit. The Secretary of State seemed unconcerned by that and unwilling to examine the public spending consequences of rent deregulation. Would it not be appropriate for the Secretary of State seriously to consider that issue? The public purse seems to be creating a large number of millionaire landlords through a process of rent deregulation and the open-ended payment of benefit for whatever rent the landlords choose to set in areas of great poverty and high levels of housing benefit.

Mr. Field: I congratulate my hon. Friend on making his point again in today's debate. I look forward to the Secretary of State rising at the Dispatch Box and shall be happy to give way to him. I also noticed that, when the Secretary of State was replying to my hon. Friend, he raised the important consideration of whether there could be any meaningful market rents in areas where the amount of rented housing stock was still so dependent on one landlord—the public sector. The public owner—the public landlord—could fix the market rate in the area and, by so doing, could determine the extent to which taxpayers would have to foot an increasingly large part of that bill.

Both my hon. Friend's question and the Secretary of State's response to it were intriguing. We did not receive an answer to that question in the Select Committee and have not yet done so today—perhaps the Secretary of State will respond to that question later. If the monopoly landlord is allowed to set the market rent in his area, the Government, and therefore taxpayers, seem to be over a barrel because we taxpayers have to foot the bill.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): If what my hon. Friend has said is true—all the evidence sent to him shows that a number of landlords are doing their best to swindle money out of the public purse—what confidence can we have that landlords in the private sector will not swindle their tenants? Does that not demonstrate how right many of us are when we say that people should not be subjected to private landlords when they have no choice? When people cannot buy and cannot obtain local authority accommodation, they are forced to become tenants of landlords such as those whom my hon. Friend has described.

Mr. Field: It is intolerable for our constituents to be in a market where they have no choice because there is only a limited supply of private rented accommodation. If the market was working well, the choice would be greater and the pressures of the market would be applied against the landlords. As my hon. Friend says, our constituents often face Hobson's choice and the more vulnerable they are, the more likely they are to be subjected to that form of aggression by landlords.

I suspect that many hon. Members read the survey in The Sunday Times of housing benefit millionaires—landlords who are in such profitable areas that they draw more than £1 million a year in housing benefit. The survey showed that the treatment of many tenants who existed was undesirable, while other tenants for whom claims had been made did not exist. When pressed to identify the accommodation to which certain claims related, landlords specified, for example, the space under a sink and part of a garage. We should have no illusions about landlords who, up to now, have been able to make easy pickings from the public purse.

As the Select Committee has pointed out, if we are to deal with fraud, we should do so where the gains will be easiest. I do not suggest that fraud of other kinds does not take place—indeed, we may have time to discuss some aspects today—but, for the moment, I wish to concentrate on landlord fraud.

Before that bevy of interventions, I was saying that more child benefit fraud may take place than the Department would like to think. I asked Haringey council whether it had carried out any surveys in relation to fictitious children. As the council is not responsible for the administration of such matters, it had conducted no surveys on child benefit fraud as such, but it checked whether landlords whom it was investigating had included children in their claims for housing benefit. Where children were included, it investigated whether they attended schools and had health records, and whether child benefit was being claimed.

The results of that investigation were staggering. More than 50 per cent. of the children for whom one landlord was claiming housing benefit were found not to exist, and a substantial number of such children in general did not exist. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey) is concerned about women from other European Community countries who come here in the late stages of pregnancy, register the birth of their children here, disappear back to their own countries and then claim child benefit for the next 18 years. That may happen more than the Secretary of State thinks, and it may involve people from outside the European Community as well. We should concentrate anti-fraud campaigns on where fraud is greatest.

After listening to the Secretary of State's speech, I feared that the Department might be rather more interested in the photo-opportunities provided by the local spot checks of which he spoke than in any other aspect, and that the whole campaign might be merely a lead-up to the general election. It would be advantageous for one party to concentrate on claimants, and for the other to concentrate on landlords. I hope that we shall achieve a proper balance in future surveys, and will pay most attention to how we can retrieve the most money for taxpayers when wrongful claims are made.

I have managed to cover quite a few of the topics with which I wanted to deal, but my contribution would not be complete if I did not refer to national insurance numbers. Up to now, the emphasis in debates in the Chamber and in Committee has been on whether the right number of national insurance numbers are being issued. I do not for one moment disagree with the need to make the system secure, but I should like to suggest to the Government a rather different tack on how to accomplish it. My comments are based on events that occurred last Friday: the first happened in my surgery, and the second is from the experience of an anti-fraud officer in London. Neither event relates to whether there are 3 million or 10 million extra numbers floating around the system, but each emphasises how easy it is for national insurance numbers to be used by people other than those to whom they were allocated in the first place.

The anti-fraud officer, while looking for other information on a computer file, found a person's surname with two addresses listed for it, and the two addresses showed two national insurance numbers for the same name. The date of birth was the same for each of the names. The anti-fraud officer came across that information by accident, which suggests—leaving aside the issue of how many spare numbers are floating around the system—that the Government have yet to perform a data-matching exercise on the information that they have. If they had performed such an exercise, that piece of information would have been spat out and made available immediately.

The other example concerns a person who came to my surgery on Friday. He was not my constituent, but the constituent of my right hon. Friend—I rightly call him that—the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt). The constituent had been in employment all his life. He had one short period of self-employment because he lost his job, although he is now again working for an employer. He phoned the Contributions Agency in Newcastle because he wanted to pay, I believe, his class V contributions, which are made by self-employed people. He was asked to hold while his file was pulled up. He was then told, "You don't owe any money; you're in prison." He said, "I'm not in prison. I want to pay. I've been self-employed."

The man clearly did not realise the significance of the information he was giving me. It suggested that his national insurance number had been used—for how long we do not know—by someone else who had then been imprisoned. His national insurance contribution had been credited while the other person was in prison so that, when he called wishing to make his contributions to the fund for the period in which he was self-employed, he found that his contribution was complete.

A number of people, particularly anti-fraud officers, have suggested that "piggybacking" is much more substantial than we think. The Government, therefore, have a dual task. The first task will be to achieve a secure national system, which will take longer and will be very difficult because of the state of the numbers game, if I can call it that. In such a system, social security numbers should relate only to real people, and numbers that are spare because people die or stop making contributions should be held securely.

The stage beyond that is to decide how we make sure that people do not misuse the system, even if we could secure the safety of the current system of numbers. I previously suggested to the Secretary of State that, just as we are now going to receive notification of our pension contributions each year—what we have paid and what the charges are if we have a personal pension—should not we also be thinking about issuing a national insurance statement each year, showing what we have paid and what benefits we have received?

If we had such a statement, every incident of piggybacking would be reported to the genuine national insurance number holder, and the constituent whom I met on Friday would have received a statement informing him that he was registered as being in prison. It would have been clear that his number had been misused. We hope that his number is not still being used by the person in prison, but we do not know whether the prisoner's family is putting the number to good use.

A simple check would ensure that everyone knew whether his number was being used safely. If statements were issued randomly—not at the end of the financial year—someone involved in piggybacking would not necessarily know when a number's true holder was receiving his statement. We should therefore increase the chances of those misusing other people's numbers being caught.

The purpose of my contribution to today's debate—I am grateful to you, Madam Speaker, for calling me—is to try to change once again the emphasis of the Government's campaign against fraud. I am pleased that the Government have pushed the issue up the agenda and would like to think that the Select Committee has played a small part in concentrating the Department's mind on the importance of the problem. I hope that today's debate might also play a small part in changing the emphasis of the Government's follow-up to the initiative that they announced to the House last week.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I congratulate the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Social Security, and all the members of the Committee on their work. In many ways, the Select Committee on Social Security is a model Select Committee. It oversees the Department of Social Security's work thoroughly and conscientiously. I have read the Committee's fifth report, entitled "The Work of the Department of Social Security and its Agencies", and believe that it is an excellent report.

I was interested in what the hon. Member for Birkenhead had to say about housing benefit fraud. If one grosses up the percentages that he mentioned—the examples of fraud that he cited varied from 15 per cent. to 67 per cent.—it would appear that the average fraud is around 30 per cent. If the level of housing benefit fraud is anywhere near that figure, there are substantial gains to be made from devoting resources to dealing with that aspect of fraud.

I agree that it is right to devote a finite amount of resources to aspects of social security likely to produce the greatest rewards. Clearly, we should consider landlords claiming large sums every week. The hon. Gentleman cited the case of one landlord who was receiving £19,000 a week in housing benefit, or £1 million a year. That is a substantial sum of taxpayers' money, by any measure. Such cases should be investigated as a matter of urgency. The House debated benefit fraud last week, and there is no doubt that the extra resources that the Department is rightly devoting to it have yielded substantial results. I believe that extra resources would produce further successes.

I was also interested in the hon. Gentleman's idea for an annual statement of contributions for everyone who contributes to the national insurance fund. Last year we improved considerably the rights of members of private occupational pension schemes. As we are talking about millions of people, a substantial cost would be attached to such a statement, but there must be a case for providing regular information to national insurance contributors. An annual statement could usefully include someone's total contributions in a year, the total benefits that people had drawn in that time if they had had the misfortune to be unemployed or sick, and their prospective benefits, about which people start to worry as they approach retirement. They want to be sure that they have the maximum credits and that they will be able to draw a full pension. They want to know what their entitlement to the state earnings-related pension scheme will be. A statement on total prospective benefits would also be useful. People would welcome it.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Birkenhead is right that the total cost of the statement might easily be offset by the gains that would be made through exposing fraud. Obviously, that is impossible to measure, but the amount saved could easily cover the statement's cost. It could be a profitable exercise for taxpayers.

I was struck by one item of information revealed by the Select Committee when it investigated the Child Support Agency, as it has on a number of occasions. I think that I am right in saying that, after the first letter was sent to mothers or fathers on income support and they were asked to respond within eight weeks, many of them went off benefit immediately. That was one of the largest gains from the exercise. There has been much debate about the CSA's costs and benefits, but that substantial benefit to the taxpayer was a by-product of the system. It suggests that, if we communicate with beneficiaries regularly and ask them one or two awkward questions, they may quickly disappear off the map.

Mr. Frank Field: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his contribution, but the question of fraud is even more serious than he suggests. The enormous sums that taxpayers have got back as a result of that first envelope going out are merely the tip of the iceberg, because that does not cover people who are slightly more streetwise and know that the agency's administration is not as we would wish it to be and that, if they merely ignore the letter, the agency probably will not follow it up. I know that the agency would not want to use this language, but it has given an amnesty to parents who, in effect, put two fingers up to taxpayers by not replying to its letters. Those people are slightly more streetwise and know that the agency will never be able to get round to them.

In the first, I think, 18 months, £360 million-worth of books were returned—a substantial sum—but that is a small sum compared with what could be gained if we could only get the agency working effectively, if the amnesty for parents who are refusing to answer questions were withdrawn and if the agency could tackle those people effectively. The gains to taxpayers would be massive.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) is here. She piles in questions, the answers to which all put question marks over how well the agency works. The one sector where we never thought the agency would be a success, where it has turned out to be a major success, but where it could be an even bigger success, is in countering fraud.

Mr. Smith: That suggests that, if additional resources were available to the agency and it was able to follow up some of the people who did not reply to its letters, further huge gains could be made. Some people do not receive letters in the first place. Admittedly, they are nothing to do with the CSA, but the implication must be that, if they were written to from time to time, they too might not claim. I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Obviously, it is hard, by definition, to measure fraud, but the taxpayer would probably gain greatly if more resources were devoted to it.

In its fifth report, the Committee looked at the operation of the executive agencies of the Department of Social Security. The DSS is unusual in that almost all its work is carried out through agencies, which means that almost all the money that it spends is spent through agencies. It is a useful case study, and the Department covers the largest agency, the Benefits Agency. I was interested in a comment on that issue by Sir Michael Partridge, who retired recently from the post of permanent secretary at the DSS.

It has always seemed to me that one of the principal advantages of establishing the executive agency system was that for the first time there would be a clear distinction within the civil service between policy advice and policy execution. In that context, what Sir Michael Partridge told the Committee was interesting. He said:

"In the past I used to sit there with these enormous piles of paper . . . This was a tremendous waste of time. I now have virtually no paper. So my role has changed much more to thinking about the future, getting my staff to run the Department in a proper way and to be much more accountable to me, much more quickly, and to Ministers, for their performance. I feel I have much more handle on what is happening in the Department and what is going wrong, than I did from trying to spend hours and hours looking at minutiae."

Of course, the permanent secretary in any Department, most of whose service delivery is carried out through the agencies, is able to concentrate on policy advice to Ministers, because other people—the chief executives of the agencies, who are also accounting officers—can be held to account by the House and are regularly summoned by Select Committees. That has been a great success, because it has started to change the culture of the civil service.

At one time, those who wanted to get on in the civil service had to be good at advising Ministers—the key was policy advice—and although most of the Department's money was spent on services, delivering them took second place. That has changed a great deal.

In paragraph 75, the Committee reported:

"A kind of transfer league is developing in Chief Executives."

That is good, because some people are coming in from outside. An example is Michael Bichard who, I think, was chief executive of Gloucester city council. He is now the permanent secretary in the Department and he got there by first becoming chief executive of the Benefits Agency. At present, there is as much emphasis on policy execution and on being good at making sure that the Government's customers get a good service as there used to be on policy advice. That is a great improvement, and the DSS has led the field in that respect.

Mr. Corbyn: Has the hon. Gentleman ever thought of the irony of a market developing in highly paid chief executives of these agencies, who force market testing down the throats of low-paid employees in their Departments, make large numbers redundant and try to worsen their working conditions? Apparently, incentives are required for chief executives, but sticks are needed for low-paid people, many of whom have given a lifetime of service to the civil service. They feel outraged and alienated because of the way in which they have been treated.

Mr. Smith: Those people do not need to be upset because chief executives are well paid. If good people are wanted, one must pay a reasonable price and compare it with the price paid in the private sector. I agree that a better performance will not be had from an employee by reducing his remuneration or worsening his working conditions. Better performance can be had by adopting the opposite approach—by offering incentives, measuring performance and improving job satisfaction. That is the right way to do it, and to that extent I agree with the hon. Gentleman.

The agencies have been a success. For example, a three-year evaluation in the Contributions Agency

"concluded that in each year efficiency savings had been exceeded and the milestone targets had been achieved and that 'Agency status has therefore clearly resulted in improved performance, accountability and value for money'".

That refers to the Contributions Agency, but I would say the same about the Benefits Agency.

The concept of customer service did not operate in the administration of social security benefits in local offices, say, 10 years ago, before the Benefits Agency was established. My local office in High Wycombe, which provides a service to my constituents, has been transformed over that time. A huge effort is made to help and advise people, some of whom are the most vulnerable in our society. It tries to provide a decent service. The system is complex and there is a range of benefits, but the service has improved.

Some people might say that the improvement is only superficial, but I do not agree. The area that people visit has greatly improved. At one time, people who visited the front office were treated almost as if they were not human beings. They were made to wait for very long periods in appalling conditions.

The whole set-up has become much more customer friendly. That is because—this relates to my point about job satisfaction—there is much more staff training at the Benefits Agency, which is good for staff and customers. As a consequence of staff training, customers are receiving a much better service.

Mr. Frank Field: Although most of us have seen the transformation of our local offices under the agency agreement—provided that we do not represent a London constituency and have found that offices have moved out of the area—does the hon. Gentleman think that the improvement will be such that in the next year or two, the Comptroller and Auditor General will be able to sign the agency's accounts, given that he has refused them an unqualified audit since income support was introduced?

Mr. Smith: It is a most unsatisfactory matter. As a member of the Public Accounts Committee, I can certainly say that the Committee is not complacent about it in the slightest. The necessity for the Comptroller and Auditor General to qualify the audit of any Government Department or executive agency is a matter for concern. It suggests that the agency's record keeping is still unsatisfactory and that there is still room for improvement, which I believe is the case.

Although I was focusing particularly on the way in which the agency deals with its customers, I acknowledge the need for improvement. When the National Audit Office carried out a sample check on the payment of income support, it found an unacceptably high error rate. That suggests that, although there has been much staff training, there is a need for more. There must be better quality outputs. That is what it is all about—measuring output and getting better performance, which at the moment is not good enough. Errors impact both ways—some beneficiaries lose out and some gain. The error rate of the Inland Revenue is not nearly as high as that of the Benefits Agency. The Benefits Agency has scope for further improvement and will have to work over the next few months and years to improve its performance.

One point in the report that interested me was the very important concept of a one-stop shop. When claimants go to a local benefits office, it is normally possible for them to see one officer, who is able to deal with the whole range of benefits. The Committee makes the point that very often such officers will have to deal not only with social security. In fact, that would be rather unusual. Somebody on income support would almost certainly be claiming housing benefit and council tax benefit, and even be dealing with the Inland Revenue—certainly if he had become unemployed in the previous 12 months. He would therefore have to deal with another Government agency.

The idea of trying to bring all those claims together at one advice point is obviously very ambitious. We are talking principally about co-operation between local benefits offices and local councils. Two different council departments would be involved—one dealing with housing benefit and one with council tax benefit. That is something which the Committee should pursue with the Government, to see what further progress can be made.

We all know, from dealing with individual constituents, that there is a bewildering maze of different benefits. To have reached the point where someone can see just one officer in a benefits office is obviously a tremendous step forward. If we could take that further, so that someone could talk to just one person about the whole range of benefits, possibly including even his income tax position, that would be a tremendous step towards helping people with a very complicated matter. Indeed, some of the benefit forms are even more complicated than income tax returns. Of course, no one gives a high priority to completing an income tax return; nor do people enthuse over doing so. The Inland Revenue says that it may be easier when we have self-assessment, but I doubt it. Claiming social security benefits is a difficult process and we should do everything we can to support people in doing so.

4.30 pm

Ms Liz Lynne (Rochdale): This is almost a re-run of our debate in the Chamber last week on benefit fraud. Before dealing with some of the issues in the Social Security Select Committee report, I want to refer to the total amount of social security expenditure. It is fashionable for the media and hon. Members to say that social security is unaffordable. I do not doubt that spending on social security is high. Indeed, the Government estimate that it will be £90 billion for the year 1995-96, which will cost every working person £15 a day. What I want to ask all hon. Members is whether there is a cheaper alternative. Quite honestly, I do not believe that there is.

Any alternative must pass two tests—first, is it cheaper for the Department of Social Security and the Government as a whole, and secondly, is it cheaper for the people of this country? If it does not pass those tests, we shall be passing the buck, because the bill to the family will rise, even though the taxpayer might find things easier. At the end of the week, month or year, the person concerned will have to pay more.

There is a frequently expressed fear about a demographic time bomb, with the country being overrun by senior citizens in a couple of decades. In reality, the growth has already started. A DSS publication says that in 1990, 15 per cent. of the population were over 65. It predicted a slight fall to 14 per cent. in the year 2000 and then a rise to 16 per cent. in 2020. Of course, we must take account of the importance of the number of retired people in society compared with the number of people who are actually working, but even on those figures, the position will not be as bad as some of the predictions suggest. For example, the proportion of pensioners to people of working age in 1990 was 23 per cent. It is predicted that the figure will rise to 26 per cent. in 2020. That is better than the figures for 12 other European Union countries, where the proportion was 21 per cent. in 1990, rising to 29 per cent. in 2020. In other words, the figure for the EU will rise by 8 per cent. compared with a UK rise of 3 per cent.

Although I do not doubt that there are grounds for concern, I do not believe that there are grounds for alarm. Some people in the media are sounding the alarm bells, but before we start slashing spending on social security and disentitling many more people, we must look at the consequences. We must consider whether private provision is any cheaper. It certainly is not cheaper for sickness, for disability or for unemployment. The basic principle of insurance is spreading the risk; no system can spread the risk more widely than the national insurance system.

We must also examine the costs of any cuts in social security benefit to the Government and to the nation. Cuts in housing benefit and income support, for example, may save the Department of Social Security money, but what are the costs to other Departments? There may be costs to the Home Office from increasing crime, and the taxpayers' bill may go up because of homelessness. We should consider the number of homeless people with tuberculosis—200 times more than the national average. If homeless people fall ill, the cost to the national health service is greater. All Departments, especially the Department of Social Security, must look at the knock-on effects on other Departments and at the overall bill for the Government.

I now come to the Select Committee report. If there is a back-to-work strategy for unemployed and lone parents, they must be given advice about their financial position and entitlements. I welcome that, but I believe that we must also help people back into work. The payment of child care costs is a wise investment for the future. Apart from that, we need far bolder measures, and I do not believe that that point is being addressed.

The Select Committee recommended that, on a trial basis, calls to the War Pensions Agency helpline should be charged at the local rate, and I sincerely hope that the Government will accept that. I know that they have said that they will look at the suggestion and that they will consider the cost to the Department of Social Security, but I wish that they would just accept it. The recent reforms of war pensions are not going smoothly—we all know that. War pensioners and war widows need the helpline service, and they need their calls to be charged at the local rate. It is well known that I have never been a great supporter of the Child Support Agency and that I would like it to be scrapped. However, if the CSA can provide that service—anyone who telephones the CSA is charged at the local rate—I do not see why the War Pensions Agency cannot do the same.

I shall not go into detail about benefit fraud and the take-up of benefits, because we had a discussion about that last week. I welcome the Select Committee's recommendations. But anti-fraud activities have to go hand in hand with promoting the take-up of benefits, especially pensions. Some pensioners do not take up their entitlement to income support, which means that they miss the cold weather payments as well. Some 305 pensioners had hypothermia listed on their death certificate in 1994. How many of those pensioners did not get the income support and the cold weather payments to which they were entitled? The situation could get even worse if we do not promote the take-up of income support by pensioners who are supposed to get it.

Ten days ago, it was reported in The Guardian that there would be short-term savings by the Department of Social Security. It was suggested that the Department would remove services that encouraged people to obtain the £2 billion of unclaimed benefits and that there would be cuts in the telephone advice lines. It was also suggested that the Department would end the extension of benefit office opening hours and that it would stop the benefit buses—the buses that go to outlying areas, so that people's queries can be answered in their locality. Will the Minister confirm or deny that those cuts will really take place? If he confirms that they will take place, will he explain the reasoning behind the decision?

Social security spending must be closely monitored. We must fight waste, whether from fraud or from overpayment. As I have said many times, £546 million was overpaid in income support last year, mainly through official error. That must also be addressed when we talk about waste.

I welcome what the Government are doing on benefit fraud, but when it comes to the growth of expenditure on social security, we must keep things in proportion. Social security spending, as I said earlier, is high, but there is probably no cheaper alternative for families' bills at the end of the week or month. It is certainly not right simply to pass the buck to other Departments, charities or the population as a whole.

4.40 pm

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North-West): It is nice to have an early opportunity to enter the debate, even though it is earlier than I, in my naivety, had expected.

[Mr. Malcolm Wicks]

We are discussing not only the recent work of the Select Committee but supplementary estimates. Indeed, we are formally asked to approve an extra £19 million to the cash limit for the running costs of the Department of Social Security. Often, the House takes scrutiny of public spending too lightly, but it should be no light matter that we are asked to approve a further £19 million. As, according to my arithmetic, much of the money is for the running costs of the Child Support Agency, I shall focus later on the work of the CSA. I hope that the Minister will be encouraged to update us on its work and present a progress report, because we need progress on the implementation of child support.

I am a recently retired member of the Social Security Committee. It is appropriate that its esteemed Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), opened the debate. It was a privilege to serve on it under his chairmanship for one parliamentary Session. I welcome the opportunity that I had to work with him and, indeed, Conservative colleagues. I had the honour of contributing in a small way to the report that we are discussing today.

We should put the supplementary estimate in the context of the increase in public expenditure on social security. In 1989-90, we spent some £50 billion on social security. That figure is now £90 billion in cash terms, which is a considerable increase. It is easily the largest of our public expenditure programmes. Indeed, it represents a staggering one third of total public expenditure.

Mr. Frank Field: Before my hon. Friend leaves this point, I hope that he will find time to talk about the change in the nature of poverty. Whereas we talked of it primarily in economic terms and causes, we now—as I think my hon. Friend is hinting at—talk of it as being much more socially based.

Mr. Wicks: Indeed. The Chairman of my former Committee anticipates some of my remarks and hits on a very important point about family insecurity. I shall say something about that, but we should dwell on the sheer size of the social security budget, which now represents one third of total public spending. Although it would be rash, I suspect, to argue the possibility of bringing that total down, I feel instinctively that it is consuming too large a proportion of public spending and, given the other demands on the welfare state and the Government, we should look critically at it.

I ask the House to distinguish between the term social security—not in the sense of rather dry terminology for a set of benefits—and state benefits. I put it to the House that what makes social security, in the proper usage of that term, is not just state benefits. Many other factors contribute to social security. Indeed, many of the other factors are often more important than the contribution to security that comes from state benefits. I also argue that, on state benefits, we need to be vigorous and rigorous about defining objectives and to look critically at the public expenditure total to see to what extent some public spending relates directly to the objectives and to true social security, and to what extent public spending is perhaps more a symptom of social insecurity and of the fact that other parts of society, the economy and public policy are not working as well as they should. I shall give one example.

I do not think that any of the great figures who have set out social security objectives have ever said that it is an objective of social security policy to enable men in their 50s or early 60s to draw benefits—whether invalidity benefits or income support—as a stop-gap measure between an early period of unemployment or redundancy and when they are able to draw their state retirement pension, yet the data on economic inactivity, or what is essentially unemployment, show that a large proportion of men who are not so old are economically inactive. They are out of the labour market.

I sometimes think that the House has a strange custom of discussing the retirement age, not least in relation to European directives towards gender equality and whether to equalise at 65, 60 or 63. We have had that debate. It is all based on an assumption that men retire at 65. Some do. Some of us may hope to retire later.

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North-East): The hon. Gentleman is being optimistic.

Mr. Wicks: The hon. Gentleman—my pair—is worried about my employment security. I can tell him that I am rather more confident about it at the moment than he has any right to be about his.

Men aged 55 to 59 can hardly be considered old. One would expect some 90 per cent. of them to be in employment, but the reality is that one in three is out of work. In the slightly older group—those aged 60 to 64, who are in the period just before retirement—just over four out of 10 are in work. The amount of economic inactivity among middle-aged to older men is massive. That was never meant to be. William Beveridge, Labour Governments and Conservative Governments never said that we should support that group, through social security, income support or invalidity benefits of one kind or another to be on benefit and not in work, but it has come to be.

I was following the remarks of the hon. Member for Rotherham—

Mr. Field: Rochdale.

Mr. Wicks: It was certainly somewhere beginning with an R. I apologise to the hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) and the good people of—

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): Rotherham.

Ms Lynne: Rochdale.

Mr. Wicks: My ungallant Friend said Rotherham, but, being more gallant, I meant Rochdale. The hon. Lady argued that we should be able to afford that sum of money. I am inclined to agree with her at one level, but only if we are convinced that we are spending it properly. I am not convinced that we are doing so at present. Let us have a debate about social security objectives and ensure that public money is spent appropriately on them.

Mr. Field: Before my hon. Friend develops that theme, may I take him back one step? He rightly emphasises that many people now feel insecure and that social security payments support that insecurity. Is it not also true that a large number of men are inactive in the age group to which he refers because they have been able to draw down their occupational pension early, so we now get the success of the company pension scheme impacting on the social security budget?

In my area—some distance from Croydon, but not that far from Rochdale—two former public utilities are merging and there will be large-scale lay-offs. We are also affected by the Mobil-BP merger, which will result in lay-offs. Does my hon. Friend think that we ought to consider whether it is necessary to issue social security impact statements when firms propose merging and, to use the euphemistic expression, downsizing their labour forces? Much of the cost of the two mergers in my area will be borne by taxpayers in general, who will have to pick up the social security costs of people who would otherwise be in work but will become unemployed, and soon unemployable, as a result of those changes.

Mr. Wicks: That is an interesting observation and recommendation, to which we shall certainly want to give more thought. If it seems to be a good idea, given that the Department of Social Security plans so radically to cut its running costs and, presumably, its labour force, perhaps it should make the first social security impact statement. The Minister might want to announce that later if he intends to proceed along those lines.

Given the importance of spending our social security money effectively, the theme of fraud, which my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead introduced, is obviously important. I shall not add to his remarks, but we agree with the emphasis he put on the need to combat fraud. We welcome the recent increased determination of the Government, but we would want to go rather further. It would be worth calculating at some stage how much money has been squandered these past 16 years because the Government have made only lame attempts to combat fraud. It must become a key social security objective to ensure the promotion of the honest social security pound; to ensure that every pound of taxpayers' money is spent as honestly as possible.

In my advice surgery in Croydon, North-West, when I sometimes have to explain to people who are hard pressed that they will not receive more benefit, despite their old age or disability, it makes me furious to think that we are being defrauded of hundreds of thousands, millions or perhaps billions of pounds that could be used for people in genuine need. It is a very human matter.

We need to distinguish between the public policies that would make for social security and the role within them of state benefits. My theme is that the two are rather different. They are not necessarily the same. We need to use the phrase "social security" in the proper sense in the English language. What makes for social security in that wider sense? I suppose that most fundamental is the economy and employment, and enabling more of our citizens to find a secure place in the job market. That is obvious. It was well understood by William Beveridge, but we need a renewed determination to enable more of our citizens to get into employment.

Therefore, Opposition Members were in despair when we heard the proposals of the Deputy Prime Minister to deregulate the employment market for those in small businesses. If there was one thing that we did not need at this precise time, it was a suggestion that a Deputy Prime Minister could be seriously contemplating making more of our citizens economically insecure and therefore insecure about their social life, their housing and the rest of it. This is precisely the time when enhancing and developing security should be one of the major and first responsibilities of government.

If economic security and employment security are important, we need to work hard at changing our social security system. I remember very well one particular constituent who came to my advice surgery in Thornton Heath about a housing problem. We talked more generally about her situation. She was on income support. She was drawing housing benefit. In some respects, she was totally dependent on the state. She was a prime example of the state of dependency that has been created these past 15 or so years, a state that we have to change in the coming five years.

When I asked my constituent how she saw her future, her eyes started to shine and she said, "I want a job." I asked her what she wanted to do. She wanted to be a traffic warden. Not only did she have determination, but she was brave, given the circumstances of Croydon traffic, and had an ambition which should have been fostered. I asked whether she ever talked of her ambition when she went to the DSS office and talked to various officials. She said that no one had ever asked her if she wanted a job. No one had ever sat down with her to talk about her ambition and how it might be realised.

Under the current social security regime, a lone mother is entitled to draw income support until her youngest child is 16. We have to start to change the culture. I am talking not about compulsion but about sensitivity. I am talking about a social security office where, in liaison with an employment office, someone would sit down with that young woman and say, "This is great news. You have a good ambition. We are going to help you. We are going to talk about your training and building any confidence that you might need,"—although this young woman did not need confidence; she had plenty of it—"We are going to talk about child care implications and the jobs that are available. We will certainly fix you up with the traffic warden people, but we will talk to other people. We can take some months on this." Was that happening? No, it was not.

The future social security system has to be in the business of helping young women such as my constituent who have no ambition to remain dependent or to draw social security for ever, but have an ambition to be independent. How we move from dependency to independence is the key theme of social security policy in the late 1990s.

I have talked about employment security. Let me also talk about family security and insecurity—the theme that my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead tempted me to discuss and one that I want to discuss. Family security is as important as economic security in enabling us to live our lives in a satisfactory way, not only in terms of cash, although that it important, but more generally. Family breakdown and related family change are now a major cause of poverty, disadvantage and new forms of inequality that are opening up in our society. If we need evidence of that, it comes in part from the Select Committee report on low income statistics that was published in February 1995. The report includes a table that shows that family breakdown and the rise of the lone-parent family is probably a more important cause of poverty and disadvantage than are the traditional causes of unemployment and low wages.

Data for 1992 show that 3.6 million—almost 3.7 million—children in Great Britain are dependent on income support or in families that have net resources below the income support level because of low wages. That is a shocking indicator of child poverty in a supposedly affluent society. Of those children, 1.8 million are in lone-parent families. Unemployment contributes a huge 1 million children, but the number of children in lone-parent families is much greater. William Beveridge would not have recognised that phenomenon. In 1942, when he and Parliament examined the causes of social insecurity that needed to be tackled by social insurance and the national assistance scheme, that factor was not uppermost in their minds. We need to work hard at addressing that considerable problem.

I want to consider how the power and pace of family change contribute to social insecurity and new forms of child poverty. First, more children are born out of wedlock. I make no moral judgments on that—it is not the subject of the debate—but the statistics relate to our theme of child poverty and social insecurity. Back in 1960, only 5 per cent. of children were born out of wedlock. Today, the proportion is a massive 32 per cent. Nearly one in three children are born outside marriage. Half of them are born to cohabiting couples; the other half to single unmarried mothers. We know that 85 per cent. of single unmarried mothers draw income support. It is a demographic trend of direct relevance to the estimates and public spending.

While cohabitation comes in all shapes and sizes and can include some of the most well-to-do and affluent couples, there is a general association between cohabitation and disadvantage. Although demographers are not clear about it, my reading of the research suggests that cohabiting parents are more likely to suffer a breakdown of their relationship than are married couple parents. That is a contributory factor to insecurity. I have mentioned the change since 1960, but over the past decade alone, the number of children born outside marriage has almost doubled. That is a rapid change with major consequences for our debates on social security and social insecurity.

There is also the question of divorce, which is exercising our minds and those of modern Governments more and more. It is no coincidence that the House will soon receive a Bill on divorce law reform from the other place. The key question is how to obtain a modern divorce law that puts children first. Pension splitting and the social security implications of divorce are related themes. The Child Support Agency is another consequence of divorce and has become a powerful theme. The bad news is that it will become even more important in the future.

I recently asked a parliamentary question to update some data with which I had been familiar when I worked at the Family Policy Studies Centre. I asked Government statisticians, who are the best in the country for such forecasting, what percentage of marriages are likely to end in divorce. The answer was 41 per cent.—more than four out of 10. That forecast is not wild, but a sober estimate by sensible demographers and scientists. The issues surrounding that, which relate to child maintenance, are crucial to our social security. I shall come to them later. If we do not get that right, we are in deep trouble in respect of insecurities among families and of state spending on benefits.

Every year, there are 160,000 children under 16 in Great Britain whose parents divorce. It is interesting that the children involved are becoming younger. Divorces occur more quickly than they did 10 or 15 years ago. The figures for 1993 for England and Wales show that there were 55,000 children under five who had mums and dads who divorced—25 per cent. more than in 1983. Not only are many children affected by the phenomenon but they are wearing an even younger face than they used to. More children spend some or all of their childhoods in one-parent families.

The picture is further complicated by remarriage and, to use a slightly ugly expression, repartnering. The Minister winces because he is a sensitive man. I use the word because cohabitation is more common after the break-up of first marriages than as a substitute for first marriages. We have to invent a term for that. One in three marriages this weekend will involve someone marrying for the second time.

The phenomenon of the step-family, which is well known in literature and fairy tales, is becoming more important. It is estimated that 1 million or more children under 16 live in step-families. Of them, 770,000—the majority—are stepchildren but 280,000 are children of new relationships. Any attempt by society through state and government to consider the social policy implications of those trends, not least in relation to child maintenance, deals with complex territory. The complexity of the child support formula needs to be addressed. There is a legitimate debate about whether it should be yet more complex—more sensitive to particular circumstances—or whether we should have a simpler formula and rougher justice. I believe that the Select Committee will consider that issue in this Session.

The complexity is caused by the family circumstances and human relationships becoming more complex. Politicians, the Government and Parliament have been slow to address those issues because they feel uncomfortable about tackling some of the most difficult, complex and sensitive matters in society. The politician treads into the blood and thunder of human relationships and their breakdown at his or her peril. Even the best imaginable system, which I am bound to say we do not have at the moment, will run into difficulties because of that. That is relevant because the Government are asking us to approve supplementary estimates that include another £16 million for the running of the Child Support Agency.

Mr. Tim Smith: The hon. Gentleman has given us an interesting description of recent social trends and many of the aspects that he describes are deeply worrying. Is he suggesting that the social security system has been the cause of those trends? I wonder what he thinks we should do about them, if anything. How should the social security system respond to them? He said that we are spending too much on social security, so what changes do we need to make?

Mr. Wicks: I shall deal with the Child Support Agency and how we can create more effectiveness and fairness later. In direct response to the hon. Gentleman's thoughtful question, however, I do not believe that our social security arrangements contribute to family breakdown, although I recognise that there is an interesting debate to be had on that point.

At the moment, we seem to spend an awful lot of energy, time, legislation and public money on the consequences of family breakdown. The House of Commons Library gave me some figures, which show that the public costs of divorce are about £4 billion every year. Most of that is made up of social security—income support and so forth—but some is legal aid and the impact on the health service. How much money are we spending trying to save marriages and support family relationships? We spend money on Relate and other marriage guidance services.

I want a shift of emphasis towards trying to support and help relationships in trouble, rather than spending all our energy and public resources on breakdown when it occurs. As a long-standing advocate of a family policy strategy, I would certainly say that we have not got the balance right.

I am arguing that the social revolution of family change that we are in the midst of has not been without victims. It has not been a bloodless revolution—there are very few such revolutions. Victims come in all shapes and sizes and, of course, include many men, not least those who find that they are unable to continue a relationship with their children.

In financial terms, the main victims have always been, and remain, the women and children. It has been a case of women and children last in that aspect of family politics. We see that in the poverty statistics and in the fact that, in the main—of course, there are exceptions—it is women and children who have to depend on the state and on income support. One million one-parent families are drawing income support.

Whatever our criticism of the operation of the CSA—being a passionate believer in the principle of parental responsibility, I am among the foremost critics of the workings of that agency in practice—we must remember that the old system simply did not work. Anyone who advocates turning back the clock to a court-based system has to confront the data and the evidence that show that it was a failure. It delivered maintenance to only about one third of children.

Ms Lynne: I agree that the old system of the liable relatives unit, in particular, was a failure. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, in terms of cost, there is not much to choose between the CSA and the old system? Some figures that I have obtained even suggest that the old liable relatives unit was far most cost-effective in saving the taxpayer money. Although I would not want a return to that unit—I would like a unified family court system, in which every case was assessed individually—I want us to get away from the formula system.

Mr. Wicks: I understand the hon. Lady's argument, but I do not support it. We cannot return to that sort of court system, although I know that the hon. Lady denies it. We need to think hard about ways of bringing greater sensitivity and justice into the system. I shall deal with that briefly later, if there is time.

It is a pity that we do not know more about the workings of the old maintenance system. I do not think that it was researched thoroughly and I have never seen a proper report on it. Our public debates on its pros and cons would be advanced if we had more information.

I have already hinted at the argument that, given the complexity of human and family relationships, developing an effective child support or maintenance policy was always going to be difficult. Although those of us who had the opportunity to study the Australian and New Zealand systems of child support recently were impressed by aspects of those systems—certainly by the Australian system—even in those societies the systems have been immensely controversial and the subject of the majority of contributions to parliamentarians' postbags, as in this country.

I do not think that I say this merely with the benefit of hindsight—the case was argued at the time—but the Child Support Agency should have been introduced in a far more sensitive way. Ideally—in the politics of Thatcherism it was never going to happen—the emphasis should have been placed on child support as social policy, not on the mean-minded morality that it quickly became when it was introduced by the former Prime Minister, then Mrs. Thatcher. After all, it is called child support; it should have been genuine child support. I am becoming increasingly concerned about the matter because, in a sense, we have missed an historic opportunity for a proper public debate about child support and the obligations of parents to their children.

I can think of two questions that should have been central to that debate—there are probably others. First, how, in the great majority of cases, do we enable both parents to share in the care and maintenance of their children in turbulent family times? There will always be exceptions when men are violent and so forth.

I have reviewed briefly some of the demographics, but my argument is that, sadly, turbulent family times will not go away in the next 10 years. If—this may now be true—only about 50 per cent. of children will spend all their childhood in what we once would have called the traditional family and are born to parents who are married to one another and stay married until the children become adult, these issues do not merely concern a minority of our people and our children, but are central. Despite divorce and the phenomenon of children being born outside wedlock, how do we enable both parents to share in the care and maintenance of their children? That is a central question. Hon. Members will notice that I said care and maintenance. It is about not merely money and cash, but parental responsibility in a wider sense.

Secondly, how do we avoid the trends becoming forces for child poverty and disadvantage? Instead of having that sensible debate, we had Thatcherite mean-mindedness posing as morality. It was led by the then Prime Minister. I well remember her speech to the National Children's Home. That speech and her emphasis on parental responsibility, which she tackled in her own particular way, was as much a surprise to Social Security Ministers as to the rest of us. They did not see the policy coming—they saw it as a hand grenade rolling towards them, with the pin half pulled out. The Treasury then seized the opportunity—it saw the policy as a major way of raising revenue—and thwarted the Department of Social Security when, I suspect, it was arguing that there should be a disregard, as we call it in technical language, to enable mothers on income support at least to get some child support so that their net incomes and the welfare of their children could be enhanced.

The combination of the then Prime Minister's policy and the Treasury seizing the opportunity led to the bad start to child maintenance from which we have not recovered thus far, and from which it will be difficult to recover. I refer to the quite extraordinary catastrophe that the Child Support Agency quickly became. It takes months to make assessments, it has a huge error rate and it is insensitive to those who are trying to communicate with it. I do not have the opportunity today to discuss the Child Support Agency in great detail, but it is appropriate—not least because £16 million of the supplementary estimate that we are being asked to approve today is for running the Child Support Agency—to ask some questions of the Under-Secretary of State.

Will the Minister give hon. Members an up-to-date report on, and the accuracy of, the time taken to undertake the assessments and enforcement within the agency? I believe that such an update would be most helpful. Will the Minister also tell hon. Members how much child support is now being collected and the projections for the coming financial year? In addition, how much of that money will go to the Exchequer and how much of it will go to the parent with care—normally, but not always, the mother?

Does the Minister have anything to say about improving, or developing the human face of, the Child Support Agency, given its reputation for insensitivity? Are there ways in which the people dealing with the agency—whether they are the mothers, usually the parents with care, or the fathers, the so-called absent parents—can be made to feel that someone at the end of the telephone line understands their case and can discuss it with them in a human way?

Many hon. Members are interested in and impressed by the so-called CAST system being pioneered at the Hastings centre. Some months ago, I had the opportunity to visit the centre and I talked to the staff about the system. It is an attempt to deal with people in the round. It would be useful to know how it is progressing. Does the Minister have any plans to expand the system across the country?

Traditionally, complaints about the workings of the Child Support Agency have come from men—the so-called absent parents. I have received many letters about the way in which many men, quite understandably, feel resentful about being called "absent parents". We are still grappling with the terminology on this issue. Given that being a parent is not just about paying maintenance, but is about providing care to children—as so many fathers do in difficult family circumstances—we need better terminology. The term "absent parent" is an insult.

Mr. Frank Field: Will my father—will my hon. Friend give way? The Select Committee on Social Security has suggested that we use the word "father".

Mr. Wicks: I am glad that my hon. Friend confirmed that I am not his father—if I were, I would struggle to pay maintenance on him. As nine out of 10 parents with care are mothers—and, therefore, nine out of 10 absent parents are fathers—we could often use the term "father". However, we must allow for the reverse situation.

Ms Lynne: I suggest that the term "liable parent" could be used instead of the terms "absent parent" or "father". Some liable parents—only a few—are mothers.

Mr. Wicks: I take that important point.

Many of the fathers who write to me or to other hon. Members about grievances to do with child support are often doing their best to pay the child maintenance. However, they find that, when there is a change in their circumstances—for example, a postman may have a higher rate of pay over Christmas but then wants to tell the Child Support Agency that his wages have decreased—it is enormously difficult to communicate with the agency. For example, they can never find one person at the end of the telephone line who will take their point, put it into the system and report back to them in a decent way to say that their assessment has been varied.

We all have the right to expect that kind of obvious sensitivity when we are dealing with a bank or with a building society—I am not saying that we always get it from those institutions—and we want to bring it into the workings of the Child Support Agency. Many men feel aggrieved—and justifiably so—and we need to allow for that in any reforms of the agency.

Many mothers—the parents with care—also have grievances about the way in which the Child Support Agency has not delivered. I shall quote a letter—with care as I want to protect the identity of the woman—from a mother who has recently come to see me at the House of Commons about her situation. She is a young mother with a son, and she was on income support at one stage and contacted the Child Support Agency. She has since found a full-time job in London at a reasonable, but not generous, level of pay. She lives in the home counties. For the past two or three years she has been trying to get the Child Support Agency to find the father of her child so that he will contribute some maintenance. In many ways, she illustrates the kind of benefit-to-work strategy of which we are all in favour. She has a tough life. Her letter states:

"As a working mother, my day starts at 7.40 am when I leave for work; I don't get home until 7.30, when I collect my son from the childminder's. I then return home and have to do all the household chores. This is not a situation I deliberately created—I was forced to leave my son's father because he is a very violent man and I feared for our safety. I even had to have a non-molestation order served against him."

She has told me that she has not received any maintenance payments from the man since she left him. She also told me that this man has four other children, by two other relationships, and that he pays maintenance towards none of the children—a fact that he openly laughs about.

I shall not go into too much detail about the mother and her situation, except to say that, for two or three years, she has been trying to get the Child Support Agency to act. She told me in our meeting that she thought that the Child Support Agency was there to help her and her son, and that she cannot understand why it has not delivered. I was appalled when I looked at some of the correspondence on this issue between the Child Support Agency and another hon. Member. That woman knew where the man was, knew that he was in employment and believed that he earned about £400 a week. She gave the Child Support Agency the man's address and the agency wrote to the address. The man or his new girlfriend scribbled on the back of the envelope, "Not known at this address" and the Child Support Agency told the woman, "I am sorry; he is not known at that address." If that is the sophistication of the Child Support Agency, we are in deep trouble.

The woman rang up the Child Support Agency one day to say, "I can tell you that he is in employment, because I have heard that he is." The agency staff said, "We shall try to trace the employer," but later told her, "I am sorry; we cannot trace the employer." The woman said, "Hold on a moment, I shall call you back." She made a few telephone calls and found out where the man was working—on a highway, doing construction work. She told the Child Support Agency all about it, but still there was no action.

That story lasted several years. Eventually, the Child Support Agency managed to track down the man and produced an interim maintenance assessment, but made a procedural mistake and had to withdraw it. Two or three years later, the man has paid no maintenance towards that little boy or any of his four other children.

When the woman first approached the agency, she was told by the man from the agency on the telephone, "It will be difficult; he is self-employed. If I were you, I wouldn't bother." The Child Support Act 1991, passed by Parliament with much support on both sides of the House, is not delivering to that woman and her child.

Generalisations are unfair; I know that the agency has tracked down some such men, but suspicion remains that the agency regards as a soft touch men in secure employment in a major private company or in the public sector—teachers, police officers and so on—and pursues them to obtain more money from them, but that many men in difficult cases continue to get away with it. Some fathers are laughing at Parliament, at the agency and at the mothers and their children, saying, "I won't pay anything. I would rather go to prison than pay anything. They will never catch me," and continue to get away with it. That is not what Parliament intended. It has brought the Child Support Agency into grave disrepute because people do not regard it as effective social policy or effective child support.

As part of Labour's general review of social security, we have been reconsidering the operation of the child support system. We reaffirm easily and clearly our principled support for the important principle of parental responsibility, but we are angry and worried that that decent principle—indeed, a guiding principle in the turbulent family times in which we find ourselves—is brought into disrepute by the continuing thoroughly bad practice of the Child Support Agency.

We reaffirm our commitment to the principle of introducing a disregard so that mothers who are on income support, every penny of whose child maintenance is currently taken away from their income support, obtain some net income and net benefit from it. We are not in a position to say when the disregard might be introduced or the amount because, obviously, that depends on total commitments and other spending priorities, but we reaffirm that important principle. If the public and some fathers—some of the so-called "absent parents"—could be sure that a certain fraction of their child maintenance went directly into the pockets of mothers and benefited their own children, we would start to turn the position around and bring what is at the moment a mean-minded piece of policy into the true province of social policy. That is the challenge.

In considering in more detail the workings of the Child Support Agency, Opposition Members have two major objectives—fairness and efficiency.

A disregard would be an important step forward in fairness. People would regard that as fair to the taxpayer, because the taxpayer would continue to benefit from most of the extra revenue coming in. We have no quarrel with that; the taxpayer has a major interest. The taxpayer is not an anonymous person but often a mother or father, struggling to bring up children and resenting having to contribute too much to other people's children. We acknowledge that the taxpayer has a legitimate interest, but we need to strike a fairer balance between the interests of taxpayers and the interests of mothers and their children. We shall strike that balance.

We need to review the operations of the Child Support Agency to seek a way to introduce a greater sense of independence and fairness into the system. At the moment, people feel that they are dealing with a monolithic agency—a grey, bureaucratic agency—that can never deal with them in the round. It would be a step in the right direction to find a way to allow people who feel a sense of grievance that they are not being treated properly or whose family position is so complex that they do not believe that the formula can deal with them properly, an independent review or adjudication. We are investigating that in detail.

Greater efficiency is needed. It is nonsensical that it takes months to process assessments and that, in the case that I described of the young mother struggling to do her best for her child, the system is so ineffective that, despite being given all the clues, all the details and all the addresses by that woman, the agency cannot yet find that man and make him pay maintenance. We need greater effectiveness.

Yes, we support the principle of parental responsibility—I could not have made that clearer—but we need to consider the workings of the agency, so that we shall be able to say one day that it is as effective as possible and fairer than it ever has been.

The major challenge for the House in turbulent family times is to ensure that parental responsibility works, because all our children deserve to be brought up, wherever possible, by both their parents. We need care and responsibility. Saving the decent principle of parental responsibility from bad practice is a key challenge for future social policy.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Andrew Mitchell): This afternoon, we have listened to four very interesting speeches by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and by Opposition Members. This has been a shortish debate, which may reflect the fact that, in the past three weeks, we have had three major debates on social security. Opposition Members—and indeed Conservative Members—may be suffering from social security fatigue.

Coming relatively fresh to estimates debates, I am struck by how much has changed in the way in which these matters are discussed in the three years since my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State delivered his Mais lecture. A copy of the lecture is indispensable to any discussion of social security in much the same way as the thoughts and writings of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who opened today's debate, whose speeches are also indispensable to any junior Minister trying to work his way through the maze of social security.

Three years ago, politicians tended to boast about the increase in welfare spending. I remember that a leading Labour academic wrote a paper called "The Future of Welfare: A Guide to the Debate", in which he advocated that an extra 5 per cent. of gross domestic product on social security spending would do the trick.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks) made kind remarks about Government statisticians, which I shall pass on, and said that he wanted to consider appropriate objectives for social security. Conservative Members have little doubt what the appropriate objectives are. In recent years there has been a reduction in the underlying growth in social security, not only because it is a burden to the taxpayer, but because of the growth in the dependency culture, which is wrong. Many of those changes were enshrined in last year's heavy social security legislative programme. We are now enabling the country to meet genuine need without outstripping the country's ability to pay.

I fear that we remain in considerable doubt about the Labour party's views; it is not at all clear where it is heading. All will be revealed on 8 May when the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West and his hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench announce the result of their six-month review—they have been instructed by their leader to think the unthinkable. We are all waiting with bated breath to hear what emerges from that important process.

If we consider the international comparisons overseas, we see just how far ahead of the field the Government are on the issue of social security. In Germany, there is widespread discussion of the problem of non-wage labour costs and the burdens that they impose on an economy that is struggling to reach the Maastricht criteria. Unemployment in Germany is higher than at any time since the last war, and reached 4.3 million in February.

The position in France is no less severe. France is also suffering high social costs, as we know from the vivid media reports of the recent unrest in Paris and other big cities. In the face of widespread strikes by public sector workers in November, Jacques Barrot, the Social Affairs Minster, said: "There is no alternative" to welfare reform. The strikers were protesting against the social security reforms announced by the Prime Minister.

In a television interview in October, President Chirac called on France to follow the "courageous example of the UK"

in reducing public expenditure. He spoke of the urgent need to reduce the public deficit, especially that of the social security budget. He said that France had lived beyond its means for too long. But in the face of continued strikes and protests, the French Government have had to backtrack on some of their planned reforms: they have given way over public sector pensions and postponed the proposed taxation of family benefits.

I gave those international comparisons as they show not only the extent to which the Labour party is still wallowing about and trying to work out where to go, but how far ahead of the international game the British Government are in tackling those difficult problems.

Mr. Tim Smith: My hon. Friend is right: there is no doubt that the United Kingdom Government are far ahead of the game in dealing with the burgeoning cost of social security spending. Does he agree that it is striking that the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks) said that he wanted to cut the total amount of social security spending—he said that it was too high at one third of the total—but every time that the Secretary of State makes relatively minor reductions in spending, the Labour party opposes them?

Mr. Mitchell: My hon. Friend is right, which is why he must make a note in his diary for 8 May, the date on which the Opposition will advise the House of their programmes and plans after their six-month review. I see from what my hon. Friend said that he is looking forward to that day as much as I am.

Mr. Wicks: The Government—faced with rocketing social security spending because of the economic recession and a lack of decent social policy—have made benefit claimants suffer by cutting and withdrawing their benefits. But the proper strategy, which new Labour will adopt, is to get people off benefit; there are simply too many people on income support. We shall have a proper benefit-to-work strategy that will get people off benefit. The difference between the Conservatives and the Labour party is that, under the last Labour Government, there were not so many people on income support or supplementary benefit.

Mr. Mitchell: The hon. Gentleman will have to do better than that if he is to convince the House on 8 May that his party has a serious social security strategy, and I look forward to what he has to say on that day.

In his important contribution, my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield talked about the work of the agencies and the success that they have achieved. He mentioned the fact that the work of the Department and its agencies is tagged, in an attachment to the Select Committee's report, on today's Order Paper. The report confirms the agencies' success and the improvements that they have brought about.

The agencies' benefits include improved clarification of roles and responsibilities in framework documents, and greater public accountability through the publication of business plans and annual reports and accounts. Responsibility for decision making is devolved to the lowest suitable level closest to the point of delivery, allowing real improvements in customer service and efficiency to be made.

The improvements derived from agency status can also easily be seen by the agencies' customers in the service that they now receive. Better customer service has been achieved because the agencies have allowed improvements in management through greater coherence in control and planning, and through service-level agreements that protect the services that customers can expect to receive. As agencies focus on specific areas of business, it has also been possible to consider ways of achieving further efficiencies, and each agency is required to identify and deliver a challenging efficiency programme each year.

The agencies are a success—that is easily demonstrated by a range of published figures. But there is still room for further improvements in efficiency, which is why my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has announced the Department's change programme. Under that programme, a key step in our long-term review of social security, we are taking a fundamental look at what we deliver and how we deliver it over the next three years.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Ms Lynne) asked me to comment on a leak in The Guardian. I do not normally comment on leaks of material, but the article refers to an early document relating to the Department's running costs review, and no decisions have been taken on the subjects mentioned.

The elimination of fraud—which was comprehensively covered in last week's debate and by the hon. Member for Birkenhead today—is not an afterthought. Reducing administrative costs will not be done at the expense of safeguarding benefit money. Our objective is to deliver the right money to the right people at the right time, whereas fraud involves money going to the wrong person. The extra funds secured for the security programme are ring-fenced for use on specific security and control activity, and cannot be diverted. We are committed to reducing the level of fraud by 70 per cent. over the security strategy period and the target will be unaffected by proposals in the change programme.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North-West spoke about the dangers and disasters of family breakdown. He spoke about security, particularly job security. I am sure that he would want to pay credit to the Government's in-work programme and their family credit programme, which make an important contribution at one level to the points that he raised. But at another level the hon. Gentleman spoke of the vital necessity of the Child Support Agency. I want to address a number of points that he raised on that subject.

I have today laid regulations before the House that pave the way for the trial of an important change in the way that child support liability is calculated. The new provisions will introduce an element of discretion that will allow the Child Support Agency to take account of certain special expenses and other commitments that the standard assessment formula is unable to accommodate.

The new provisions will deal with a number of specific issues. At present, the calculation of liability is governed by the assessment formula. That formula is necessarily detailed as it attempts to deal with the wide variety of circumstances that may be present in any particular case. However, despite the formula's detailed nature, it is impossible for such a system to meet every eventuality.

The new provisions will introduce the flexibility required to allow greater recognition of special expenses and other commitments that are not covered by the formula. It will also enable the agency to crack down on absent parents, principally fathers, who seek to reduce their child support liabilities by diverting income elsewhere.

It will be possible for a parent to apply for a departure direction under three broad categories: where there is a special expense; where there has been a property or capital transfer—a so-called clean-break case; or in other specified circumstances. We shall pilot the measure in the south-east of England, where it will be based on the Hastings Child Support Agency centre. Subject to evaluation and the pilot scheme's success, I hope to introduce it throughout the nation in December of this year.

These changes to the policy go hand in hand with a determined drive to improve the efficiency of the Child Support Agency—the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West spoke of the importance of doing so. The signs of recovery are now there for all to see and the agency's performance is improving in all areas of its work. While improvements may not have been dramatic, they have been steady and continuous. That is not to say that I am satisfied with the present state of affairs; there is certainly no room for complacency. We are constantly looking for ways in which to improve administration and streamline procedures in order to boost performance. Indeed, I expect to lay further regulations before the House in June. They will introduce more administrative improvements—for example, simplifying the way in which housing costs are calculated, and streamlining the procedures relating to reduced benefit directions. As many hon. Members will know, the calculation of housing costs has been lengthy, administratively complex and prone to inaccuracy; some simple changes should lead to worthwhile improvement.

Sir Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): My hon. Friend may say that I have only just entered the Chamber. Thanks to the wonders of information technology, however, I have been watching both him and the hon. Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks)—who made a thoughtful speech—on the box in my office.

Will the housing costs to which my hon. Friend referred include mortgage costs? We hear endless stories of one partner claiming that the mortgage is now higher, while the other—the former spouse—retorts that the aim in taking out such a large mortgage is merely to twist him or her, and diddle the children.

Mr. Mitchell: The point made by my hon. Friend—with which I am very familiar, as he has brought two of his constituents to discuss it with me—is dealt with in the departures that I mentioned a moment ago, which we are piloting from today.

Achieving major improvements in a large organisation that is performing a complicated task in difficult circumstances is not easy; but, although I realise that improvements will take time, no one should doubt my determination to ensure that the CSA achieves the standards that its customers have the right to expect. We are setting challenging targets for further progress, and I am determined to ensure that they are met.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North-West asked about a number of those challenges. First, he asked about accuracy. That has improved significantly. Accuracy within 1p—that is the way in which we measure it—was set a 75 per cent. target this year; in the last month, 77 per cent. was achieved. A target of 85 per cent. will be set for next year. As the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead will realise, that is a significant improvement in comparison with accuracy in regard to income support.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North-West also asked about collections. The agency hopes to reach its target for the current financial year of £300 million collected and arranged—a steep increase on last year's figure—and will set a target of between £380 million and £400 million for next year. Substantial progress has already been made, and I expect more to be made next year.

The hon. Gentleman spoke of the public face of the CSA. Far more emphasis has been placed on the training of staff, to ensure that they respond to a number of criticisms made by clients. In particular, the hon. Gentleman mentioned the CAST system. Following a change in CSA policy, clients who used to negotiate with people who specialised in only one function will be able to deal with a "table" of people who are fully conversant with all aspects of their case.

The hon. Gentleman paid tribute to the system that is now up and running in Hastings. Over the next year, it will spread to all six child support assessment centres. He also spoke of the importance of seeing a friendly face. The fact that assessments are now increasingly dealt with in the field rather than at one of the six centres will help tremendously in achieving that.

These changes, along with the continuing improvements in the administration of the scheme, will speed the process of public acceptance of the principles behind the Child Support Act 1991. The changes introduced by the regulations are part of the process of civilising the scheme that we began last year. We have already ensured that maintenance should not exceed 30 per cent. of an absent parent's income, and the new arrangements will give us the flexibility that we need to provide further help for parents on whom the formula bears hardest.

A point was made about the description "absent parent" or "parent with care": I await a letter promised to me by the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey), who wishes to advance specific ideas of behalf of the Select Committee. We shall give serious consideration to what she says.

In a most interesting speech, the hon. Member for Birkenhead took us to task for the extent to which we have borne down on fraud. I am sorry if I am misquoting him; I think that he wanted to ensure that our work in countering fraudulent activity was up to the mark. We pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman, who is almost alone among Opposition Members in taking a serious interest in the subject, and we shall take careful note of what he said.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned landlord fraud. Let me point out that about a third of rents are reduced—in respect of the eligibility rent level—as a result of examination. We are opposed to all fraud. I suspect that landlord fraud is impossible without a real or imagined claimant, but we take the hon. Gentleman's points seriously, and will examine them all in detail.

I believe that today's debate and, indeed, our last two major debates on social security show that the Government are succeeding in containing the growth of social security spending, while ensuring that we have a system that helps those who need it. Long-term control has not, however, been achieved at the expense of the most needy. We shall maintain the value of benefits this year by uprating in line with inflation, at a cost of more than £2.5 billion.

A number of the changes that have been announced will enable people to become more self-reliant—easing the transition from benefit dependency to independence, allowing those people to return to work and encouraging them to stay there. Reforms are making people think about providing for their own future, and encouraging them to join insurance schemes to cater for contingencies such as unemployment, illness and retirement. At the same time, the state will always provide a safety net for those who cannot afford to help themselves.

Social security spending has been declining as a proportion of gross domestic product, a downward trend that is set to continue. We are the envy of our European neighbours in that regard. Controlling growth is important for both the taxpayer and the economy, and, as a result of the reforms, a reduction of £8 billion in expenditure is expected by the end of the century—the equivalent of around 3p on the basic rate of income tax.

It is clear that the whole debate on social security has changed. It is the Government who are defining that debate, and setting the agenda for the future. We wait patiently to hear something coherent and sensible from the Opposition, but so far we have waited in vain.

5.56 pm

Mr. Frank Field: By leave of the House, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall reply to the debate.

Although our debate has been marred by the Trappist vows embraced by—largely—Conservative Members, it has featured some undoubted pleasures. I do not think that this is the first time that the Minister has spoken at the Dispatch Box, but it is the first time that I have faced him, and I hope that he will not take it amiss if I say that his confidence was matched by his enthusiasm: his ministerial career will clearly be limited by the date of the general election rather than by the extent of his ability.

It was a particular pleasure to listen to what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Wicks). I come from a shipbuilding town, where we still talk about launches. My hon. Friend's shadow ministerial career was launched today, and no one who heard his speech will be in any doubt about how fine that liner is.

I want to comment on three aspects of the debate. In an important speech, the Conservative non-Trappist, the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), spoke of one of the gains from agency status—the higher status that it will give individual workers. I hope that that is something to which the Treasury Bench will pay attention.

When I first visited the Child Support Agency building in Birkenhead, I was informed by staff—not the management—that more than half of the new clerical assistants were graduates and that their pay was £6,900 a year. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West spoke about supporting the family. I imagine that it is difficult to support a family successfully if one of the breadwinners, or the only breadwinner, is earning £6,900 a year. We need to think about family wages. Status is not something just to be talked about: it must be reflected in the workplace and in wages. I hope that the agency will bear that in mind.

The Minister showed his skill in talking up the Government's record in cutting down the social security budget. If one did not pay too much attention to what the Government said, one might almost think that they were successful in this respect. If we took ourselves back to 1979 and asked an unsuspecting public whether a Government who were spending what is now being spent on social security, and who had a record of increases such as that which we have witnessed since 1979, were Labour or Tory, they would say that the Government must be Labour because only Labour would spend so much money on social security. This is not the time to argue about how the money has been spent and how it has been skewed towards means testing; I simply want to leave the Minister with one message to take back to the Secretary of State.

We constantly hear from the Treasury Bench about the Government's success in controlling the social security budget. That is nonsense. The Secretary of State for Social Security is a tough Minister, but if we examine every one of the four years of his stewardship of the Department, we find that the Treasury increased the amount that it thought it was going to allow for social security expenditure and that the Secretary of State bust the total. The following year, the Secretary of State again bust the increased level. It has happened in all of the years that he has been Secretary of State for Social Security—the increased budget that was negotiated has been burst by at least £1 billion.

The Secretary of State is controlling the social security budget and bringing it below the increased growth rate of the economy—only if we believe his words, not if we examine his record. If his record this year is like his record for each of the past four years, the social security budget will rise faster than the underlying growth rate of the economy.

Sir Donald Thompson: Would the hon. Gentleman mind if I put that in my election address?

Mr. Field: I should be happy for the hon. Gentleman to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West talked about the need for us to bring the debate up to date. That is similar to the debate raised by Eleanor Rathbone, in the House and elsewhere, on the distribution of income. During the rise of new Liberalism, prior to new Labourism, she said that the emphasis in the debate on the condition of the people was on which social class got what share of the national income. The debate was primarily about which men in which jobs attracted what sort of wages. She said that it was as important, if not more important, to examine the distribution of income between families with children and families without children. The depth charge that she threw into the debate still has to be dealt with.

My hon. Friend picked up on a similar aspect of the debate when he gently reprimanded us for talking about poverty in old-fashioned terms and saying that poverty is primarily determined by economic forces. We approach the subject by asking, "Are we old and therefore out of the labour market? Are we sick or unemployed and therefore out of the labour market?" My hon. Friend drew attention to the fact that, if poverty is measured by eligibility for income support, more children are poor because they live in households with only one parent than are poor because both parents are unemployed or because one parent is unemployed.

In Birkenhead on Saturday there was a "Church action on poverty" hearing. We were invited to listen to people who are poor. The first presentations illustrated exactly what my hon. Friend said about poverty and family break-up, and one of my friends at the meeting—a Liberal councillor—wondered whether we were talking about something new. Everyone became defensive because we were hearing that family break-up was a cause of poverty.

As the debate unfolded in the afternoon, a number of people got to their feet and said that they felt that they were under attack and that we were somehow blaming them for being poor. The debate that my hon. Friend has started today must be approached with enormous sensitivity because we are saying something new which might be misinterpreted but also because people can be hurt by what we say. The responsibility for some of the trends mentioned by my hon. Friend rests with the House, in that the way in which we have spoken has made it easier for people to assume positions that they would not previously have assumed.

In speaking about means testing, I have mentioned people working the system rather than working to get off benefit. I have primarily tried to blame the House for that, not my constituents whose limited opportunities may lead them to work the system.

The same applies to family break-ups. If we pilot through the House divorce reforms that allow people to break the marriage contract after a period only half the length of an average hire purchase agreement, we are sending a powerful message—we think that a HP agreement is more important than a marriage contract. That is not to say that people will not work hard at their marriages; marriages may still fail at the end of the day. I am not pointing the finger, but if we defend HP agreements more strongly than we defend the marriage contract, we are sending a dynamic message to the country. If citizens then respond in a certain way to what we are saying, we should be the last people to reprehend them. We should examine the impact of our actions on the world outside.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West said that we have to get away from blaming poverty on economic causes and must consider more personal reasons such as family break-up, but I hope that we do not fall into the syndrome of blaming victims from the past. We should conduct the debate sensitively along the lines that he followed and look to the future rather than trying to get out of our responsibility for the circumstances that we are now, unhappily, debating.

Despite the Trappist monks who populate the Treasury Bench, this has been an important debate. There have been two good firsts—I was able to hear the Minister speak for the first time and to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West begin his shadow, but soon—no doubt—ministerial, career. We also heard some important suggestions from the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, which I hope the Ministers will note carefully and act on later today when they get back to their desks.

Question deferred, pursuant to paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of Estimates).

Business of the House

6.9 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move,

That, at this day's sitting—

(1) the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motion in the name of Mr. Tony Newton relating to Welsh Business not later than Ten o'clock, and such Questions shall include the Questions on any amendments to the said Motion which she may have selected and which may then be moved; and

(2) Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates) shall apply with the insertion in line 41, after the words 'At Ten o'clock', of the words 'or immediately after the previous business has been disposed of, whichever is the later'.

The motion is intended simply to provide for the tidy organisation of our business tonight and for a substantial opportunity to debate the Standing Orders relating to Wales—more substantial, dare I say, than the time devoted to the debate on the Scottish Grand Committee, but it may be unwise to make that point.

Paragraph (2) of the business motion deals with voting on the estimates, which is intended to take place at the end of tonight's proceedings. I commend the motion to the House.

6.10 pm

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): I welcome the fact that the Government have decided that a debate on the Standing Orders to change the Welsh Grand Committee's workings should continue until 10 o'clock this evening. Had the attitude of certain other Conservative Members been different, such a long debate might not have been necessary and the Leader of the House's comparison with the changes that we made to the Scottish Grand Committee would have been more valid. May I give hon. Members a little background to what has happened on this occasion? It might help the Leader of the House understand why we are in the position where we may debate the Standing Orders for four hours.

The Leader of the House and the Secretary of State for Wales will be aware that Labour Members have long been pressing for changes to the Standing Orders on the Welsh Grand Committee. They have made it clear that the required changes should be meaningful and should properly improve the way in which the Welsh Grand Committee works. They have argued that any such changes should be implemented after discussion and by agreement among all the people involved in the Committee.

I am sure that such an approach would commend itself to the Leader of the House because, whenever he has proposed changes, he has proceeded by way of consultation. Some 18 months ago, after considerable discussion with the Opposition parties, with my predecessor and me and with hon. Members from the minority parties, he recommended changes to proceedings in the House of Commons based on the Jopling Committee's recommendations. Although we want to go further in some matters, the changes have been made on the basis of consensus, discussion and consultation.

It is important for the Leader of the House to recognise that his approach of introducing change after consultation has not been the Secretary of State's approach on this occasion. Therefore, responsibility for the problems that the House faces in having a longer debate on these Standing Orders than on those on the Scottish Grand Committee lies clearly at the door of the Secretary of State. It is not the Leader of the House's fault that we are in this position.

The problem of negotiating changes to the Welsh Grand Committee need not have resulted in a stalemate between the Secretary of State and Welsh Members. Labour and other members of the Committee have attempted to discuss in good faith changes that would be most appropriate. I do not know whether the Secretary of State understands how strong feeling is among Labour Members. Many overtures have been made to him and to his predecessor. Had any of those offers been taken up, there could have been a more constructive discussion on how the Welsh Grand Committee discussed affairs relevant to Wales.

The approaches that have been made to Ministers go back almost a year—certainly to April 1995. The Secretary of State was not in his position then, but discussions were proposed to his predecessor. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) suggested to a Government Whip that changes would be appropriate and that more constructive use could be made of the time available to the Welsh Grand Committee. It took some time for the Welsh Office Minister to reply to my hon. Friend. In July, the Minister said that it was up to the Committee to determine when and where it met and that such things were arranged through the usual channels.

My hon. Friends tried to use the usual channels to arrive at some consensus. Their approaches to Ministers were rejected on all occasions—so much so that, by November last year, when the Secretary of State had been in office for four or five months, my Welsh colleagues decided that it would be appropriate to make their own proposals on the workings of the Welsh Grand Committee.

Shortly afterwards, the Secretary of State came up with some ideas and made a statement on the Welsh Grand Committee, suggesting improvements and changes in its business. Even after that statement, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central again tried to enter into negotiations to ensure that there was agreement on what changes were necessary to the Standing Orders and that best use was made of the time.

My hon. Friends have suggested that progress could have been made had those proposed changes been discussed in the Welsh Grand Committee by Welsh Members of all parties who are most affected by them. I would have thought that that was a reasonable proposition. I cannot understand why the Secretary of State has been adamant that that procedure is not appropriate.

I understand from my hon. Friends that the Secretary of State still has not said why that was not possible. Had we had such a debate in the Welsh Grand Committee and, in particular, had Ministers listened to the constructive suggestions that would have been made by my hon. Friends, we could have had a far shorter debate this evening. We could have had a motion that was the subject of agreement and discussion and that was amended when proper ideas and suggestions were proposed.

The Leader of the House's approach on all these occasions—of trying to work with the people who will be affected by change—has not been followed by the Secretary of State for Wales. If he believed that his suggestions were valid and would work, it would have been reasonable to agree to Welsh Members' request to discuss them in the Welsh Grand Committee. Had that happened, we might not have needed such a lengthy debate this evening. The reason why the House's time is being taken up on these matters is that the Secretary of State has been obstinate and has decided to make decisions rather than enter into genuine consultation.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I want not only to support the points that have been made by the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) but to add some of my own. The procedure for tabling the motion, the details of which we will discuss later, is unsatisfactory.

For those of us who were able only on Friday to submit amendments, the workings of the Table Office again turned out to be unsatisfactory because, for reasons that I do not understand but perhaps you can look into, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it refused to accept amendments that had been tabled and signed by hon. Members because they were not present in person. I understand that that is the drill to which we work on oral questions, but early-day motions and amendments to them and amendments to legislation are put down in writing. To have them refused on this occasion means that it is impossible for us to have on the Order Paper the amendments that we wanted to debate. That is because the motion appeared late on Thursday, amendments had to be tabled by Friday and the Table Office was unwilling to act.

I should like to lodge a protest on behalf of my staff about the way in which people on my staff were treated by the Table Office when they tried to negotiate on the matter. The attitude was far from satisfactory and the lack of courtesy was matched only by the lack of courtesy in not giving us proper notification of what was to come to the House.

This should be an important debate, but the opportunity for it to be constructive rather than a polarised party debate has been thrown out by the Secretary of State because, within half an hour of meeting the Welsh parliamentary party, the group containing all Welsh Members, he announced to the press that he intended to carry on regardless with the motion. He did not follow the representations that were properly and reasonably discussed by Members at the all-party meeting with the Secretary of State in the Norman Shaw building. The meeting seemed promising because it showed the way forward. It showed that we could discuss issues and move to a constructive way of handling such matters.

We spent an hour discussing the matter in detail and making constructive proposals about the orders, but the door was quickly shut on the overwhelming majority view of Welsh Members. That has inevitably led to polarisation and the issue will be fought line by line in the House. I regret not only that our amendments cannot be debated but that more have not been selected, because there is room to debate many of the amendments on the Order Paper. Presumably, the House does not have time for that.

If the Welsh Grand Committee is to be meaningful, Welsh Members from all parties will have to support the changes; but the Government's attitude has shown that that is highly unlikely and that we will enter a period of entrenched warfare over the Committee rather than proceed on a basis of co-operation between parties. Weak as it is, that is the way in which the Committee should discuss Welsh matters. I am unhappy with the business motion and I hope that the House will divide on it.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Although I confess that I cannot and do not intend to cultivate anger on this issue, it is regrettable that the debate, which of course it is procedurally right should take place on these matters, is not taking place after a debate in the Welsh Grand Committee. Much trouble would have been avoided if the Welsh Grand Committee had had the opportunity to discuss the amendments and make recommendations, even if only on an advisory basis. That might have resulted in less contention.

The issue that will concern many hon. Members is whether there will be any significant improvement in the government of Wales as a consequence of the business motion. I do not think that there will be. However, I think that there will be some, albeit limited, improvements in the way in which the Welsh Grand Committee will operate.

I ask the Government, even at this late hour, to consider whether it would be wise to postpone the debate on Welsh business and allow the Welsh Grand Committee, in clear support of the opinions expressed to the Secretary of State at the meeting of the Welsh parliamentary party, to have its say so that we may have a seemly rather than an unseemly debate in the House.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): There would have been no need for the debate to take this form had the Secretary of State effectively continued in the spirit of the Welsh parliamentary party and submitted the whole issue to the Welsh Grand Committee. If that had been done, all Welsh Members would have been able to get to grips with the detail and express their views. Having used the Welsh Grand Committee as an effective sounding board, the Secretary of State could then have formulated his proposals on a basis of consensus.

The Government have contrived to have a debate that could run for nearly four hours. Does that mean that they have virtually run out of business for the remainder of the Session and need to fill it with a debate under entirely unsatisfactory circumstances and against a background of deep opposition by virtually all Welsh Members, who feel that the Government are railroading these proposals through without proper consent?

Instead of allowing Welsh Members to discuss the matter properly, the Government simply want a long drawn-out skirmish in the House rather than having to table other business, because they do not have much other business. The Secretary of State had an opportunity to arrive at a consensus, initially through the Welsh parliamentary party and then through the Welsh Grand Committee. That would have concertinaed the process and would have led to a much shorter, crisper debate and could, perhaps, have resolved any outstanding issues. Instead, as will become evident when the matters are discussed, the Secretary of State has unilaterally proceeded against the wishes of the vast majority of Welsh Opposition Members—if not all—who comprise by far the greatest number of Welsh Members. He is proceeding against our wishes in a way that challenges the democratic relationship between the House and the people of Wales.

[Mr. Peter Hain]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central): As my hon. Friend says, the Secretary of State is proceeding against our wishes. Perversely, when the Secretary of State met the members of the parliamentary group, he showed that he had much sympathy with the vast majority of our proposals. Is it not even more surprising that he should choose to ignore that opportunity to reach a consensus and instead proceed in a dictatorial fashion?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a valid point and it will be interesting to hear the Secretary of State's answer, or that of the Leader of the House if he intends to reply. The Secretary of State approached that meeting in a conciliatory and informal fashion and listened to all the views expressed at it. There was understanding and a fair consensus, and we thought that on that basis we could get the new arrangements up and running; but the Secretary of State has almost entirely ignored the spirit of the meeting and, using his majority in the Chamber, he seeks to impose these arrangements on us.

If the Secretary of State had chosen the Welsh Grand Committee route, not only would it have shortened the proceedings—that would be an advantage to everyone except perhaps the Government business managers, because it would have made a hole in their day—but it would have allowed us to establish arrangements for the Welsh Grand Committee that would have stood the test of time because they would have been based on consensus.

The suspicion must be that the Secretary of State is imposing these arrangements on us because he wants to dodge not just the will of the Welsh Grand Committee and Welsh Members but the will of the people of Wales. Welsh people do not want a half-baked, jazzed-up Welsh Grand Committee: they want a Welsh Assembly. They want to have the ability to express their views through an elected assembly so that their voices can be heard in a way that the Government have consistently denied them for the past 17 years. The Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards), shakes his head, but he more than any other Conservative Member consistently flouts the wishes of the Welsh people in his behaviour as a Minister and in the way in which he conducts himself in the Chamber in proceeding with the business for which he is responsible.

The Government's action will leave a sour taste in the mouths not only of Welsh Members, other than the one or two Welsh Conservative Back Benchers who are not even in the Chamber—where are they?—but of the people of Wales as a whole. Once again, the Government, who take no interest in their wishes, are flouting those wishes and riding roughshod over them by imposing arrangements that do not have the support of Welsh Members of Parliament.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I should like to follow and take up the argument of my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain). We should ask ourselves whether the proposed changes—if and when we debate them—will improve the standard of decision making in the Principality. I believe that they will not. More paper will be used, more words will be printed and more words will be spoken, but the proposed changes will not make one iota of difference to the quality of decisions. The final arbiter of that will remain the English Tory party in the House of Commons.

My hon. Friend the Member for Neath was right. Just six Government Members are present, of whom just one represents a Welsh constituency. The Conservative party has other Welsh Members—

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Not for much longer.

Dr. Marek: Where are the Conservative party's other five Welsh Members, even if, as my hon. Friend says, it will probably not have them for much longer? Are even they against the Government's proposed changes? Are they treating the debate with disdain by being absent? What is the explanation for their absence? At the moment, the matter is completely beyond me. Of course Conservative Members know that there is a desire in the Principality for more decisions to be taken there instead of foreign politics and foreign decisions being inflicted on us by people who have no interest whatever in the Principality.

I met the Secretary of State and he knew nothing much about Wales. He has at least taken an interest in it, but only of course during the past six or nine months. That is no substitute for living in the place and knowing it. If one knows a place, one is likely to make better decisions as a result.

Will the changes allow any decisions to be made by the Welsh Grand Committee that it would not have been able to make before? The answer is, of course, no. We know that the Welsh Grand Committee cannot make any decisions.

Mr. Wigley: It is a talking shop.

Dr. Marek: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The Committee is a talking shop, and if the Secretary of State's proposals go through, it will still be a talking shop. The changes will not make any difference.

Although I would like to catch your eye in the main debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make it clear that I am profoundly disappointed in this short debate on the business motion. I am not surprised by it, however, because the Tory party does not represent the people of Wales and does not have much regard for them. The motion is merely some cosmetic tissue through which the Government hope they will hoodwink people.

I am sure that not only the Labour party but the Liberal Democrats and the Welsh nationalists will ensure that any such deception is uncovered quickly and that the people of Wales will vote for the party that will return decision making—certainly on local matters, if not on others—to where it rightfully belongs at the next election. There should be subsidiarity down as far as possible—in this case, to the people of Wales, the Principality, the regions and local authorities.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): The Leader of the House should explain, especially to the Opposition, what happened after the Welsh parliamentary party meeting. The Welsh parliamentary party is a very curious animal. It is defunct for years at a time. It very rarely meets, but is suddenly activated—we activate it. I have been tracing the history of its meetings.

The Welsh parliamentary party met in the mid-1930s when there was an economic crisis, to try to gain some degree of consensus and present a united voice on the economic plight in south Wales to Whitehall and Westminster. It came up with some very interesting and unanimous suggestions. It again met during the war, in 1944, to recommend to the War Cabinet the appointment of a Secretary of State for Wales to promote the reconstruction of post-war Wales. It also met once or twice in the 1950s and 1960s to bring to the attention of Ministers the consensual approach to various political activities. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] The right hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts), who has just walked into the Chamber, is a living embodiment of consensual politics.

Sir Wyn Roberts (Conwy) rose—

Mr. Rowlands: I should like to continue making my point.

The Welsh parliamentary party has therefore just occasionally played a functional role in presenting a case to Ministers. At its recent meeting, a virtually unanimous opinion emerged that we should debate matters first in the Welsh Grand Committee. Given that consensus and the curious function that the parliamentary party plays every once in a while in Welsh-Westminster politics, it is extraordinary that its view should have been not just disregarded but, given the Secretary of State's statement to the media, disregarded within half an hour.

Although we will soon have a chance to debate the orders, I should tell the Secretary of State that we all remember his original statement. I certainly got the impression from it that he was generally open-minded about the shape, character and nature of the revamped Welsh Grand Committee. He invited consultation, and that was the whole tenor of the statement. When some of us wrote to him suggesting variations—I will not raise my suggestion because I have tabled an amendment on it—we received appalling answers. It was quite clear from the two-line replies that the Government had no intention of taking on board interesting variations on the original theme. Indeed, the motions on the Order Paper are exactly the ones that the Government first thought of.

It makes matters worse when one considers that Whitehall and the Government agreed to do something about the Scottish and Welsh Grand Committees. There has not been any real consultation on the proposals. There is not a shred of evidence that any meaningful point made by any Back Bencher—in an individual, not a partisan, fashion—has been incorporated in the measures.

The Leader of the House must realise the extent of the resentment felt and why the business timetable motion must be opposed. He should tell us what happened after the Welsh parliamentary party meeting and why no meaningful alterations have been made to the orders as a result of hon. Members' representations.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I was also at the Welsh parliamentary party meeting, and at its conclusion I thought that the Secretary of State had taken on board some of the points that were made. He left the room saying that the meeting had been helpful, useful and businesslike. That was the kind of language that he used. Within half an hour he had obviously gone back on everything that he had said, including, "I shall consider further the points that you have made to me."

For all his faults—and they are legion—the Secretary of State's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), would have at least said straight away whether he was with or against us. The Secretary of State handled the meeting with rather unclever deceit. We are not children; we know what is going on in politics, and we are rather taken aback at his attitude. The people of Wales will not be treated like children.

All of a sudden there is an indecent haste to try to do something about the Welsh Grand Committee, which has taken the same form for a long time. Many of us have argued about its form over the years. Apparently, nothing was to happen to it. Then, suddenly, experiments in Scotland were put in train.

There has been a mobile press conference in Scotland, attended by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Prime Minister and others. I hope that the Secretary of State does not think that by rushing the motion through with almost indecent haste and not even allowing a modicum of proper, reasoned discussion—such discussion was evident at the Welsh parliamentary party meeting—he can steamroller us into a similar format to Scotland. That will not do. I understand why the Government want it. They are not very welcome in Wales at present and there is no other way of getting the Prime Minister and other Ministers into various parts of Wales without this particular platform.

I must make it clear to the Secretary of State that we are serious about the purposes of the Welsh Grand Committee. We are here to represent the people of Wales; he is not. He made plain his disdain for the people of Wales in the manner that he insulted those representing them.

There are two fundamental points that should be included in the Standing Orders, but I shall confine myself to one of them—the question of dealing with specifically Welsh legislation. Over the past couple of years, on at least two occasions I have had the bitter experience of being in Standing Committee with hon. Members from the other side of the border who have voted down our amendments. I have respect for each and every one of them, but they knew nothing about the argument; they simply signed their correspondence and voted against every amendment. I had the bitter experience of losing one amendment on the casting vote of the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). I found it rather galling that the people of Wales should be deprived of the right to Welsh jury trials by the vote of a Member representing a Cheshire constituency. It is not good enough.

Today, we have an appropriate vehicle to amend the Standing Orders and bring them up to current standards. The Government's proposals will do nothing other than exacerbate an already bad position.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): I worry greatly about the motion. I genuinely want to know from the Leader of the House why there is such undue haste to discuss the matter. I have several reasons for wanting to know that. First—and this is not meant to be a party political point—the Conservative party in Wales starts from a position of fundamental weakness; it has just six Members of Parliament. The last time my local authority went to the polls, only three Conservatives were elected. The Conservative party does not have the support of the people of Wales for the policies that it is carrying out in Wales.

We can argue until the cows come home about the benefits of the United Kingdom Parliament and the position of English Members of Parliament voting on Welsh issues and vice versa. The point is that the Conservative party in Wales does not have the moral authority to impose its policies on the people of Wales. Whenever it has gone to the polls, it has been beaten—in general elections, Euro-elections and local elections. Therefore, it is incumbent on the Government, when they consider the development of the Welsh Grand Committee, to take with them those who represent Welsh constituencies. I say that not because of some ethereal, far-distant notion, but because we represent the people of Wales. We have been sent to this House to argue the case for the people of Wales and we have a majority in doing so. Whatever the Government think, at the end of the day they do not have a majority of Welsh votes or seats at local, national or European level. Therefore, our majority and moral authority are important and appropriate consultation is important.

It would have been appropriate for the Welsh Grand Committee to discuss these issues prior to their coming before the House. Any amendments tabled by my hon. Friends and others will be voted on and defeated, possibly by the votes of Members of Parliament representing seats in England and Scotland. It is important that there is consultation if we are to have a Welsh Grand Committee that is meaningful, that challenges the Executive, that can discuss and reflect Welsh opinion and that actually has an important role, irrespective of our wish in the long term for an Assembly or, in some cases, a Parliament.

I am worried because the Government do not seem able even to let the Welsh Grand Committee discuss its own future and establishment—so what use will it be in discussing the big issues that affect our constituents, such as value added tax, local government spending, democracy, quangos, trusts and housing, education and national health service policies? If the Government will not even let it decide how it is set up and how it arranges its discussions, what is the point of hon. Members going to the Committee to argue matters? We shall know that ultimately the Government are not interested in what the Committee says and does.

It is important that the Leader of the House and the Secretary of State reconsider the motion and whether to proceed with it. The Government should take Opposition Members with them on the motion. That is important for democracy and for moral authority. It is also important for ensuring that the Welsh Grand Committee works and is effective. The trust will be broken if the Government force through the motion tonight without further discussion.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will have gathered from the flavour of this brief debate the strength of feeling on the Opposition Benches.

I welcome the speech of the Leader of the House, which I thought was conciliatory. As I am sure my hon. Friends will have noted, his approach contrasts sharply with that of the Secretary of State for Wales.

It is clear that all the parties are unhappy with the way in which the business motion has been brought before the House. Even at this late stage, I ask either the Secretary of State or the Leader of the House to say whether the Government are prepared to allow the Welsh Grand Committee to consider the Standing Orders that will govern its own proceedings. That is hardly a revolutionary request. All we are asking is that the Committee be allowed to consider the Standing Orders that will apply to its own proceedings. Will either of the right hon. Gentlemen respond to that point now?

Mr. Newton: I had intended to respond when the hon. Gentleman had concluded his remarks. Indeed, I have one or two other things to say. In view of what I believe to be the desirability of the changes and the fairly lengthy period during which there was a good deal of consultation, I think that it is right to expect the House to proceed with this business tonight and put the changes in place. While I accept that hon. Members want to go further, the changes are an improvement in the Welsh Grand Committee and will offer opportunities and advantages to the people of Wales and those who represent them.

Mr. Davies: In effect, the right hon. Gentleman is saying that he will not allow the Welsh Grand Committee to consider its own Standing Orders. I hope that he will reflect on the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson), that there are 38 Welsh Members of Parliament, 32 of whom want the opportunity to discuss the Standing Orders in the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman is refusing to allow us to do that.

Mr. Newton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his courtesy in allowing me to intervene again briefly. One important point that is relevant to this line of argument is that these are not the Standing Orders of the Welsh Grand Committee; they are the Standing Orders of the House governing the arrangements for the Welsh Grand Committee. That is why the matter must necessarily be decided by the House and why it is appropriate that it should be debated by the House.

Mr. Davies: The right hon. Gentleman has repeated the error made by the Secretary of State when I wrote to him on the matter some time ago. I fully understand, as do all my hon. Friends, that the Government are not prepared to allow the Welsh Grand Committee to resolve these matters. As the right hon. Gentleman rightly said, these are Standing Orders of the House. What we want is the opportunity to debate them in the Welsh Grand Committee. Obviously, at the end of the day they have to be approved by the House, but why on earth are the Government so set in their determination to prevent us from even discussing those matters in the Welsh Grand Committee? That is the question that I put to the Secretary of State and to the Leader of the House, but I have not yet had a satisfactory answer.

The business motion restricts our opportunity to have a proper examination of the proposed amendments to the Standing Orders. Will the Leader of the House tell us why he is so anxious to restrict debate and to prevent us from even discussing the Standing Orders in the Welsh Grand Committee? Will he answer that specific question? Why cannot we even discuss the proposed changes in the Welsh Grand Committee?

Mr. Newton: Rather than allowing the debate to become a question-and-answer session, it would be more appropriate for me to make further remarks in my winding-up speech in a moment or two.

Mr. Davies: This is a question-and-question session, not a question-and-answer session. We are putting questions to the Leader of the House and we are not getting answers. If he is not prepared to give us an answer or to say, even at this late stage, that the Government will relent and will allow the Welsh Grand Committee to consider those matters, why on earth does he not at least give us a reason? What is so wrong about us being able to debate those matters? We have not had a satisfactory answer on that point.

We are angry about the business motion for this reason. Although the debate on the Standing Orders would have been allowed to run its full course in the Welsh Grand Committee, on the Floor of the House, it will be restricted by the business motion.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Does my hon. Friend acknowledge that the Leader of the House gave one answer to explain why he did not wish the debate to take place in the Welsh Grand Committee? He said that he thought that it would delay proceedings and that he wanted to move on. Is not the truth that if the Secretary of State had acceded to the wishes of the parliamentary group, so that we could have debated the matter in the Welsh Grand Committee, it would have been dealt with by now and the changes in the Standing Orders would already have been delivered? It is not we but the Government who are delaying the procedures.

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend understands the usual channels in a way to which I could not possibly aspire. However, I recall a meeting of the Welsh Grand Committee in Cardiff in 1993, when we urged the Government to accept the changes.

I contrast the procedures that we are being invited to follow, by means of the business motion, with the procedures that were followed when the Welsh Grand Committee was established. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), who spoke earlier, is an historian of great note. He drew my attention to the proceedings of the Select Committee on Procedure, which met in July 1958, when the Welsh Grand Committee was established. Our debate later will concern amendments to those Standing Orders. I refer to three brief points of note.

First, the Committee received evidence from Mr. Ness Edwards, who recommended the establishment of a Welsh Grand Committee—[HON. MEMBERS: "Who?"] Hon. Members ask who he was. He was a former Member of Parliament for Caerphilly; he was my predecessor but two. He was a man of great distinction and I think that it is necessary that I, as one of his successors, should try to take forward the advantages that he brought to us as Welsh citizens. It was his submission to the Procedure Committee that established the Welsh Grand Committee as we know it now.

Secondly, it is interesting to look at the Committee's proceedings. The Welsh Grand Committee was established by means of a detailed cross-party examination of the submissions. The business motion tonight will prevent Welsh Members and the Procedure Committee from undertaking that detailed, cross-party examination of the procedures of the Welsh Grand Committee, although that is just the sort of examination that is necessary to create a consensus. If the Leader of the House has a moment or two to spare from his onerous tasks, he will do well to read the proceedings of the Procedure Committee in 1958.

Thirdly, the Welsh Grand Committee was established before the office of Secretary of State for Wales. Since 1964, under Conservative and Labour Governments, there has been enormous administrative devolution and the Welsh Office has grown beyond all recognition. Surely, if there was a case in 1958 for a properly structured Welsh Grand Committee, there is an even stronger case in 1996 for a proper Welsh Grand Committee to examine matters relating to Wales and to monitor the procedures of the Welsh Office.

We oppose the business motion because, despite the assertion made by the Leader of the House, the change to the Standing Orders has not been the subject of proper consultation. I do not know what the Leader of the House means by consultation, but I know what I mean. I believe that consultation means that people, in good faith, make proposals for change, that those proposals are discussed and that when it is possible, on the basis of that discussion, agreement is reached. We have not had such consultation.

I do not know what the Leader of the House has been told by the Secretary of State for Wales. I can assure him that 32 Welsh Members have had no meaningful consultation on the proposed changes. I hope that the Leader of the House now fully understands that there is no agreement on the matter between Welsh Members and the Secretary of State. The wishes of the majority of Welsh Members have been ignored so far. If the business motion is accepted, they will be prevented from expressing their views later this evening.

Some of my hon. Friends have already referred to the Welsh parliamentary party. We met on 20 February, and I hope that the Leader of the House can offer an explanation for what occurred. By all accounts, it was a very cordial meeting, apart from the fact that the Government Whip was excluded from the proceedings because he had not sought an invitation. It was a matter of great embarrassment to him, but it gave great merriment to the rest of us. The meeting then proceeded in a cordial and good-natured way. At the end, as the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) pointed out, the Secretary of State left the room saying, "Yes, I shall consider the matter. I hope that if any of you have further submissions to make, you will make them and I shall give the matter further consideration."

Within an hour, I was telephoned by a BBC journalist, who said that the Secretary of State had given an interview in which he had announced that the proposed changes to the Standing Orders would not be considered by the Welsh Grand Committee, but would be taken on the Floor of the House. I ask the Leader of the House a direct question. Does he think that that is the way in which the matter should be conducted between the Government and the Opposition? Does he think that that is a fit, appropriate and courteous way for a Secretary of State to conduct himself, especially when he does not represent a Welsh constituency and can muster, at best, only six Members out of 38?

I wrote to the Secretary of State on the following day, 21 February, to express my concern, to ask him to reconsider his decision and to ask him to allow the matter to go to the Welsh Grand Committee. I still have not had a reply from the Secretary of State. Does the Leader of the House think that that is an appropriate way for one of his Cabinet colleagues to conduct business? I certainly do not.

Mr. Wigley: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if the Secretary of State had taken on board all the points that were made at the meeting of the parliamentary party and if he had said, "I have met all the points, so there is no need to go through the Welsh Grand Committee; I am willing to change the proposals to take those points on board," he would have made a comprehensible defence? To close the door, to refuse to back the changes that were asked for at the meeting and to support the business motion is, to all intents and purposes, to tell us that it was a total waste of time to have the meeting of the Welsh parliamentary party.

Mr. Davies: Very much so. It is my personal regret that the Secretary of State did not have the courage or the courtesy to tell us that to our faces at the meeting in Norman Shaw. He must have been set in his mind then, so why on earth did he not have the courtesy or the courage to tell us that that was the case rather than sneaking out and giving a BBC interview half an hour later?

I also oppose the business motion because it institutionalises conflict. I hope that the Leader of the House now understands that if we had been able to deal with the matter in the way that we wished, we could have reached agreement. There is a need to reform the procedures of the Welsh Grand Committee; everyone understands that. As a result of the business motion, there will be unnecessary confrontation with the Opposition. The procedures of the House are rigid and formal. We shall not be able to have the flexibility—the give and take—that we could have had in the Welsh Grand Committee. The business motion denies us that opportunity. Undoubtedly, the motion that will be put to the House at 10 o'clock will not command the broad support of Welsh Members. Indeed, it is a missed opportunity to reform the Welsh Grand Committee.

Those arguments underscore the fundamental divide between Welsh Members who represent Welsh constituencies and the Secretary of State. There is no doubt that Opposition Members have a genuine desire to improve democracy in Wales, but the business motion prevents us from doing so. There is a genuine desire to have better and more accountable government in Wales. The business motion will prevent us from having that debate. There is a genuine desire to have more efficient government, less corrupt government and a Government who reflect the wishes of the people. The business motion will prevent us from developing that argument. There are four hon. Members on the Conservative Benches who represent Welsh constituencies, but it is quite clear that they do not share our aspirations.

As an Opposition, we have always been constructive in this matter. To my knowledge, as far back as 8 March 1993, when the Welsh Grand Committee met in Cardiff to discuss the governance of Wales, the Opposition suggested to the then Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt), how we could restructure the Welsh Grand Committee. We were then debating the reorganisation of local government. We asked the Government why on earth, if they wished to proceed with it, they did not put the matter before the Welsh Grand Committee. Their response some months later was to deny Welsh Members of Parliament by repealing Standing Order No. 86—which is what the motion before us does—and to prevent Welsh Members from sitting on the Committee, which, above all else, was discussing local government in Wales.

Instead of putting Welsh Members on the Committee, the Government included luminaries such as the hon. Members for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick), who came to something of a sticky end, for Milton Keynes, South-West (Mr. Legg)—a fine record he has in Westminster—and for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Hawksley), who had no Welsh interests apart from a property that he owned in Powys.

The debate is not about devolution, which is not on the agenda tonight. The Government know our position on that, which is clear and unequivocal. The debate is about reforming the procedures of the Welsh Grand Committee. We want workable, meaningful changes. We want it to be given proper powers, not only to debate and to question the Government—when we do that, the Government can run away from the arguments, as they have done tonight—but to decide matters. If there is a difference between the Government and the Opposition on the handling of the Welsh Grand Committee, it is down to that.

The Government currently hold all the cards. They decide all the matters and want to keep the cards in their hands. They make the arrangements for the Welsh Grand Committee. They control its agenda and always have the last word in it. They refuse it the power to decide any matters. The business motion will curtail debate to about two hours, but that is not enough time to explore those matters, particularly on the Floor of the House. The motion will deprive Welsh Members of Parliament of any opportunity to seek a consensus on how the procedures of the Committee could be improved. Thanks to the motion, there will be artificial votes. Those of us who sit on the Welsh Grand Committee, who represent Welsh constituencies and have a vested interest in ensuring that we get it right tonight, will be outvoted by Conservative Members, who will be whipped at 10 o'clock to deny us our rights.

For those reasons, we oppose the business motion and shall seek to divide the House.

7.3 pm

Mr. Newton: I thought that the debate started rather promisingly, when the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor)—I thank her for this—spent a great deal of time saying what a reasonable man I was. However, it has gone steadily downhill from there, but I shall try to remain reasonable in my brief winding-up speech.

I do not accept, however grateful I am for the remarks about me, the contrast that has been drawn with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. It is certainly not a breach of confidence—I do not think that anybody would mind me saying this—to say that being, as I am, quite keen to see this particular improvement, as I see it, in the procedures of the House advanced as soon as possible, I had a sketch plan of business a week before Christmas. I offered my right hon. Friend the opportunity to proceed with the changes that he had outlined—which, generally, appeared to have been welcomed—to the Standing Orders that govern the Welsh Grand Committee. He declined, saying that he did not want the opportunity to debate the business at that time, precisely because he wished to go through a process of discussion and consultation with other Welsh Members of Parliament.

I understand that my right hon. Friend wrote to the hon. Members for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) and for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), and to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) on 14 December, explaining exactly what changes he proposed to introduce, offering a meeting to discuss them and asking their agreement. Thereafter, there was a considerable exchange of correspondence, and, as has been acknowledged, something rare happened: there was a meeting of the Welsh parliamentary party—a gathering of all hon. Members who represent constituencies in Wales—which my right hon. Friend attended. I accept that there appears to have been some misunderstanding in the wake of that meeting. My understanding is that my right hon. Friend had always made it clear that changes to the Standing Orders of the House were matters for debate on the Floor of the House. That appears to be the main point of disagreement.

Mr. Ron Davies: Whatever faults we might have as Welsh Members of Parliament, I can assure the Leader of the House that we never let the Secretary of State leave any of our meetings under any misapprehension of our true feelings. May I clarify one point and ensure that Hansard records what happened? It is quite correct that the Secretary of State wrote to me and other hon. Members on 14 December, but the Leader of the House has just suggested that, in that letter, the Secretary of State offered a meeting. That is not correct.

If the Leader of the House consults the Secretary of State and looks at the correspondence, he will find that the Secretary of State did not write to me, the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), who represents Plaid Cymru, and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), who represents the Liberal Democrats, until 31 January. I now ask the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider his point, because that is very important.

Mr. Newton: I understand—I gather that it is my right hon. Friend's recollection—that my right hon. Friend offered a meeting at that stage, but if there has been any misunderstanding about that, I am sure that my right hon. Friend will want to clear it up when he speaks in the debate, which I hope that we shall get on to before much longer.

Mr. Llwyd: On the question of misunderstanding, the Leader of the House is at a disadvantage, because he was not at that meeting. I was, and I think that we all have a similar recollection. We all understand that, for any effective change to be introduced, there has to be a change in the Standing Orders of the House. We need not be experts in "Erskine May" to work that one out. The point is that the Secretary of State left the meeting with the firm impression that he was considering actively all the points that had been raised, none of which now appears on the Order Paper.

Mr. Newton: We are, are we not, in effect talking about two different things. There seem to be differences of perception about the meeting, which, as the hon. Gentleman says, I did not have the advantage—if that is the correct word—of attending. My right hon. Friend's understanding, if I may speak for him further, is that he had consistently made clear his expectation that the matter would be debated on the Floor of the House.

Clearly, there are also a number of other disagreements about what should be in the Standing Orders, on which, of course, my right hon. Friend has reflected, but that is a somewhat different matter. Of course it is the case, as it was in relation to the changes in the Standing Orders for the Scottish Grand Committee, that some hon. Members would wish to go further than my right hon. Friend proposed or make more extensive changes to the Standing Orders, but it has certainly been my understanding, and, I think, that of my right hon. Friend, that there was general support for changes that at least go as far as the ones that have been proposed.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): With respect, the Leader of the House quibbles on the wrong point. Everyone understands that the Standing Orders are a matter for the decision of the House, but the suggestion was that there should be proper discussion and consultation by the Secretary of State in the Welsh Grand Committee before proposals were brought to the Floor of the House. It is a sign of the generosity of my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), Labour Members and other Opposition Members that we were prepared to meet the Secretary of State in the Welsh parliamentary party and to suggest a proper and sensible debate, and did not reject his right to make suggestions in the first place.

Mr. Newton: Given that we have been accused of resisting debate or attempting to muzzle Members of Parliament representing Wales, I must make the point that all members of the Welsh Grand Committee, by definition, are Members of the House. There is nothing to prevent any Member who wishes to do so from seeking to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in the debate that I hope will take place. We have provided in the business motion, although some of the time for debate has now been consumed by the debate on that motion, significantly more time than would normally be provided for debate on such matters, precisely in order to enable Welsh Members to have a proper debate.

I believe that we should accept the business motion and get on with that debate.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That, at this day's sitting—

(1) the Speaker shall put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motion in the name of Mr. Tony Newton relating to Welsh Business not later than Ten o'clock, and such Questions shall include the Questions on any amendments to the said Motion which she may have selected and which may then be moved; and

(2) Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates) shall apply with the insertion in line 41, after the words 'At Ten o'clock', of the words 'or immediately after the previous business has been disposed of, whichever is the later'.

Welsh Business

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Before I call the Minister to move the motion on Welsh business, I should say that debate will take place jointly on the motion and on the various amendments selected by Madam Speaker. The amendments will be moved formally at 10 pm.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move, That—

(1) Standing Order No. 98 (Welsh Grand Committee) shall be repealed and Standing Orders A to G below shall have effect;

(2) Standing Order No. 87 (Attendance of law officers and ministers in standing committees) shall be amended, in line 9, after "business))", by inserting "or a motion in the Welsh Grand Committee under Standing Order (Welsh Grand Committee (composition and business))";

(3) Standing Order No. 89 (Procedure in standing committees) shall be amended, in line 3, after "business))", by inserting "Standing Order (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings))"; and

(4) other Standing Orders shall have effect subject to the foregoing provisions of this Order.

A. Welsh Grand Committee (composition and business)

(1) There shall be a standing committee called the Welsh Grand Committee, which shall consist of all Members representing Welsh constituencies, together with not more than five other Members nominated by the Committee of Selection, which shall have power from time to time to discharge the Members so nominated by it and to appoint others in substitution for those discharged.

(2) The business of the committee shall include—

(a) questions tabled in accordance with Standing Order B (Welsh Grand Committee (questions for oral answer));

(b) short debates held in accordance with Standing Order C (Welsh Grand Committee (short debates));

(c) ministerial statements proceeded with under Standing Order D (Welsh Grand Committee (ministerial statements));

(d) Bills referred to it in accordance with Standing Order E (Welsh Grand Committee (Bills));

(e) such specified matters relating exclusively to Wales as may be referred to it in accordance with Standing Order F (Welsh Grand Committee (matters relating exclusively to Wales)); and

(f) motions for the adjournment of the committee, made under paragraph (5) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)).

(3) Any Minister of the Crown, being a Member of the House, though not a member of the committee, may take part in the deliberations of the committee and may make a motion, but shall not vote or be counted in the quorum.

B. Welsh Grand Committee (questions for oral answer)

(1) Notices of questions for oral answer in the Welsh Grand Committee by Welsh Office ministers on a day specified in an order made under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)) may be given by members of the committee in the Table Office.

(2) Notices of questions given under this order shall bear an indication that they are for oral answer in the Welsh Grand Committee.

(3) No more than one notice of a question may be given under this order by any member of the committee for each day specified under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)) for the taking of questions.

(4) On any day so specified under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)), questions shall be taken at the commencement of the sitting; no such question shall be taken later than half an hour after the commencement of the proceedings thereon; and replies to questions not reached shall be printed with the Official Report of the committee's debates for that day.

(5) Notices of questions under this order may be given 10 sitting days before that on which an answer is desired:

Provided that when it is proposed that the House shall adjourn for a period of fewer than four days, any day during that period (other than a Saturday or a Sunday) shall be counted as a sitting day for the purposes of the calculation made under this paragraph.

C. Welsh Grand Committee (short debates)

(1) Notices of subjects to be raised in short debates in the Welsh Grand Committee, on a day specified in an order made under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)), may be given by members of the committee in the Table Office.

(2) Subjects of which notice is given under paragraph (1) of this order must relate to Wales.

(3) Not more than one notice of a subject may be given under this order by any member of the committee for each day specified under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)) for the holding of short debates.

(4) On any day so specified such debates shall be held at the commencement of the sitting or, if the order under paragraph (1) specifies also the taking of questions on that day, immediately after questions.

(5)(a) No Member except the Minister of the Crown replying to the debate shall be called to speak later than half an hour after the commencement of the first such debate.

(b) The Member who gave notice of the subject and the Minister of the Crown replying to the debate may each speak for five minutes. Other Members may speak for three minutes.

(c) The chairman may direct any Member who exceeds the limits in sub-paragraph (b) to resume his seat forthwith.

(6) Notice of subjects under this order may be given 10 sitting days before that on which they are sought to be raised:

Provided that when it is proposed that the House shall adjourn for a period of fewer than four days, any day during that period (other than a Saturday or a Sunday) shall be counted as a sitting day for the purposes of the calculation made under this paragraph.

D. Welsh Grand Committee (ministerial statements)

(1) The chairman of the Welsh Grand Committee may permit a Minister of the Crown, whether or not a Member of the House, to make a statement, of which prior notice has been given to him, on a matter relating to Wales, and to answer questions thereon put by members of the committee.

(2) Ministerial statements may be made—

(a) at the commencement of a sitting; or

(b) if questions are taken, immediately after the conclusion of proceedings thereon; or

(c) if short debates are held, immediately after the conclusion of those proceedings.

(3) Proceedings under this order shall be brought to a conclusion at the discretion of the chairman.

(4) A Minister of the Crown making a statement under paragraph (1) of this order, who is not a Member of the House, may not do so from the body of the committee; and shall not vote, make any motion or be counted in the quorum.

E. Welsh Grand Committee (Bills)

(1) A motion, of which at least 10 days' notice has been given, may be made by a Minister of the Crown at the commencement of public business, that a public Bill be referred to the Welsh Grand Committee, and the question thereupon shall be put forthwith; and if, on the question being put, not fewer than 20 Members rise in their places and signify their objection thereto, the Speaker shall declare that the noes have it:

Provided that no such notice shall be given until the Bill has been printed and delivered to the Vote Office.

(2) The committee shall report to the House either that it recommends that the Bill ought to be read a second time or that it recommends that the Bill ought not to be read a second time, and in the latter case it shall have power to state its reasons for so recommending.

(3) Upon a motion being made for the second reading of a Bill reported from the committee, the question thereon shall be put forthwith.

F. Welsh Grand Committee (matters relating exclusively to Wales)

(1) A motion may be made by a Minister of the Crown at the commencement of public business to the effect that a specified matter or matters relating exclusively to Wales be referred to the Welsh Grand Committee for its consideration, and the question thereon shall be put forthwith.

(2) If such a motion be agreed to, the committee shall consider the matter or matters referred to it and shall report only that it has considered the said matter or matters.

G. Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)

(1) A motion may be made by a Minister of the Crown providing (or varying previous provision) for the Welsh Grand Committee—

(a) to sit on specified days at a specified place in Wales, the sitting commencing, and proceedings being interrupted, at such hours as shall be specified;

(b) to sit on other specified days at Westminster at half-past 10 o'clock, or at half-past 10 o'clock and between 4 o'clock and 6 o'clock;

(c) to take questions under Standing Order B (Welsh Grand Committee (questions for oral answer)) on certain of the days specified under paragraph (a) or paragraph (b) above; and

(d) to hold short debates under Standing Order C (Welsh Grand Committee (short debates)) on certain of the days so specified;

(e) to consider specified Bills which shall have been referred to it under Standing Order E (Welsh Grand Committee (Bills)) on certain of the days so specified; and

(f) to consider specified matters which shall have been referred to it under Standing Order F (Welsh Grand Committee (matters relating exclusively to Wales) on certain of the days so specified;

and the Speaker shall put forthwith the question on such a motion, which may be decided at any hour, though opposed:

Provided that nothing in this order shall prevent the committee from considering further at a sitting at Westminster business adjourned at a previous sitting in Wales, nor from considering at a sitting in Wales business adjourned at a sitting at Westminster.

(2) The provisions of Standing Order No. 88 (Meetings of standing committees), so far as they relate to the naming of a day in respect of business by the Member appointed chairman and the committee's appointment of future days in respect of business not completed at a sitting, shall not apply to the Welsh Grand Committee.

(3) The chairman shall interrupt proceedings (other than on a motion made under paragraph (5) below) at the time specified in relation to the sitting by an order made under paragraph (1) above or, in the absence of such provision, at one o'clock, subject to paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 88 (Meetings of standing committees).

(4) At the moment of interruption, proceedings under consideration and not disposed of shall stand adjourned.

(5) After the interruption of proceedings, or on the completion of the business appointed for consideration at that sitting, whichever is the earlier, a motion for the adjournment of the committee may be made by a Minister of the Crown, and, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 88 (Meetings of standing committees) the chairman shall, not later than half an hour after the motion has been made, adjourn the committee without putting any question; and in respect of business taken under this paragraph, the quorum of the committee shall be three.

The motion gives effect to the proposals that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales announced on 30 November for extending and enhancing the role of the Welsh Grand Committee. The Committee will be able to deal with a wider range of business, not only here in Westminster but at a range of locations in the Principality and as a result will play a more prominent role in the parliamentary consideration of Welsh affairs.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon) rose—

Mr. Newton: I see that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) is once again determined to let me get no more than one sentence out at a time.

Mr. Wigley: The Leader of the House will recall that I did not intervene in his last speech.

Mr. Newton indicated assent.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful that the right hon. Gentleman acknowledges that. He told the House that the orders put into effect the announcement made by the Secretary of State for Wales before Christmas. Given that he is putting into effect exactly what was announced without taking account of any of the changes that have been discussed since, what was the point of the play that he made earlier of the discussion period? What is the point of pretending that any of the Opposition's points have been taken on board when he is merely putting into practice exactly what was intended three or four months ago?

Mr. Newton: I am reluctant to be drawn into re-running the previous debate, though I acknowledge that the hon. Gentleman was one of the few who did not seek to intervene even in my relatively brief winding-up speech. The sensible course would be to proceed with the debate and no doubt, either in relation to the amendments or in his speech, the hon. Gentleman—who has fixed views on the matter and wants the Welsh Grand Committee to be not a Committee of the Westminster Parliament but a quite different arrangement—will be able to put his views to the House.

The new Standing Order A re-enacts the existing provisions relating to the composition of the Welsh Grand Committee, lists the full range of business with which the Committee will be able to deal and provides for Ministers who represent constituencies in other parts of the United Kingdom to attend meetings and take part in debates. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has already told the House—and I assume that this will be welcome in Wales, as it certainly should be—both my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer have indicated that they propose to attend the Committee under that provision.

Standing Order B seeks to add to the opportunities for Welsh Members to question Welsh Office Ministers by providing for an additional Welsh Office Question Time lasting for half an hour at certain meetings of the Welsh Grand Committee. I am never quite sure whether comparisons with Scotland go down well, but that procedure has undoubtedly proved a great success in the Scottish Grand Committee since its introduction a year ago.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central): The right hon. Gentleman makes a comparison between Wales and Scotland. The previous debate was about how we should make decisions about the Welsh Grand Committee, but when are we going to decide about the Committee changes themselves? Why, after 17 years, have the Government suddenly seen the light and decided to make changes to both the Welsh and Scottish Grand Committees? What has spurred on the Government's interest in changing procedures? What has changed the Government's mind?

Mr. Newton: Nothing has changed the Government's mind. It is part of our constant search to improve the way in which Parliament does business. When we changed the procedures of the House more generally, in the fashion to which the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) referred—my right hon. Friend the Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling) was present then—and discussed and implemented large parts of the Jopling proposals, no one asked why we did not do it 15 years ago. Equally, I do not recall anyone arguing that in relation to Scottish Standing Orders, the Scottish Grand Committee, the establishment of a Northern Ireland Select Committee or the improvements that we have been making to the way in which legislation is considered. We are simply seeking to improve the way in which the United Kingdom Parliament responds to the changing perceptions and circumstances of the way in which the House and its Committees do their business.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): One immediate improvement that the right hon. Gentleman might like to put in train is to allow Welsh to be spoken in the Welsh Grand Committee. A couple of years ago, we had lengthy deliberations on the Welsh Language Act 1993, which culminated in the Government saying that Welsh had equal validity with English. The Government are denying the people of Wales the chance of making the revamped Committee of some relevance to large parts of Wales. That is an insult to the people of Wales.

Mr. Newton: The amendment of the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) relates to that. I shall talk about the matter in a moment. No doubt the hon. Gentleman will be able to advance his points during the debate.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): Given his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones), is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Secretary of State for Wales has been going round Wales saying that the proposals are an alternative to a Welsh Assembly?

Mr. Newton: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—who, as I have suggested, will seek to catch your eye later in the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker—has muttered from a sedentary position that he does not accept that proposition. I am sure that ways will be found to put that point to him directly during the debate.

Standing Order C allows Welsh Members to initiate "short debates" in which speeches will be limited to five minutes or less on topics related to Wales. A Minister will reply to each "short debate", which will allow more detailed consideration of a specific question. It should be possible to cover at least two topics in the time available.

Standing Order D will allow a Minister from the Welsh Office or another Government Department to make a statement about a matter relating to Wales at the beginning of a meeting of the Welsh Grand Committee. Again, I should emphasise that, as is the case with Scotland, whether a statement should be made to the Welsh Grand Committee or on the Floor of the House is necessarily a matter of judgment in each case, but there would be significant advantages not least for Welsh Members in, for example, moving the annual statement on public expenditure in Wales into the Welsh Grand Committee. It would give Welsh Members a better opportunity to question the Secretary of State, as well as relieving one part of the pressure of business on the Floor at what tends to be a congested time in the Session. It is now the practice for the Scottish public expenditure statement to be made to the Scottish Grand Committee each December and that arrangement has worked to the advantage of Scottish Members and the House as a whole.

I can pass quickly over Standing Orders E and F, since they do no more than restate those provisions of the existing Standing Orders that govern the Welsh Grand Committee's consideration of Bills and matters relating exclusively to Wales.

Standing Order G has three principal purposes. First, it enables the Welsh Grand Committee to hold meetings in Cardiff or anywhere else in Wales. The Government recognise that such meetings need to be held in premises that meet the requirements of the Committee in every respect and I can give an assurance that we will not ask the House to approve a meeting in any venue that has not been thoroughly evaluated by the House authorities and found to be suitable.

Mr. Ron Davies (Caerphilly): To return to the question of the Welsh language, the Leader of the House will know that many of the venues that are being suggested have translation equipment. It would be perfectly natural for him to agree that an experiment could be undertaken, so that when the Welsh Grand Committee met in chambers where translation equipment was available, Welsh could be used. If the amendments are defective, which we would understand, are the Government prepared to accept the principle of Welsh being used in the Welsh Grand Committee?

Mr. Newton: May I return to that? I promise the hon. Gentleman that I will comment on it, but it would probably be more helpful to the House if I completed my brief description of the Standing Orders before doing so.

The second purpose of Standing Order G is to provide for a calendar specifying the dates, times and places of meetings of the Committee, together with the business to be taken at each meeting. If the House agrees to the motion, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for

[Mr. Newton]

Wales hopes to table a motion in the near future setting out a proposed timetable of meetings for the rest of this Session.

Thirdly, that part of the Standing Order gives a further opportunity for Welsh Members to raise matters on behalf of their constituents by providing for a half-hour Adjournment debate to be held at the conclusion of the business set down for each sitting of the Committee, as happens at the end of each sitting of the House. In addition, the motion makes some purely consequential amendments to two existing Standing Orders.

Finally, the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr Davies) pressed me on the possible use of the Welsh language in the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee—the hon. Member for Caernarfon also pressed me on that on behalf of the Welsh nationalists. A number of representations were undoubtedly made to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales on that point—my right hon. Friend has made that clear to me—in the course of what turned out to be the somewhat contentious consultations that preceded the bringing forward of this motion.

As the hon. Member for Caernarfon knows, even though he gave us some trouble over it—not for the first time, and probably not for the last—the Government have given the Welsh language consistent support for many years. It was this Government who took through Parliament the Welsh Language Act 1993, which establishes the principle that, in the conduct of public business in Wales, the English and Welsh languages should be treated on a basis of equality. So, I can say straightforwardly that I certainly do not dismiss the point that was raised. However, it is a matter for the House and not the Government to decide. We have to recognise that it raises a significant question of principle since, apart from a few Norman-French survivals used principally for announcing the Royal Assent to Acts of Parliament in the other place and one or two other purposes, English is and has been for centuries the sole language of the United Kingdom Parliament—[Interruption.] This is a serious point and I hope that hon. Members will let me continue.

Clearly, there are implications not only for the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee in Wales, but for its proceedings here in Westminster, for the Scottish Grand Committee and, indeed, for the Chamber of the House of Commons. A number of practical issues would also need to be tackled. The hon. Member for Caerphilly commented on one—the availability of translation facilities—and others include whether Committee papers, Order Papers, Hansard and the like should be produced in both languages.

It seems to me that everyone should agree that allowing the use of Welsh at Grand Committee meetings in Wales would be a major change in parliamentary practice. It would not be sensible for the House to contemplate taking a decision on such an important and potentially significant matter unless every issue that it raises has been properly investigated. The Government believe, therefore, that the appropriate course would be to ask the Procedure Committee to consider the matter and report to the House in due course. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) and his colleagues are well equipped to do so and I hope that they will be prepared to look into that question for us and give the House the benefit of their considered advice.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Newton: Perhaps I had better give way to the hon. Member for Caerphilly on the Opposition Front Bench first. Then I will submit to all the other interventions.

Mr. Ron Davies: The Leader of the House has made an important statement. I am glad that he acknowledges the seriousness of the matters that we have put to him—in contrast to the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards), who was very scornful in his comments. The right hon. Gentleman has said that he is prepared to allow the Select Committee on Procedure to consider the matter. Since there is some urgency—given the Government's motion—about getting the Welsh Grand Committee to meet in Wales, will he agree one further concession? Would he expect the Procedure Committee to report before the Welsh Grand Committee next meets in Wales in a chamber with translation equipment? That is taking the argument a stage further. The right hon. Gentleman has made a considerable concession on the part of the Government. If he were prepared to go that one step further, he would find—for once—enormous support for the announcement that he has made.

Mr. Newton: Conciliatory as I always try to be—I am certainly seeking to be tonight—I am not sure that I can take that further step, or certainly not off the cuff.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Newton: I am in danger of being made to sound more tetchy than I wish to be if I am hardly allowed to get a sentence out.

I cannot go as far as that. Perhaps it would be unwise even to encourage such thoughts for two reasons. First, I want to get the reaction of my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, to the suggestion of moving at that pace. Secondly, I suspect that that issue should properly be dealt with on a more considered time scale than the hon. Gentleman suggests, unless the first meeting of the Welsh Grand Committee in Wales is to be unduly delayed.

In the absence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, I am aware that the Procedure Committee is in the middle of a substantial inquiry into the way in which the House deals with secondary legislation, so I cannot give the hon. Gentleman that assurance tonight and I doubt that I will be able to do so at a later stage. We will certainly not encourage delay in the examination of the matter, however.

Mr. Wigley: Does not that last comment show that the Leader of the House is just kicking the matter into touch? If the Select Committee on Procedure is involved in long-running business that will take time and then has to consider the ins and outs of the question, it will be months—certainly the summer recess—before we get any further and, no doubt, some time in the autumn before a proposal is made.

On the right hon. Gentleman's earlier comments—I tried to intervene earlier—there is a precedent, so he need not make all that fuss about procedures. The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, chaired by Leo Abse, addressed this issue when it inquired into the establishment of the Welsh language fourth television channel. The Committee met in Caernarfon—at the weekend, I spoke to the people who prepared the simultaneous translation equipment for that meeting—and there was a translation of the proceedings, as necessary, for the official record.

Has the Leader of the House done his research on this matter? The principle is there and it has been accepted. The concept was accepted for a Select Committee, so why on earth is it not going to be used for the Grand Committee? Is this just a deliberate attempt by the Government to go contrary to the indications of the Welsh Language Act 1993, which says that public business can be undertaken in either language in Wales—and I intend to undertake it in Welsh?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman is being uncharacteristically unfair to me. For once, I feel better treated by the Opposition Front Bench, which has at least acknowledged that what I have suggested is a conciliatory gesture. I am not attempting to kick this issue into the long grass, nor am I resting on mechanical points, such as whether the facilities are available. I am making the serious point that this issue has potentially large implications that should be properly examined. It is the kind of point which hon. Members would normally expect the Procedure Committee to examine properly before such changes are made.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will the Leader of the House look at the amendment that has been selected—which seems to be the most modest of the amendments tabled about the language? It asks that when the Welsh Grand Committee meets in Wales, and only in Wales, both languages can be used where translation equipment is available. As the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) has said, there is a precedent for this and there are no difficulties for the House in accepting the amendment.

If the Committee meets in Westminster or elsewhere, great practical obstacles and difficulties will be in the way. There is a precedent for what is before the House tonight and it is a modest request. If it is not accepted, the House will be guilty of saying to the people of Wales what it has been saying for centuries: that the Welsh language is not worthy of consideration; that it is a second-rate language that should not be heard in the House. The Government, in the Welsh Language Act 1993, said that they wanted to elevate the language to—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have been very tolerant so far, but hon. Members are making small speeches instead of interventions. Interventions should be brief and to the point.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North) rose—

Mr. Newton: I cannot give way to the hon. Gentleman before I reply to the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn). In the spirit of your comment, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I simply say to the hon. Gentleman that if the attitude of the Government were the attitude that he has just attributed to them, they would not have passed the Welsh Language Act in the first place and I would not have made the suggestion about the Procedure Committee tonight.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): Does the Leader of the House realise that the suspicion is so great because it took so long for the Conservative party to come round to the idea of the Welsh Language Act 1993, on which there was unity everywhere else in Wales? Does he not realise that the translation facilities are quite simple? Is it not an irony that we have had a meeting of the all-party British-German parliamentary group at South Glamorgan county hall and debated issues quite competently and easily in both languages, but we apparently cannot agree to have a debate in Welsh and in English when the facilities are available for translation?

Mr. Newton: I cannot add much to that point. I have made it clear that I am resting not on what I might call the mechanical difficulties, but on what I take to be the genuine and potentially large issues that must be addressed in the way in which I have suggested.

Mr. Dafis rose—

Mr. Newton: Given the background to this debate, everyone facing me wishes to make a speech. Therefore, I must make some progress in my speech so that they have the opportunity to contribute to the debate.

Mr. Dafis: Only in England would one expect such a big deal to be made about a simple matter: bilingual provision. I shall explain to the Leader of the House how commonplace it is in Wales for this sort of thing to happen and how easy it is to provide instantaneous translation equipment. I differentiate myself by the point made by the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies). It is not where there is provision for translation that this should be made possible—provision for translation should always be made available whenever the Committee meets in Wales. It is perfectly easily done and it is something that is familiar to us.

I ask the Leader of the House a question about the referral of the matter to the Procedure Committee: why was it not possible for the Secretary of State to refer this matter to the Procedure Committee as soon as it was suggested that this might be part of the provisions?

Mr. Newton: I do not know exactly when the suggestion was made. However, I know that the meeting of the Welsh parliamentary party—this curious animal that I have learned of for the first time in the lead-up to these discussions—took place on 20 February and today is 11 March. Within less than three weeks of that meeting, at which that suggestion would have been made, I have come to the House with the Standing Orders and with what the Opposition Front Bench has described as conciliatory remarks on the consideration of this issue. I very much welcome what the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) has said about the availability of facilities, which I suspect is due largely to the fact that we have passed the Welsh Language Act 1993.

Sir Wyn Roberts (Conwy): I assure my right hon. Friend that he is absolutely right in saying that this matter should be referred to the Procedure Committee, because certain points must be considered further. For example, if a speech is made in Welsh, should it be recorded officially in Welsh, or should the translation be the recorded version, in accordance with the usual procedures of the House? Overall, I am sure that the electorate in Wales will welcome my right hon. Friend's decision that his mind is not closed on this issue and that he is seeking further advice in this regard.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his comments. I referred—albeit briefly; perhaps I ought to have made more of it—to how Order Papers and Hansard reports of the proceedings would be dealt with. That is a good illustration of the sorts of question that need to be addressed and thought through before we make changes of the kind that are being urged on me tonight.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn) rose—

Mr. Newton: Is there some sort of Welsh nationalist policy that all hon. Members have to intervene before I complete my speech?

Mr. Jones: The Leader of the House has referred to the conciliatory measure. Will he tell us whether he has taken a view on the desirability of the use of Welsh in proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee? In other words, is he coming to this issue from the positive aspect that he would like to see the opportunity for Welsh to be used, but he wants the Procedure Committee to confirm whether it is feasible?

Mr. Newton: I have made a somewhat different point from simply considering the feasibility of the use of Welsh. I think that it would be appropriate, with an issue of this kind, for the Procedure Committee to consider the feasibility of the issue and some of the points that have been raised by hon. Members, and also the possible long-term and wider implications of going down this path. That is not unreasonable. Indeed, it is normal—as Labour Members have emphasised—to try to proceed as far as possible with this kind of change through the work of an all-party committee, such as the Procedure Committee, and seek to establish the widest possible consensus, even though complete consensus cannot always be achieved, as is obvious from tonight's debate.

Mr. Llwyd: Not on this side.

Mr. Newton: The suggestion has been made constructively and in good faith. The proposals contained in this motion preserve all the existing powers of the Welsh Grand Committee and give it a significant range of additional functions—they do not detract in any way from the rights of Welsh Members to raise issues on the Floor of the House, in Welsh questions, in Adjournment debates and the like. However, they provide new opportunities that will improve the way in which Parliament deals with Welsh business and bring Parliament closer to the people of Wales. I therefore commend the proposals to the House.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Opposition Members welcome the concession made by the Leader of the House. I do not know whether it was done off the cuff or with aforethought but, whichever way it was, we welcome the decision to refer the matter to the Procedure Committee because it is the first concession of which we have seen any sign in our dealings on modernising the procedures of the Welsh Grand Committee. I shall return to that point later.

Mr. Newton: I am in danger of, as it were, breaching my own comments by intervening so soon, but I feel justified in doing so in the context of the evening as a whole to say that, as must have been obvious, my remarks were not made off the cuff. They were made after discussion with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, who very much shared my view that that point should be examined, and represented, in that sense, part of his response to the consultation.

Mr. Morgan: I accept everything that the Leader of the House has said, but ask for further clarification, especially in the light of his last remark. Will he, as Leader of the House, refer the matter to the Procedure Committee, or will the Secretary of State do so?

Mr. Newton: I am not aware of a specific mechanism, but I plan to draw that point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), Chairman of the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful for those points of clarification.

A decision has obviously been made to take all five groups of amendments together in the debate, so that any hon. Member who speaks may choose whether to discuss the spirit of the amendments or speak to one amendment; we will make different choices about that. It is a leek soup and mutton stew of a debate, mixed together, which may make for some untidiness but means that we can finish by 10 pm without much difficulty.

Mr. Flynn: I apologise for intervening. I welcome the Government's concession. Would it be useful for us to agree that none of the other recommendations on the Standing Orders will be implemented until the Procedure Committee has reported on the status of the Welsh language?

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful for that suggestion, on which my hon. Friend may have the opportunity to expand, especially as one amendment stands in his name only.

The spirit of the debate will determine whether the new proposals work—whether they are regarded as acceptable on both sides of the House and throughout Wales. If the House and the people of Wales see the proposals for amending and improving the procedures of the Welsh Grand Committee rammed down the throats of the Opposition Members who represent a very large majority of Welsh constituencies, it does not bode well for the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee. That is why we ask for various other safeguards in the amendments that we have tabled.

There has been a little bit of give on the Welsh language issue. If there is no further give tonight, it will show that there will be no give in future—that the Government do not propose to take the Welsh Grand Committee any more seriously than previously and that the Committee will remain an impotent talking shop, unable to represent the views of the people of Wales on what legislative action is taken by the Government as it impacts on the people of Wales.

The fears that have been expressed were mentioned in the previous debate. It is feared that the Government intend to use the Welsh Grand Committee as a mobile press conference or mobile party political broadcast. Similar criticisms have been made of the Scottish Grand Committee. That is why we have asked for certain safeguards.

Let me run through some of the amendments in the way that the Leader of the House ran through the different Standing Orders.

Amendment (ff) deals with the size of the quorum. We were curious about why the proposals of the Secretary of State or the Leader of the House do not mention a special quorum for the Welsh Grand Committee. The Scottish Grand Committee has been given a special quorum of 10, making it different from usual Standing Committees. European Standing Committees have a special quorum of three. The Welsh Grand Committee is much more akin to the Scottish Grand Committee and European Standing Committees than to usual Standing Committees, which have a quorum of 17 or one third, whichever is less. If one applied that to the Welsh Grand Committee, it would give us 14 now, or 15 after the next general election because of the two additional seats.

The Welsh Grand Committee is not like a conventional Standing Committee, dealing with legislation, but is a general scrutiny Committee, much more like the Scottish Grand Committee or the European Standing Committees, so we propose a quorum of seven. That is also a useful safeguard against the danger that the Government, and especially the Whips' machine in the Government, would seek to exploit the Welsh Grand Committee. Obviously, any meeting of the Welsh Grand Committee requires a much larger head count on the Opposition side than on the Government side. The consequences of the enormous electoral success that Labour has had in Wales and the catastrophic failure that the Conservative party has had in Wales are that the Conservatives, to reach a quorum of 15, do not have to have many bodies away from Westminster on those days when the Committee meets in Wales, whereas the Opposition would expect to have many bodies away from Westminster.

We therefore consider that a quorum of seven, similar pro rata to the Scottish Grand Committee's quorum of 10, would be far more reasonable, more suitable for both sides and a safeguard against exploitation by the Government Whips Office during tight votes, which might hope that many Welsh Labour Members would be stuck in a snowdrift halfway up Snowdon and unable to return to London.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Surely the argument for a low quorum is that the Grand Committee will take no decisions and have no powers; it will be only a talking shop, so attendance is likely to be low. To enable the Committee to continue in session, it must be right to have a low rather than a high quorum.

Mr. Morgan: I could not agree more. My hon. Friend made the point exactly as I would have done, taking the words out of my mouth.

The Boston tea party was based on the principle of no taxation without representation; our amendment is based on the principle of no representation without legislation. The Government must bear that in mind. If the Welsh Grand Committee is a scrutiny Committee and does not have the ability to block or amend Government legislation, it is unreasonable for it to be treated in a similar way to a Standing Committee. That is why we chose the figure of seven.

The Leader of the House made no attempt to explain why the Scottish Grand Committee has a quorum of 10 and the Welsh Grand Committee has the conventional quorum, as though it were a Standing Committee considering legislation after Second Reading. That cannot be right; it is an omission.

We believe that the proposal came from the Secretary of State for Wales. I do not want to criticise the Leader of the House, but as the Secretary of State for Wales did not introduce the debate, he will have the last word at the end of the debate and, as a result, apart from asking him to allow us to intervene, we have no opportunity to ask him why he did not insert provision for a quorum, unlike the Scottish Grand Committee or the European Standing Committees.

The Welsh Grand Committee is not a very grand Committee. It does not deal with legislation; it is much less important than Standing Committees. When it meets in London, it does not set the Thames on fire; when it meets in Cardiff, it does not set the Taff on fire. It probably should have been named the Welsh bonsai committee rather than the Welsh Grand Committee, for the good that it is seen to do. It enables the people of Wales and Members of Parliament representing the people of Wales to ventilate grievances but not to do anything about them. That is why we have made that proposal concerning the quorum—one cannot expect maxi-attendance with mini-importance. Therefore we believe that the quorum is unnecessarily high.

Amendment (a), standing in the name of Labour Front Benchers, reduces the number of "offcomers", to use a Cornish term—Members of Parliament who do not represent Welsh constituencies—in the membership of the Welsh Grand Committee. Unlike in the Scottish Grand Committee, there is provision and, I believe, always has been, for hon. Members who do not represent Welsh constituencies to serve on the Welsh Grand Committee. The number for the Scottish Grand Committee is zero and for the Welsh Grand Committee, five. We understand why.

The Committee would become almost unworkable, under a Conservative Government, if it were impossible to include Members of Parliament not representing Welsh constituencies. Obviously, the Secretary of State is not from Wales, and it is frequently the case—indeed, has always been the case in the past few years—that the parliamentary private secretary and the Government Whip are not from Wales, but the Government also want to be able to pack the Committee with an additional two people.

[Mr. Morgan]

We are not sure whether five is the right number; we recognise that the figure of five has been used before, but we think that three would be enough to conduct Government business. The Welsh Grand Committee has been structured in a way that is already more generous than the Scottish Grand Committee to what might be called country members—is it necessary to have five of them? A Secretary of State, a parliamentary private secretary and a Government Whip should be enough. If that is not enough, why is there no provision in the Scottish Grand Committee for any Members who do not represent Scottish constituencies? That is a legitimate point for discussion and justification, although we shall not hear the Secretary of State's comments on it until the end of the debate.

I shall let my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) speak on the group of amendments that he tabled. We have noticed that the departmental report of the Secretary of State for Wales has not been made available to Members as early as it used to be—there has been a slippage in its production. Two years ago, the report was available in time for the annual one-day debate on Welsh affairs. The Welsh Office departmental report was usually published in late February so that it could be discussed in the annual debate on Welsh affairs. We could then discuss what the Secretary of State was proposing to spend the money on in the forthcoming financial year.

Last year, publication of the report slipped slightly; this year, it is to be produced very late this month so that the financial year will virtually have commenced by the time that the departmental report is produced. As a result of that slippage, the points that I am sure will emerge during the discussion on that group of amendments are important. The Opposition believe that the Secretary of State has allowed publication of the departmental report to slip so that it cannot be discussed in our annual debate. The Welsh Grand Committee can play a valuable role. It is also important to try to persuade the Secretary of State for Wales—when he replies to the amendments—to undertake to publish the Welsh Office departmental report before St. David's day each year so that its provisions can be discussed in the annual Welsh debate.

The last group of amendments which we have tabled, and which has been chosen for debate, involves the legislative function of the Welsh Grand Committee, and is perhaps the most important group. We want to know whether the Government genuinely desire to treat the Welsh Grand Committee as a mature Committee for the discussion of legislation or whether they simply want to confine it to being a talking shop.

If a Bill is sent to the Welsh Grand Committee because it relates exclusively to Wales and the Committee believes that the Bill should not pass on to the statute book, what happens? What would the Government's attitude be if there were a special poll tax measure in Wales, as there was in Scotland a year before the measure was introduced in England and Wales, and if—as would be almost inevitable—the Welsh Grand Committee were to decide that it did not like the Bill, did not think that the people of Wales would accept it, and so turned it down? What would happen to the Bill at that stage under the new Standing Orders? That is the acid test of whether the Welsh Grand Committee is meant to be taken seriously or whether it is viewed as a travelling circus for the Secretary of State, the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Prime Minister.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Will the hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to clarify Labour's policy on the taxation powers of a Welsh Assembly? Surely, any decision on the poll tax would be a tax decision and, as I understand it—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am sorry, but the right hon. Gentleman cannot speak about the Welsh Assembly because it is not the topic before us tonight.

Mr. Morgan: I am afraid that the right hon. Gentleman will have to buy me a pint in the bar later, when I can answer his question, much as I should like to do so now. I entirely accept your verdict, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I can see why the former Minister of State was prompted out of his torpor to make that intervention. We have raised the question whether the Welsh Grand Committee would be able, not to block the legislation, but—having discussed it and turned it down—to prompt a debate on the Floor of the House. We believe that if the Welsh Grand Committee is to be taken seriously, it must be given the ability to recommend that a Bill should not be given a Second Reading. The House would have the right to overturn that decision after further, proper debate—taking account of the views expressed in the Welsh Grand Committee.

If the Leader of the House and the Secretary of State for Wales do not intend the Welsh Grand Committee to be taken seriously, the new Standing Orders, as amended, should remain. Under those Standing Orders, the members of the Welsh Grand Committee ventilate their feelings, blow off steam in Cardiff, in Llanfairpwllgwyngyllgogerychwyrndrobwllllantisiliogogogoch, Monmouth, Machynlleth, Pontrhydygroes, Pontrhydfendigaid or Llanaelhaearn or wherever. I am sure that, when the Secretary of State winds up the debate, he will wish to run through that Automobile Association map of Wales, as I am sure that he has been well coached in such matters for the purposes of the debate. I see that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards), is leaving the Chamber to obtain some coaching for the Secretary of State on how to pronounce Llanfairpwllgwyngyllgogerychwyrndrobwllllantisiliogogogoch.

When the Welsh Grand Committee has let off steam, what is the House supposed to do about the measure when it returns to the House? Under the present arrangements, the Secretary of State can simply say, "You have had the debate in the Welsh Grand Committee." The Government believe that there is a choice; a two or three-hour debate can be held in the Welsh Grand Committee, but the measure must then be passed on the nod when it comes to the Floor of the House and there can be no further debate, or the debate can be held on the Floor of the House, in which case there will be no debate in the Welsh Grand Committee. There cannot be a debate in the Committee and on the Floor of the House.

The purpose of the amendment is to raise the fundamental issue of whether the Welsh Grand Committee is meant to give the Government guidance on how the people of Wales feel about a piece of legislation. Having been given that guidance, the Government should think again, amend the Bill or drop it. The Government will still have the final say; they will be able to decide whether they want to ram through the poll tax or the Welsh Language Bill because they have a majority in the House. But will the Government take any notice of the Welsh Grand Committee's proceedings? That is the important question. That is why we say that if the Welsh Grand Committee decides that a Bill should not be given a Second Reading, that should encourage, not eliminate, further debate on the Floor of the House to take account of the views expressed in the Committee.

I am hoping that, by the time the Secretary of State winds up the debate, he will realise that, when the Leader of the House made his mini-concession, it was accepted as a significant movement. The Government were saying, "We will not give you what you want, but we will refer the matter to the Select Committee on Procedure." The Opposition gave that concession a tremendous welcome; it did not give us immediate satisfaction, but we welcomed it. We are willing to work to improve the procedures of the Welsh Grand Committee by consensus if there is a bit of give and take. We are not willing to have our noses rubbed in the ground just because the Government have a majority of the votes in the House. We do not expect the Government to give us everything that we want, but we expect some give.

Despite the one small concession that we have received from the Leader of the House—which I accept was given after due consideration behind the scenes and in conjunction with the Secretary of State for Wales—we have been worried that the proceedings in preparation for the changes to the Welsh Grand Committee have not been characterised by give and take by the Government. Today's concession was the first evidence we have had of the Government's ability or willingness to consider what the Conservative party needs to do to avoid a wipe-out in Wales as the general election approaches. That is a serious possibility and the Government are beginning to realise that they will have to make the occasional concession—when they do, we respond well. I hope that the Government have learnt that lesson and will realise that, over the next two hours of debate, if they give further concessions, those will be welcomed by the Opposition as evidence that the Government are beginning to realise that they must not try to ram their legislation, views and changes down the throats of the people of Wales, who are overwhelmingly represented by parties opposed to the Conservative Government in Westminster.

We are not asking for the moon in relation to the Welsh language; if we have a meeting of the Welsh Grand Committee in Machynlleth, Aberystwyth or Caernarfon, we are not expecting the Secretary of State to dress up in long, green bardic robes and utter his speech in 15th-century Welsh poetry. We are merely asking for a simultaneous translation of his English.

We like to think that, in the spirit of the little chink of light that the Leader of the House has given us tonight, the great cry of "A oes heddwch?"—"Is there peace?"—that goes up before the final crowning of the bard in the eistedfodd, which I am sure he watches regularly, can be changed. We hope that it can be changed to "A oes consensws?"—I am sure that I do not need to translate that for him—or "A oes chwaranteg?", which means "Is there fair play?" A little fair play will produce a lot of consensus. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman has learnt a lesson from the reaction to the tiny concession that we were given tonight, and I hope that there will be more concessions when the Secretary of State winds up the debate.

8.9 pm

Sir Wyn Roberts (Conwy): I apologise for not being present at the unscheduled debate that took place earlier today. I was in Cardiff, on parliamentary business with the Welsh Affairs Committee, and returned only just in time to hear some of what was being said. I think that I caught the flavour of the debate, however. There was an air of make-believe in some of the arguments that I heard.

I welcome the proposals of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House in respect of the Welsh language, which is to be treated on a basis of equality with English in Wales. I feel that it would be appropriate for speeches in Welsh to be heard in the Welsh Grand Committee in Wales—although, as I suggested to my right hon. Friend, I agree with him that the matter should be referred to the Procedure Committee. I am sure that finer points are involved, which merit further consideration.

I wholeheartedly endorse my right hon. Friend's proposals to enlarge the scope of the Welsh Grand Committee, and to increase opportunities for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his colleagues to give an account of themselves—and for Welsh Members of all parties to hold them to account, as we are empowered to do by this United Kingdom Parliament. It is important to note, however, that, while there is to be a significant extension of the Committee's role, there is no fundamental change in its constitutional status. Its overall function remains to check on the Executive by questioning Ministers and criticising constructively or destructively, as necessity dictates.

The Committee's proceedings will, of course, be reported to the House wherever they take place, and its presence should be welcomed in different parts of Wales. I am bound to add that whether it will be welcomed is another matter; the Committee may well act as a honeypot for publicity seekers of all kinds.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman a question that I asked the Leader of the House earlier? Why does he suppose that, after 17 years, the Government have proposed these changes to the Welsh Grand Committee? Why did the right hon. Gentleman not advance such proposals during his long and distinguished service in the Welsh Office?

Sir Wyn Roberts: On the basis of that argument, no one would do anything. As my right hon. Friend has said, one can always be accused of not having thought of something before. Throughout the years, however, we have thought in terms of improving the Committee's performance, and I know that the Government have been very conscious of some of the criticisms that have been made of it. In any event, my right hon. Friend's proposed changes will extend its scope.

Opposition Members give the impression that they wish that the Committee—when they have a majority, of course—had real power to do their will. That is what is behind all this, and the debate that took place earlier this afternoon. Alternatively, they wish that the Committee had the power to force the Government to do their will. Such a division of executive power would, however, mean a fundamental change in the country's unitary constitution, and would result in conflict between the Welsh Grand Committee and the House of Commons when there was a Conservative majority. I believe that that desire for change and for power inspires Opposition Members.

The same serious defect can be seen in the devolution scheme encapsulated in the Wales Act 1978, which was subsequently rejected by the people of Wales in a referendum, and the same deep fault lies in Labour's current plans for an executive assembly. There is also the prospect of conflict with local authorities, many of whose powers would be absorbed by a Labour party assembly. [Laughter.] I am speaking to, and justifying, my right hon. Friend's proposals. I am not speaking to the amendments. There is every reason why I should be allowed to support the proposals, and to tell the House what I think is wrong with the motivation behind the amendments.

The Opposition regard criticisms such as mine of their proposals for the Welsh Grand Committee and an assembly as constitutional niceties—as problems that will go away in time. I believe that they will be exacerbated over time. The Labour party puts its trust in the maintenance of its power, not only here but in a Welsh Grand Committee or assembly. I warn Labour Members that their plans contain the seeds of their own destruction. [Interruption.] They will not satisfy hon. Members sitting below the Gangway, and their supporters in the country, any more than the Scottish National party can be satisfied in Scotland. Opposition Members are triumphant in Wales now, but I warn them that their proposals contain the seeds of their destruction.

I said that I would be brief, and I shall be. Let me simply say that I consider my right hon. Friend's proposals to be consistent with the unitary principle on which the United Kingdom's constitution is based.

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): The right hon. Gentleman has just told us that the amendments contain the seeds of destruction for the Labour party in Wales. In that case, why on earth does he not support them?

Sir Wyn Roberts: It may well happen after my time. It is a fair warning to the Labour party. Yes, the Labour party has a strong, monopolistic position in Wales, but it must be very careful about how it uses its position. It is already refusing to share any power with the minority parties. The hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) talked about the meeting of the all-Wales party, but he and I know that that was preceded by a meeting of the Labour party caucus and that everything was decided in advance. The Labour party must not abuse its strength in Wales.

Mr. Ron Davies: We should get the whole story on the record. The right hon. Gentleman was present at that meeting, and he voted with the majority, so he was certainly party to that decision.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I did not vote with the majority; I was one of two who objected. May I also make the point that I made proposals to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at that meeting—for example, that the Welsh Grand Committee might discuss some of the consultative documents that the Welsh Office issues. I did not expect him to change the Standing Orders in any way, but I am sure that he cherished the thought that I gave him because I saw him make a note of it, and I am sure that it will be valued for the future.

The proposals should be welcomed in Wales as similar proposals have been welcomed in Scotland. I am sure that they will contribute to the better government of Wales and show the electorate that the Government are sensitive to their needs, even though they cannot always be met.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): In his curious and convoluted way, the right hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) made a bit of an admission. The Leader of the House has also been surprisingly coy about the situation. The fact is that these proposals are meant to be the Government's defence, when the time comes, against a Welsh Assembly. I do not understand why they are so coy and so unwilling to admit it.

Quite a bit of the speech made by the right hon. Member for Conwy represented the beginning of the argument that we shall hear in coming months that the proposals are the alternative, in the Government's eyes, to the Welsh Assembly. Because of that, perhaps I have cast a much more critical eye over the proposals than have some of the hon. Members who have spoken in this debate. I am critical of the context in which they have been presented, because they are meant to act as a substitute or an alternative for the devolution proposals that the Labour party will put before the electorate.

Any student of the creation of institutions in Wales in the past 60 years will recognise the operation of the same ploy. A common characteristic of almost every debate on Welsh institutional change that has occurred in the past 60 years is that the establishment—usually a mixture of Whitehall officials and Ministers—offers substitutes for the demands made by the Welsh people and by Welsh representatives.

I shall give the right hon. Gentleman two very brief historic examples of that. In 1944—believe it or not—towards the end of the war, the Welsh parliamentary party, which was chaired by a Conservative Member, submitted to Ministers and to Prime Minister Churchill a proposal that there should be a Secretary of State for Wales and a Welsh Office to promote the reconstruction and regeneration of Welsh political, social and economic life after the war. The reaction of the Government and the establishment to the proposal was interesting and a classic of its kind. They felt that they had to give something towards meeting the demand, which was unanimously made by all hon. Members in the Welsh parliamentary party, and that they had to assuage public opinion by finding an alternative.

Until the past week or two, after reading the War Cabinet minutes on its discussion of it, I did not realise that one of the most fascinating and intriguing proposed alternatives was that, on her 18th birthday, the then heir to the throne, Princess Elizabeth, should have conferred on her the title of Princess of Wales. That was the sop to Welsh opinion.

I did not want to raise that point too strenuously because of my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies)—[Laughter.] It is obvious that, in 1996, as opposed to 1944, the Secretary of State or the Government could not propose that option because it would be much more contentious than it was in 1944. I cite that case only to demonstrate that a repeated characteristic of debates on Welsh institution making is that the establishment of the day reacts by offering an alternative or substitutes for the demands of the overwhelming majority.

In 1944, there was a demand for a Secretary of State for Wales and for the establishment of a Welsh Office. That demand was made through an all-party group, so I am not trying to make any points in a partisan spirit. Although the Labour party committed itself to the appointment of a Secretary of State for Wales and the creation of a Welsh Office in the 1945 election, the Government of the day did not implement the proposal but again came up with an alternative that was less than what was demanded. That was when the idea of a council of Wales was born.

The characteristic offering of other options was repeated at various times in the 1950s during the debate on the appointment of a Secretary of State for Wales. Prime Minister Macmillan suggested that Henry Brooke, the Minister for Housing and Local Government, should be given the title Secretary of State for Wales, but backed off when Butler and others in the Cabinet opposed it.

These proposals are a classic illustration of the phenomenon that has occurred over the past 50 or 60 years of debates on Welsh institution making, in that a substitute has to be provided to meet the demand made on the day. In this case, the substitute for a Welsh Assembly is a revamped Welsh Grand Committee. I do not like these proposals because I see them in that context—as a paler version of a Welsh Assembly, to be contained within the context of Westminster parliamentary life.

Let us examine the proposals. They try to recreate in the Committee what we currently do on the Floor of the House. Other hon. Members may support that, but I am not in favour of replacing Question Time on the Floor of the House with a paler version of it in the Welsh Grand Committee. I do not see the point of duplicating a procedure that is available to us in the House. I can appreciate the case for minor statements occasionally to be made in Committee, but I should like all significant and major statements on expenditure to be made in our presence on the Floor of the House. We should not accept these proposals on a Welsh Grand Committee because they offer us a pale version of a Welsh Assembly, set in the context of the Westminster parliamentary model.

For those reasons, I take a more cynical view of the proposals. I suspect the motive behind the proposals, the context in which they have been presented and the fact that they may have been offered as an alternative to the idea of a Welsh Assembly. Why have we not dealt with the problems and defects of this place? Anyone who was in the Chamber during the debate on Welsh local government finance could surely see the case for devolution. There were announcements about a billion pounds and more, and every Welsh local authority was facing council tax increases of 25 per cent., yet only a handful—three or four—hon. Members had the opportunity to make speeches to explain the impact that those proposals would have on their constituents and local communities.

If anyone needed a demonstration of why we should have a Welsh Assembly or why the Welsh Grand Committee should re-examine the way in which it scrutinises the issues of major Welsh public finance and public expenditure, it was provided by that debate and those arrangements. In a couple of hours, we debated something that will have a profound effect on every authority, community and individual in our constituencies. It was an illustration of the House's inadequacies and deficiencies in dealing with matters of great importance to our constituents. If we are looking for additional ways to revamp the Welsh Grand Committee, the first would be to consider the detailed way in which that Committee could scrutinise major elements of expenditure and estimates.

I am an old-fashioned parliamentarian. This place was born to debate estimates and Supply. Wars fought in the 18th century were successful because people were prepared to raise taxation. They accepted that there was a legitimate way to account for it through parliamentary procedure. In the 30 years that I have been a Member of Parliament—30 years at the end of this month—I have seen that principle eroded in various ways, partly because of Europe and partly because of a lack of interest or lack of will to do the job here, within the procedures of the House. There was, therefore, a case for revamping the Welsh Grand Committee to scrutinise in more detail the development of public expenditure plans for Wales.

I do not criticise the present Select Committee, which does a fantastic job. It takes longer-term views than I am suggesting and looks into matters in the broad and the round. It has not scrutinised Welsh public expenditure and finance to the extent that one might have expected but, in fairness to it, it sought a different platform, as did so many Select Committees.

The Welsh Grand Committee should fill a gap in our scrutiny of Welsh public expenditure rather than duplicate much of what we do on the Floor of the House at Question Time. That is the reason for my having a shot at making at least one suggestion as to how we might ensure that that happens. In a non-partisan spirit, I submitted a proposal to the Secretary of State immediately after his statement. I received an appalling one-sentence reply, saying that he would not take my suggestion into account, that he was not really interested and that he was going ahead with his proposal. There was no consultation, and my sensible suggestion was not given serious consideration.

That is all the more astonishing because my proposal would have brought to the Welsh Grand Committee a procedure that we already operate. I was not inventing anything; my proposal is, word for word, the basis on which European Standing Committees A and B operate.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) is a member of a European Standing Committee and I am an occasional visitor. They are among the most interesting Committees. The procedure that they have adopted makes Ministers work for their corn. Detailed documents are put before the Committee and, for an hour, hon. Members can pose any question relating to them. Ministers are made to get up and down. They do not like it—it must be most uncomfortable. I am glad that it did not form part of ministerial experience in my time and that I did not have to go through it, because it is wearing.

[Mr. Ted Rowlands]

Ministers have to do their homework in a way that is not required in a general Welsh Grand Committee debate. [Interruption.] The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has clearly been through it and will testify to its interest, value and, indeed, the discipline that goes with it. I am suggesting that we adopt the same procedure for at least two sittings of the Welsh Grand Committee.

I suggested that the documents put before the Welsh Grand Committee—the equivalent of the European documents, or directives, put before European Standing Committees A and B—should be specific sections of the departmental expenditure reports, which should be subject to the same scrutiny as material put to those interesting new inventions, European Standing Committees A and B.

Mr. Peter Hain (Neath): I agree with my hon. Friend—I whip the European Standing Committees for the Labour party. It is a characteristic of those Committees that Ministers are unable to wriggle off the hook easily because hon. Members can come back at them and tease out the reality behind the answers that they receive. There are few similar opportunities available on the Floor.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend has a detailed knowledge of the working of those Committees. I am sure that a combination of ministerial and departmental ingenuity maintains the Government line, but it is much harder to do so in those Committees than under any other procedures available to us on the Floor of the House or in other Standing Committees.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): Would not there be a problem for the Conservative party if what my hon. Friend suggests were to happen, in that there is such a lack of choice of Conservatives who could be Ministers? It must be a gruelling test—the Conservatives have already had four successive Secretaries of State from England and the Under-Secretary of State comes from England, too.

Mr. Rowlands: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point. We cannot build our procedures around the inadequacies of the present ministerial lot.

I read in a minute from 1957-58 that the objection to creating a Welsh Office was that, as one official said, there were not enough good or clever Conservative Members to fill the posts available. That was one of the practical objections in the 1950s even to the appointment of a Secretary of State for Wales.

I hope that I have not spoken in a partisan spirit, but the European Standing Committee procedure is a useful way in which to scrutinise expenditure. It would complement other procedures and, unlike the proposed Standing Orders, it would not duplicate what we can already do on the Floor of the House.

Amendment (aa) refers to departmental expenditure reports because the current Secretary of State's predecessor, when submitting the previous report to the House, boasted in the foreword about the size of public expenditure in Wales. That was interesting coming from the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who is a curious mix in all sorts of ways. He said in the foreword:

> "Public expenditure provision for programmes within my responsibility will be £6,644 million . . . equal to some £6,000 for every household in Wales."

If that is the real level of expenditure per household, it should be subject to greater scrutiny than existing procedure allows.

I hope that my suggestion will be reviewed in the spirit in which it was made and that the Secretary of State and other hon. Members will agree that we should consider a different kind of Welsh Grand Committee rather than accept a pale substitute for the only real meaningful alternative—a Welsh Assembly.

8.37 pm

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I congratulate the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) on a strong and well-researched speech. We all look forward to reading the lecture that he has given at Bangor and which includes some of the same material. It was, historically speaking, a persuasive analysis of the situation. When we see the Conservatives dangling half a cake, we should be aware that there is a need for a substantial cake but that we are to get only some of the crumbs.

The question today is why we should have a Welsh Grand Committee at all. The answer is that the Welsh Grand Committee exists because Wales is a nation. The Welsh Grand Committee is given no powers in case Wales starts behaving like a nation and takes decisions for itself rather than having the ability to debate ad infinitum but, at the end of the day, is not able to take any meaningful decisions for the people of Wales.

There are two deficits in Wales. The first is a democratic deficit and the second is a deficit of accountability. The proposals that we are discussing do not, in any shape or form, deal with the fundamental democratic deficit. It might have been possible to try to go down that road by giving the Welsh Grand Committee additional powers. Some of tonight's speeches have touched on some of those powers, but clearly the Government are not prepared to tackle the democratic deficit in any shape or form. There are 38 Members of Parliament in Wales and the governing party, even having won a general election, has only six seats. If it loses a general election, goodness knows how many seats it will have.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): None at all.

Mr. Wigley: Perhaps none at all, as the hon. Gentleman says. The number of Conservative Members shows the Welsh electorate's rejection of the Government, who for the past 17 years have governed our country on a platform that has no support from the people of Wales, pursuing policies that are often diametrically opposed to their economic and social good. The structures of Westminster do not allow the people of Wales even to take a single decision on matters of concern to them.

That was shown two or three years ago in a most lamentable manner when a couple of Bills exclusively to deal with Wales were introduced. I accept that the Welsh Language Act 1993 was a modest step forward, but it was debated in a Committee that was packed with Tory Members representing English constituencies, who did not have the background to debate the subject or, knowledge of the subject and who did not have to live with the legislation's consequences. They were able, however, as my hon. Friend the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) pointed out, to make progress on the language agenda that was agreed by all Opposition parties. Legislation was imposed on us that was acceptable to the Conservative minority and not to the non-Conservative majority of the people of Wales.

That became more evident when Parliament debated the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994. From the turn of the century, the Standing Orders of this place have allowed all Welsh Members to sit on Committees that consider Bills which exclusively deal with Wales. That was overridden by the Government to ensure that Welsh Members did not have a majority say when it came to the brass tacks and legislative decisions were to be taken. With these proposals, we make no modicum of movement forward in dealing with that democratic deficit. From now to kingdom come, we will have to accept laws and decisions imposed on us by a Conservative majority. That will apply for as long as a Conservative party receives a majority in England, but it never has and never will win a majority in Wales.

There is a modest movement forward on the accountability deficit. The Government are trying, I suppose, to allow the Executive to be a little more answerable to Welsh Members, but Welsh question Time—one of the tools available to Welsh Members to question the Executive—has already been undermined by the Government Whips getting English Conservative Members to hog the Order Paper on the one Monday a month when we have 35 or 40 minutes to ask questions on Welsh affairs. The agenda is set by the first question that is called and we must ask supplementary questions in the wake of that agenda laid down by Conservative Members. That is why we will have a little movement on answering questions in the Welsh Grand Committee—questions that we will have no time to ask on the Floor of the House.

I share some of the reservations of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney that some of these issues will be shovelled upstairs, where the press will often not be present and where we will not have the powers of scrutiny or the attention that is necessary. That is why, in terms not only of the democratic deficit but of the accountability deficit, we should debate these matters in an elected Parliament in Cardiff that can make its own laws and not be a talking shop, which the Welsh Grand Committee has been and will continue to be if we accept these modest proposals.

I want to take up four or five specific points with regard to the powers that the Welsh Grand Committee should have. The first is to do with the type of motions that its members are allowed to debate. It is a farce that the Committee must consider "take note" motions, for example, on education in Wales. When at the end of that debate we vote against the Government, does it mean that we have not taken note of the issue of education in Wales?

Opposition Members cannot table any substantive motion that can call the Government or the Welsh Office to account. All we can table is a "take note" motion and take part in a meaningless vote at the end. The Standing Orders should allow us to debate substantive motions that can be tabled not just by Conservative Members, but by any hon. Member.

Mr. Rogers: My experience in this place gradually leads me almost to the same view as the hon. Gentleman in relation to the Welsh Grand Committee. He mentioned education. The comprehensive system in England or in certain inner-city areas has deteriorated, but in Wales it has made a substantial contribution to raising education standards. Although there may be small particular problems, generally in Wales it is of the highest standard, yet we must have policies imposed by English Members.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. This is becoming a very long intervention.

Mr. Wigley: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers). I agree entirely. The Welsh education tradition has been valued and developed over decades to respond to the experience of ordinary people in Wales. They have viewed education as a key to improving their lives in material terms and in terms of opportunities and enjoyment of the best things of life.

Over the past 100 years, we had to establish that to pull ourselves up by our shoestrings. At the end of the previous century, during the Liberal party's heyday, and in this century, when Labour has been the strength in Wales, education's importance has been a common thread running through radical politics in Wales. Sadly, that does not exist in England, although I do not make a strong point about that difference. We place more emphasis on education. We need to be able to fine-tune our policies—not just talk about things—and to take decisions in line with our values, which we are not allowed to do in the only forum that we have: the Welsh Grand Committee.

Mr. Rogers: I do not know why the Government Whip is laughing.

Mr. Wigley: The Government Whip would laugh because Conservative Members know that they will get their way. Government Whips will marshal Conservative Members in the Lobby. Whatever we decide in the Welsh Grand Committee or in the Welsh Select Committee, the Tory majority from England will decide what happens in Wales. That is the reality of the mechanism of non-democracy in our country.

In the 1970s, we had opportunities to discuss and debate legislation in the Welsh Grand Committee. If I remember correctly, legislation on the Development Board for Rural Wales was debated there. If we are democrats, there is no reason why we should not debate legislation at Second Reading or Committee stages in the Welsh Grand Committee, but we are not allowed to do so in case we start taking decisions in the interests of the people of Wales and in line with their wishes. We can talk about things, but we are not allowed to decide anything. The governor general knows better than that.

Mr. Rogers: The viceroy.

Mr. Wigley: As the hon. Gentleman says, the viceroy. An hon. Member from outside Wales knows better than we do and he has the troops behind him. It is the majority of Tory Members from England who decide what is good for Wales, not the people of Wales.

The use of the Welsh language in Welsh Grand Committee meetings in Wales has been mentioned. I was glad that that has at least reached the agenda—as shown by the Leader of the House—and that it will be discussed further, but, as that matter has clearly been under consideration for a time, I would have expected it to move further down the agenda by now.

I welcome the fact that the right hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) is present. He steered the 1993 Act through Parliament. I make it clear to the Leader of the House—I would do so if he were here—and to the Secretary of State for Wales that I intend to speak Welsh in the Welsh Grand Committee when it meets in Wales. I will do so in line with the law of the land that has been passed by the Government. That law allows public business in Wales to be debated in Welsh. If whoever is chairing the Committee deems that I am not allowed to do that, he or she will be in breach of that law. The Government should sort that one out before the Committee meets in Wales. I declare that it is my earnest intention to speak in Welsh when the Committee next meets in Wales. I rely on the law of the land to protect me and I have no doubt that the right hon. Member for Conwy will be the first to ensure that support is given to that view.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney proposed using the device that has been developed in European Standing Committees A and B. That would be worth while and we discussed it for a short time at the Welsh parliamentary meeting that some of us attended. I hope that important statements by the Secretary of State that he cannot make now because there is no time can be analysed in an hour of questions and answers and an hour and a half of debate.

I was a member of European Standing Committee B for four years, but I am no longer a member. The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans), was in that Committee when I tried to put questions to him and he knows that it can be a rigorous process. No doubt Ministers will try to wriggle, but they get fewer chances to do that when we come back four or five times on the same theme. One can nail them down and then make a speech.

The quorum in the Welsh Grand Committee should be determined in line with the number of Welsh Members—seven or whatever the figure should be. The last thing that I would accept is a quorum that is dictated by hon. Members from outside Wales, which is the practice in other Committees. When subjects are called for debate in the Welsh Grand Committee, there should be not only notional dialogue in the usual channels but an acceptance that the majority of Welsh Members should call the subjects for debate: they should not be subjects that are merely for the convenience of the Government. We should re-establish the ability of all parties to have subjects aired.

The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs is excellent and has carried out much good work under the outstanding chairmanship of the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell). But its reports lie forgotten on dusty shelves although many of the good proposals in them should be taken on board.

Mr. Rowlands: I received a written answer from the Leader of the House on 4 December. I had asked how many reports had been received from the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs and how many had been debated in the House. I was told that there had been 36 such reports and that none had been debated on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Wigley: That shows the breakdown of the intentions that were put to the House in 1979 by the now Lord St. John of Fawsley. There was supposed to be a progression from the Select Committee investigation to debate in the House and decisions were to be taken. That system has broken down because the House does not have the time or the will to address such matters. That may be acceptable in the context of other Select Committees, although I doubt it, but it is certainly not acceptable to Welsh Members.

Let us use the mechanism of the Welsh Grand Committee to make proper decisions and to make sure that the Executive is accountable in some way to the people of Wales. The proposals to tinker with the Welsh Grand Committee do not answer the fundamental problems that are caused by the lack of democracy in our country. The Committee could have been made at least a little stronger if the Secretary of State had taken on board the constructive proposals by Welsh Members in our meeting with him. It is a disgrace that he is not willing to do that.

8.52 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): The status of the Welsh language in the House is the same as that of riotous behaviour. If we speak in Welsh in the House, as many hon. Members have done, we are called to order, and if we persist we are thrown out of the House. Many of us have considered that course and it is inevitable that it will be taken if the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) sticks by his threat. Many of us have great sympathy for that course.

The Standing Order that covers the matter is incredible. It says that speeches must be made in English but that quotations in a foreign tongue may be allowed occasionally although a translation should be provided. Where is Welsh in there? Welsh is not English but it is certainly not a foreign tongue. This is the only Parliament of Wales but the ancient language of Wales is not heard here. That is an ancient injustice that we can put right now. People have tried. Mabon in 1896 spoke in Welsh and quoted the illustrious Member for Rhondda, which is now represented by another illustrious person, my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers).

What is the present status? Even if the Standing Order is right, we are not allowed to quote in Welsh. A month ago during a debate on ferries I quoted from an account of a crossing of the channel that took place 50 years before the birth of Christ. Not unexpectedly, the account was in Latin and I quoted some 70 words, which was acceptable. My hon. Friends from Labour comprehensives understood what I was talking about, but I provided a translation for the Conservative victims of public school education. It is extraordinary that speaking in Latin was permissible whereas I would have been stopped if I had uttered more than two or three words in Welsh.

My constituency used to be wholly bilingual. The children in the town of Caerleon spoke Latin, but the children outside the walls of the town spoke Welsh. Today one does not hear much Latin on the tongues of the children in Caerleon but, happily, one can still hear Welsh. That extraordinary language has echoed down the centuries and is still with us as a living treasure of enormous worth and it means so much to so many of us.

I did not have the advantage enjoyed by many hon. Members of speaking Welsh from the cradle, but as an adolescent I had the good luck to have a marvellous teacher who introduced me to Gweledigaethau'r Bardd Cwrsg, y Gododdin, Dafydd ap Gwilym and to the wonderful, majestic works of T. Gwyn Jones and the lyrical beauty of the imagery of Robert Williams Parry. No one has written with more accuracy, feeling and inspiration about working-class suffering in Wales in the north and south and about the quarry workers and miners than the Gwenally in the south or those who wrote about the quarry workers in north Wales.

It is difficult to express to those who live in one language the experience of living in more than one. It is difficult to explain that the first language that one hears at one's mother's breast, the last one that is expressed in the final prayers before death and the only language with the tenderness to make love in or in which one can curse effectively is that mother tongue, the one—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether it would be necessary in the Welsh Grand Committee to curse in Welsh or in any other language. The hon. Gentleman must relate his remarks more closely to the subject under consideration.

Mr. Flynn: We express strong words in the House. One of the disadvantages of a lack of simultaneous translation is that when curses in Welsh are made in the House—and I have heard them—there is no way that Front-Bench Members understand what is being said.

Mr. Michael: Or the Chair. One hopes they are not directed at the Chair.

Mr. Flynn: No, they are not.

Our request is modest. Is it unusual for the world's Parliaments to have more than one language? A review undertaken by the Inter-Parliamentary Union discovered that 51 Parliaments use only one language, 22 use two languages on a daily basis, six use three languages and four Parliaments, including Singapore, which is well known to hon. Members, use more than three languages. There is nothing novel about that. Simultaneous translation is provided easily, in a sophisticated manner. There is no reason why members of the Government Front-Bench team who do not speak Welsh should feel nervous about any lack of understanding in Committee. The people who provide the translations are extremely skilful.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: Did the hon. Gentleman see the Secretary of State for Wales on television at the weekend in the Council of Ministers, where translation equipment was provided for him?

Mr. Flynn: Indeed I did. The European Community copes with half a dozen languages with great ease.

Amendment (y), which I am grateful has been selected, proposes a very modest concession. The main reason that we want to press it is that we know the extent of the difficulties when Welsh is spoken in the House. People from all corners of the world can sit in one part of the House where their companions can provide them with simultaneous translation. People have given evidence to Select Committees in a dozen languages.

There is a great danger that we shall continue the traditional disregard of the Welsh language and other minority languages that has occurred for about 200 years. Such disregard is part of the linguistic colonisation that has taken place in Britain and in many other countries.

Many of us are familiar with the sign in a Brittany classroom that said, "Défense de cracher, défense de parler Bretonne"—meaning do not spit, do not speak Breton. The little Bretons had sabots around their necks—exactly the same as the Welsh knot. One child who found another speaking Breton would pass the sabot. The petits délateurs were therefore turned against one another and into sneaks on the language in a positive movement to destroy the language.

In my constituency, as chronicled in "Brad y Llytrau Gleision", inspectors visited two schools in the middle of the last century and said that the children were all stupid because they could not understand a word that was spoken. The inspectors were unilingual in English and could not understand a word of the Welsh spoken by the children. They did not understand why Welsh was being spoken. As hon. Members have said, the children are part of a great educational tradition.

The language has survived. Waldo chronicled how by chance—it was miraculous—the language survived through the centuries because of the non-conformist Church, or because of the Catholic Church, as happened in Brittany. It survived not because people thought of it as a material reward but because they loved it, it was part of their lives and it was of genuine worth. They rejoiced in the literature of the language.

Mr. Rogers: In paying tribute to the various agencies that have kept the language alive, my hon. Friend ought to pay a great tribute to people such as the late Lord Heycock and other Labour Members who in the valleys of south Wales adopted Welsh language policies, started the system of Welsh comprehensive and primary schools and saved the Welsh language.

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Jonathan Evans) indicated dissent.

Mr. Rogers: The Minister who is shaking his head ought to be ashamed of his attitude to the Welsh language.

Mr. Flynn: I was building up to the climax of mentioning the great success of Welsh-medium education, especially in south Wales. For many of us who have worked in local authorities, it has been one of the great joys to give children who did not speak Welsh in their homes the chance to learn the language. Indeed, they had the chance to learn the language as their parents' generation never did—to read and write it. Many people of the previous generation were not literate. It is one of the great successes of Welsh education that the children have inherited the immense treasure of a second language—their own language. A second language is often the stepping stone to a third and fourth language.

I am disappointed that the Government will not see fit to accept the amendment, which, as I have said, is very modest. All it would do is enable translation equipment and translators to be made available in the Welsh Grand Committee, regardless of its venue. Translators are skilled and would be able to provide a service.

The difficulty is over what will happen with the Hansard writers. What will happen is what happens now when speeches of certain Members, whom I would not dare mention, are totally incomprehensible—to me, anyway. Some of them are from the far corners of these islands and speak in strange accents that I find very difficult to understand. By some odd process, we find that their speech is in Hansard in clear English. If the speech is not entirely understood, corrections can be made. I understand that in the case mentioned by the hon. Member for Caernarfon, Select Committee reporters take down what the translators say. If the person who has spoken in Welsh wishes to correct that later, that can be done. There is no difficulty whatsoever.

I accept that there are difficulties in other areas, for example, if we are to have a report in Welsh and English. However, there is nothing in amendment (y) to prevent it from being accepted tonight without any difficulty. The Government have given us a problem with how to proceed tonight. I want to consider whether to proceed with the amendment. We accept that a concession has been made.

I take on board the comment by hon. Members that this is not a new issue. An early-day motion, signed by 66 hon. Members, was tabled as long ago as 1988. Something could have come from that. It is late in the life of this Parliament. I know that an hon. Member spoke to this Parliament in Chaucerian English. For almost every hon. Member it was complete gibberish—yet it was declared to be in order. I will not test your patience, Madam Deputy Speaker, by repeating what was said, but it was English. The Standing Order allows for hon. Members to speak in Chaucerian English, regardless of the fact that hardly anyone can understand what is being said. But the language of Wales is not allowed here. Fourteen members of the Welsh Grand Committee are fluent in the Welsh language; several others can understand a speech in Welsh. More than a third of the members of that Committee can speak fluent Welsh and more than half can understand a speech in Welsh.

The final words of our national anthem, which we sing with great passion, are:

"O bydded i'r heniaith barhau"— which means, "Oh would that the ancient language continues to live." "What we are asking tonight for Am yr uwch-bwyllgor Gymreig—the Welsh Grand Committee—is, O bydded i'r heniaith ddechreu."

9.6 pm

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): We should paraphrase the child's question on seeing a politician in full flow—"Mummy, what is he for?" The same question needs to be asked of the Secretary of State for Wales when he attends the Welsh Grand Committee. Indeed, it is the question that we need to ask about the Committee itself. What is the Welsh Grand Committee for? What is the Secretary of State present at the Committee for?

A few weeks ago, the Secretary of State gave the impression of wanting to be reasonable in this debate. As I chair the Welsh group of Labour Members of Parliament this year, I want to stress the generosity and reasonableness with which we responded to the suggestions of change. The tone of our meetings; the tone adopted by my hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) and his Front-Bench colleagues; and, above all, the tone that all Welsh Members brought to the Welsh parliamentary party when we discussed the issue with the Secretary of State, demonstrated the good will towards having a sensible debate about changes. It was said earlier that the Secretary of State went from that meeting promising to listen, but reneged on that within an hour, if not within minutes. That is a disgraceful response to the generosity of spirit shown by Welsh Members.

Why is not the right hon. Gentleman accepting a single one of the sensible amendments for change that have been put before the House tonight? They are not large and unreasonable changes; they are attempts to take forward the suggestions for change in a reasonable way. Surely it is unreasonable of the Secretary of State suddenly to become adamant that he will not accept anything other than the motion that he has put before the House.

I want to refer to two of the amendments. The first is that tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), which I welcome. My hon. Friend suggests that we should examine the departmental report of the Welsh Office, thereby suggesting a degree of accountability. The Secretary of State for Wales should be willing to answer questions and to respond on the detail in the report before the Welsh Grand Committee. Surely that is what we are in Parliament for. We are here to legislate and to hold the Executive accountable. I should have thought that the Secretary of State would welcome the opportunity to account to Welsh Members for his report and that he would accept the amendment.

The right hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) suggested that the Labour party might lose its dominance in Wales and might, therefore, regret having suggested that powers should be given to the people of Wales through an elected assembly in Wales. It may have escaped his notice that the fact that the electors can elect whom they choose is known as democracy, and that the process can swing against a party as well as for it. The Labour party has no fear of democracy. If we lost our dominance, others would represent the people of Wales, and rightly so. I have no fear, however, of that coming about for many years, unless the Conservative party totally changes its attitude of intransigence to what the electorate in Wales wants. The right hon. Gentleman's comment demonstrated the Conservatives' lack of interest in accountability, and a wish to hang on desperately to power informed his criticisms.

It is right that we should pursue the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney that there should be a small degree of accountability, and it is also right that the Grand Committee should study the reports by the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs. The reports are often lost, although they raise important issues that interest our constituents. When we tell them that there is no proper debate in the House on many of the Select Committee's reports, they are surprised. When a Select Committee has gone into an issue in depth and produced a report, the Government have to make a response. Is it not sensible that there should be a proper and reasonable debate on the issues, and that the Welsh Grand Committee should be the place for those debates?

Amendment (y), tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), would allow the use of the Welsh language when the Grand Committee meets in Wales. Developments in recent years have allowed people the opportunity to use the Welsh language when they choose to do so. Those developments have been sensible. Increasingly, it has been a matter not of ramming the Welsh language down people's throats but of encouraging them to use it. I agree with the comments made by my hon. Friends the Members for Newport, West and for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) about the way in which Labour local authorities have encouraged the teaching of Welsh, and encouraged people to exercise choice rather than dominating them.

I was brought up in a Welsh-speaking family in north Wales, but I lost the Welsh language during my years in school. I welcome, therefore, the chance of relearning Welsh through adult education, as a second opportunity, and I also welcome the fact that, whereas I am semi-literate in the Welsh language, my children have had the opportunity of bilingual education and are able to speak Welsh. As adults, they have exercised their choice about what they do with that education and what they do with the ability to use two languages.

Is it right that the House took the decision for public bodies in Wales through the Welsh Language Act 1993, but that it is unwilling to apply that decision to our own proceedings when we meet in Wales? Surely it is minimal progress for us to legislate for public bodies and to place requirements on them, yet not to observe those requirements ourselves when we meet in Wales. The Welsh Language Act is concerned primarily with the activities of public bodies in Wales. We should surely apply those requirements to ourselves when we operate as a Welsh Grand Committee in Wales. That is a modest proposal.

As I mentioned earlier in an intervention, there are translation facilities in council chambers in Wales. At a recent meeting, British and German Members of Parliament were able to communicate because translation facilities were available. Translation is provided in a variety of public and private bodies, so why not have it in the Welsh Grand Committee? The Leader of the House said that the matter would be referred to the Procedure Committee. I simply reinforce the request for translation that was made earlier. Please let us have a speedy answer. Let the Government not drag their feet in the same way that they did for the Welsh Language Act, when there was unanimity of purpose in Wales and in the House.

This is an opportunity to turn a pointless talking shop into a place for reasoned debate, where we can hold the Secretary of State to account and have real debates on issues that affect our constituents. In the House, under a Conservative Government, the Secretary of State always has the votes to ignore hon. Members who represent Welsh constituencies. That is a fact of life, but he will gain greater credit and enhance his reputation if he changes the attitude that he has shown since the Welsh parliamentary party met and listen to what is being said by hon. Members who represent Welsh constituencies.

The saying to which the Secretary of State should pay attention is, "Bu ben byd bont," which means, "He who would be a leader must be a bridge." Let the Secretary of State listen to that and change his attitude, and help us to turn the Welsh Grand Committee into a place of meaningful debate, which will win respect from our constituents and the people of Wales as a whole.

9.15 pm

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a few remarks about the proposed changes to the Welsh Grand Committee.

During my time in the House, I have felt that the Welsh Grand Committee is an underused creature. It meets irregularly, but potentially it is an excellent forum, and as it is made up of all the Members of Parliament who represent Wales, it should naturally deal with business that affects only Wales. Opposition Members felt deeply disappointed that the Welsh Language Bill was referred to Standing Committee, not the Welsh Grand Committee. As the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) pointed out, many of the amendments that we tabled, which had all-party support among the Opposition parties and were popular in Wales, were voted down by English Conservative Members.

I very much wanted to be on the Committee that considered the Local Government (Wales) Bill, as did other hon. Members who represent Welsh constituencies. I naturally defer to my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Ainger) because of their experience and constituency interest, but I felt it highly improper that I could not speak for the new Carmarthenshire and for its powers and so on, when many English Conservative Members, who had no constituency interests, were voting down amendments tabled by the Labour party and the Opposition parties in Wales.

I broadly welcome the changes that the Government propose. The extra Question Time would be lively, although 30 minutes would not be enough, as many Back Benchers—especially Labour Back Benchers, as there are so many of us—already find it difficult to participate in the 35 or 40 minutes of Welsh questions. The time allowed for short debates—five minutes for the proposer, five minutes for the Minister and three minutes for other Members—is very short. I have some reservations about ministerial statements, especially if it is the Prime Minister or the Chancellor of the Exchequer making an opportunist guest appearance. Such details need to be changed, but broadly the measures are good.

I support the amendments spoken to by my hon. Friends the Members for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn). Indeed, I echo the comment made by the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) on the use of the Welsh language. It is no big deal. It should be straightforward. Simultaneous translation is widespread now, certainly in Welsh-speaking Wales and across most of Wales. It is easily practicable. In view of the precedent of the Select Committee, I cannot see why the Leader of the House and the Secretary of State are making such a mountain of what should be a straightforward procedure and why they do not treat the Welsh language on an equal basis.

[Mr. Alan W. Williams]

Another feature that is missing from the Standing Orders is the frequency with which the reformed Welsh Grand Committee will meet. At the infamous meeting of 20 February, the Secretary of State said that it would meet about eight times a year. We want at least that. The Labour party suggested that it should meet every other Tuesday morning—a regular spot, which we would all know to expect. That would be 15 or 18 meetings a year.

What will the people of Wales make of the changes, if the House votes for them this evening? The changes will give us a body with no powers that meets eight times a year for two and a half hours. That will amount to 20 hours a year. The people of Wales want something that meets at least 20 hours a week, with real powers to debate and exercise powers that are now the powers of the Secretary of State. That can come only when we have an elected Welsh Assembly.

The proposals are a tiny 1 per cent. of what we want. They are a small improvement. I welcome them for those reasons.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): We have had an illuminating debate, even including the comments made by the right hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts), and his particular concern to save the Labour party as the party of government in Wales. I can see which way he is veering on his retirement.

The presentation of the new Standing Orders and our amendments represent a missed opportunity for the Government to take a significant step forward in the conduct of Welsh affairs within the House of Commons. My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) spotlighted clearly in his speech the fact that we have here a fig leaf presented by the Government, in an effort to show that they are interested in extending in some way our opportunities to debate Welsh affairs. I suppose that we can go that far, because the changes in the Standing Orders will provide additional opportunities to debate Welsh affairs and to ask more questions about Welsh affairs, but they will do nothing more substantial. They will not allow Members of Parliament who represent Welsh constituencies to play a more practical and effective role in determining what happens in Wales.

The proposal made in a well-researched speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, our respected Friend with much experience, took one aspect of the business of the House dealt with by European Standing Committees, which could easily be used on the Welsh scene within the Welsh Grand Committee, to improve the ability of Welsh Members to question Ministers on their plans for any particular year in which they happened to be with us. They will not be there for much longer now, thank goodness. In view of what my hon. Friend said, some Opposition Members—no one knows who they may be—will be quaking at the thought of being on the Government's side of the Dispatch Box under the procedure that he has proposed and subject to questioning by him. Given that the procedure is already in use in the House, I hope that the Government will be prepared to support my hon. Friend's two amendments. We believe that they are worthy of support.

I was pleased that the Leader of the House was prepared to make a concession and consider the use of the Welsh language in meetings of the Grand Committee in Wales. My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), although I missed the early part of his speech, seemed to be making an effective case about why it should be natural for Welsh to be used in debates in the Grand Committee when it meets in Wales. My hon. Friends the Members for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) and for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) argued convincingly that there should be no technical or other problems with that.

I would go so far as to say that section 3(2)(b) of the Welsh Language Act 1993 gives the Government a duty to ensure that Welsh can be used in the Welsh Grand Committee in Wales. It is fair to say that the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee are public business and that section 3 states that one of the functions of the Welsh Language Board is to "advise persons exercising functions of a public nature on the ways in which effect may be given to the principle that, in the conduct of public business and the administration of justice in Wales, the English and Welsh languages should be treated on a basis of equality".

When the matter is referred to the Procedure Committee, the Government will have the opportunity to recommend, as the Leader of the House said, that it should consider positively the way in which the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, West can best be put into effect. While I accept that that cannot be hurried through in time for a meeting in a month's time, the Committee should be asked to consider the proposal with a view to bringing a report to the House that can be considered before the summer recess. On second thoughts, that may put the Committee under pressure because of rumours, which I hope that we can set aside, that we are due to finish at the end of May because of the Government's fears of not being able to continue for much longer.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Rod Richards): The hon. Gentleman should not bank on it.

Mr. Griffiths: I am still planning my holidays for August. The report should be made before the summer recess.

Given the angst that the run-up to the debate has caused, it is worth repeating that it was back in March 1993 that we first suggested that it would be worth reconsidering the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee to make it more effective. Since then, we have made several attempts to get a constructive dialogue going. Unfortunately, I was not able to attend the meeting of the Welsh parliamentary Labour party—

Mr. Ron Davies: The Welsh parliamentary party.

Mr. Griffiths: I am sorry. I was unable to attend the Welsh parliamentary party meeting because of my duties elsewhere—I was at the Standing Committee on the iniquitous Nursery Education and Grant-Maintained Schools Bill. It is most unfortunate that, within an hour of the meeting, the Secretary of State virtually rubbished all the proposals discussed there. When he replies to the debate, I hope that he will at least retrieve some of that ground, first, by reiterating the commitment that a report on the use of the Welsh language will be put before the House in plenty of time for us to consider it before the summer recess and, secondly, by accepting all the amendments that Opposition Members have tabled.

The first amendment is fairly technical and ought to cause no problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) outlined the argument for amendment (ff) on the quorum at the beginning of the debate. It simply falls into line with the practice in the Scottish Grand Committee and would certainly make sense, given the references already made to the fact that there are some parallels on certain basic points between the two Committees.

I hope that the Government will also accept amendment (a). Three members of the Committee with constituencies outside Wales ought to be a sufficient number when conducting the business of the Welsh Grand Committee. I hope that the Government are prepared to accept that—unless, of course, they think that a Conservative Government could come to power without any Conservative Members of Parliament representing Welsh constituencies. Otherwise, three members plus, from time to time, the one, two or three Conservative members of the Committee who might represent Welsh constituencies should be sufficient for them.

My hon. Friend also referred to amendment (p) and the need to ensure that the Welsh Grand Committee recommends that a Bill be read a Second time. A Bill should proceed only if it gains the assent of the Grand Committee. That would be a small but important step forward. It would establish a really democratic view of the Government's business in Wales.

Hon. Members cited a number of examples of how that might have helped the Government to avoid some disastrous mistakes, such as the poll tax, for which we have a permanent 2.5 per cent. increase on value added tax. The Government could have avoided that if they had tested the proposal in a Welsh Grand Committee that had the right to determine whether such a Bill should proceed.

A number of references have been made to the legislation to reform Welsh local government, the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994. As my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen said, he dearly wished to be on the Standing Committee that considered that Bill; he had direct interests that he wanted to air in detail on behalf of his constituents. As a result of the way in which the Committee was structured, the present procedures of the House and the fact that the Government decided not to use Standing Order No. 86, which would have enabled them to hold the entire debate in an all-Welsh Committee, he missed that opportunity—much to the detriment of the way in which that Bill proceeded through the House.

I should have loved the opportunity to take part in the debates on the Bill—as would many other Welsh Members—but there were not enough places on the Committee for Labour Members. It is no good the Under-Secretary of State shaking his head—he does not have local government responsibilities—and trying to claim that that is rubbish. Given the membership and size of the Committee, there was no opportunity for Labour Members to be properly represented on it.

Mr. Richards: Referring to the Local Government (Wales) Bill, the hon. Gentleman said that the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) wished to be a member of the Standing Committee. During the debate on that issue, I pointed out that that hon. Member, and many other Opposition Members, had shown no interest in local government in Wales, because they had not tabled written questions, asked oral questions or taken part in any debates on local government reform in Wales. Given that the hon. Member for Carmarthen had shown no interest in local government, why should he have been on the Standing Committee?

Mr. Griffiths: That is a facetious remark—and I shall treat it as such. There was obviously no intent to take the argument forward.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: As I am being discussed, may I point out that at that time my constituency had a strong interest in that matter, which involved Carmarthenshire county council? My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Ainger) represented Dyfed on the Committee; there was a strong territorial interest in being on it. That is quite different from what the Minister said. As the Bill affected my constituency, I wanted to be a member of the Committee that examined the Bill.

Mr. Griffiths: My hon. Friend is absolutely right on that point and there is no reason for us to dwell on it.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Might we dwell on that point just a little longer? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that Committee illustrated the frustration of Welsh legislation in the House? The Committee, with the support of hon. Members on both sides, defeated the Government on the issue of small counties in rural mid-Wales. The Government then chose to defeat the Committee on Report. However, the Government then decided to do exactly what the Committee had voted for in relation to Welsh local government, for English local government. What sort of a Government is that?

Mr. Griffiths: That was one of the ironies of the Local Government (Wales) Bill—Conservative members of the Committee were lobby fodder for the Government in terms of voting for a unitary system of government in Wales, but back home they fought tooth and nail to stop the local government boundary commission introducing unitary government in their constituencies. The reasoned amendment to the Second Reading of the Bill was the first occasion on which all the Opposition parties in Wales were united in the presentation of an argument against the Government's proposals.

The Welsh Grand Committee ought to be given the opportunity to have a positive say on Bills that affect only Wales. Of course, the Bills would then be considered in Committee, according to the normal procedures of the House. At least there would have been genuine approval of the principles of the measure by the Welsh Grand Committee.

When the Secretary of State winds up the debate, I hope that he will accept all our amendments and perhaps elaborate on how he hopes to put into effect the procedure for ensuring that the Welsh language amendment can be considered in detail by the House before the summer recess.

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. William Hague): This interesting and varied debate has contained some constructive suggestions and a little synthetic indignation from time to time. I shall respond to the points that have been made. It is worth remembering that the objective that we are seeking to address with these motions is one on which there is a good deal of common ground across the Floor of the House—although one might not have thought so at times this evening.

It is common ground that the procedures of the Welsh Grand Committee need improving; no one suggested otherwise tonight. It is common ground that the Grand Committee, as it stands, has not always been felt to be the most useful forum for discussion. It is common ground that it has not always been useful for Back Benchers because of the time that is taken up by Front-Bench speeches in the Grand Committee as it stands. It is common ground that, as a result, the Committee is not widely reported and has a ritual element. We should be clear in our minds about that at the outset.

Undoubtedly, the proposals that the Leader of the House and I have brought before the House will make the Grand Committee more useful for Back Benchers and their constituents. They will increase the time that is available for Members to question Welsh Office Ministers. They will bring in the concept of short debates, which will have the merit that the Grand Committee can discuss different subjects and do so within time limits. They will bring the concept of Adjournment debates—a procedure used by the Scottish Grand Committee—into the Welsh Grand Committee. All those things will enhance the role of Back-Bench Members of Parliament.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: All that the Secretary of State has said in the past few minutes about the Welsh Grand Committee and its defects is true, and has been true for 17 years.

Why have the Secretary of State for Wales and the Secretary of State for Scotland chosen this time to make similar proposals to change the way in which the Scottish Grand Committee and the Welsh Grand Committee discuss matters in Scotland and Wales respectively? Is it not the case that they have done so because they finally acknowledge that there is a case for devolution but are not prepared to answer it, so they are giving that answer to the people of Wales and the people of Scotland?

Mr. Hague: No. It is a completely separate argument from the constitutional arguments about devolution, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) rightly said.

We know that the things I have said are common ground because many of the suggestions for changes in the Standing Orders were made by the Opposition. I might equally well ask the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones) why he and other Labour Members produced their proposals for changes to the Grand Committee in the middle of November. We can all play the game of asking why things happened at a certain time.

I made proposals to the House on 30 November which largely, if not entirely, incorporated the Opposition's proposals. The hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) described my proposals as a fig leaf. If he believes that our proposals have been a fig leaf, what does he think he was wearing when the Opposition proposed their changes in the proceedings of the Grand Committee a couple of weeks before my proposals?

That is the background to what has been described as an atmosphere of confrontation and no consultation—Opposition proposals that have been largely incorporated into the Government's proposals.

We have proposed further changes in the Standing Orders, which would go further than the proposals of Opposition Front Benchers. One such change is for the Committee to meet in different parts of Wales. That system seems to work well in Scotland; the Scottish Grand Committee has met in a variety of places. The Welsh Grand Committee has already met in Cardiff in the past. It was a mystery to me why the Opposition's proposals did not include that proposition.

Mr. Rogers rose—

Mr. Ron Davies rose—

Mr. Hague: I give way to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies).

Mr. Davies: The Secretary of State mentioned two points that are a matter of contention between us.

First, when we made submissions—initially in 1993, but several times since—we said that we wanted the Welsh Grand Committee to have substantial powers to make decisions, not only to engage in the ritualistic passing of question and answer between Opposition and Government.

Secondly, the Welsh Grand Committee was able to meet in Cardiff without a change in the Standing Orders, so it is inappropriate for the Secretary of State to claim that we need to change the Standing Orders to allow the Welsh Grand Committee to meet in Cardiff. It already can meet in Cardiff; it requires no change in the Standing Orders. That is why we did not propose any such changes.

Mr. Hague: It nevertheless remains the case that that is a proposal that we made which was not made by the hon. Gentleman. He has not expressed any opposition to it, however, so it is one of the things on which there appears to be agreement across the Floor of the House.

Mr. Davies: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way, but we must get this clear. It was the Opposition who insisted, in 1993, that the Welsh Grand Committee should meet in Cardiff.

Mr. Hague: Then it is all the more surprising that that insistence was not carried through to talking about other locations. I am pleased that there is agreement across the House on that issue.

The second respect in which we took the proposals further is that we agreed that Ministers with United Kingdom-wide responsibilities—with responsibilities that cover Wales—should be able to attend the Welsh Grand Committee from time to time. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Social Security, and my right hon. and learned Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Home

Secretary, all have responsibilities that directly cover Wales and it is right that they should be able to attend the Committee.

Mr. Rogers: The Secretary of State talks about consultation. He must accept that when he came to the Welsh parliamentary party meeting that I chaired—we were thankful that he could come at such short notice—the Opposition thought that he had accepted some of the points made during the consultation process. We were amazed when he left the room and almost immediately reneged on some of the undertakings that he had made. If he talks about consultation and common ground, he must respect the statements that he made during those discussions.

Mr. Hague: Yes, and I shall come to that point in a moment and discuss some of the subjects that we debated at that meeting of the parliamentary party.

All the proposals are aimed at improving the Committee's workings. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) expressed scepticism about the changes. He thought that they were set in a different context and had a different motive behind them. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Conwy said, this argument is different from a proposal to change the constitutional position. If a sinister motive to undermine the Labour party lay behind our proposals, why did the Labour party advance very similar proposals?

We do not need to change the Welsh Grand Committee and its proceedings in order to discredit the arguments for a Welsh Assembly; all that we have to do is to ask the hon. Member for Caerphilly to give another interview to "On the Record", where he treats repeated and authoritative reports of division in his party by saying that everything is clear. In one newspaper that I saw at the weekend, he was reported as saying that the Labour party's policy was clear and would become clearer. We do not need to change the Grand Committee in order to discredit such arguments.

Mr. Rowlands: In that case, will the Secretary of State confirm that, in any debate that we have on Welsh devolution in the next nine months or so, he will not submit the proposals as his alternative?

Mr. Hague: Certainly. This is not an alternative to devolution; it is an improvement in the workings of the United Kingdom Parliament in the context of a UK Parliament. The proposal creates a Committee which hon. Members will find more useful, to which people will want to listen and which will do a better job of scrutinising the work of the Executive. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney sees it in a particular context—if the measure were set in that context, I could understand his scepticism, but it is not. We have already incorporated many of the proposals made by Opposition Members, who have had many opportunities to add to them.

As my right hon. Friend the Lord President said, I wrote to the hon. Member for Caerphilly on 14 December and offered a meeting. The hon. Gentleman says that I did not, but I have the letter, which states:

"I would welcome your comments on them"—

the proposals—

"and would be ready to discuss the changes if you would find that helpful."

If that is not offering a meeting, I do not know what is. If the hon. Gentleman does not think that that is offering a meeting, his difficulty will not be if the Committee uses the Welsh language, but if it uses the English language for discussion.

I met the leaders of the Opposition parties to discuss the subject and clearly asked them what alternative proposals they had. To be fair, they all made it clear in their letters that they would have preferred the establishment of a Welsh Assembly, but that is not common ground across the Floor of the House. I asked them for specific amendments to the Standing Orders as proposed and there was much sucking of teeth and furrowing of brows. It was suggested that we should not lay down a time of 10.30 am for meetings in different parts of Wales, as that might prove logistically difficult, and that proposal was changed in the Standing Orders. The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) said that nothing had been changed as a result of his suggestions, but that change has been made.

I was asked to discuss all those matters in the Welsh Grand Committee. That seems to have been the main bone of contention this evening. I have never deviated from my view that it is the House that has power to change Standing Orders, that the matter is of interest to hon. Members in general—not just Welsh Members—and that it should be debated on the Floor of the House. I recall expressing that view at the meeting of the Welsh parliamentary party, as well as in a television interview afterwards.

Mr. Ron Davies: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Wigley: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hague: I am spoilt for choice. I must give way to the hon. Member for Caerphilly, but I will give way to the hon. Member for Caernarfon later.

Mr. Davies: I hope that the Secretary of State is giving way to me out of choice rather than necessity, but I am grateful to him in any event.

If the Secretary of State believes now, and has always believed, that it is inappropriate for the Welsh Grand Committee to discuss such changes, why did the Government suggest—via the usual channels—that, rather than debating the subject on the Floor of the House, we should do so in the Committee?

Mr. Hague: I have made no such suggestion. I have consistently said that these matters should be discussed and resolved on the Floor of the House—and here we are, resolving them on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Wigley: The Secretary of State will recall that a number of constructive proposals were advanced.

[Mr. Wigley]

I acknowledge that one, relating to the variation of the starting time in rural Wales, has been taken on board; but why did not the right hon. Gentleman take on board the suggestion relating to European Standing Committee procedure, which I believe commands considerable support in the House?

Mr. Hague: I was coming to that and, if I do not take too many more interventions, I shall be able to explain more about the Government's position.

In the meeting to which I have referred, we engaged in a constructive discussion of a number of matters. The hon. Member for Caerphilly asked for reassurances about the timing and content of debates in the Welsh Grand Committee being determined by the usual channels, rather than solely dictated by the Government, and I gave him those reassurances. The hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) and others made their point about the possible value of the Committee's discussing Select Committee reports; I agreed, and I am perfectly amenable to the idea of Conservative-led discussions over the coming months.

In the meeting, I specifically said that I was amenable to the proposal of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney with regard to European Standing Committee procedure, and said that I was amenable. Let me make it clear that the procedure can be adopted under the proposed Standing Orders: a debate in the Grand Committee on a matter referred to it by the House could be a debate of the type cited by the hon. Gentleman, and could be dealt with in the same style as a European Standing Committee debate. I am entirely sympathetic to the idea of using one of the Grand Committee's meetings for that purpose in the coming months—but, according to all the advice that I have received, we do not need to change the proposed Standing Orders to achieve that.

During the meeting, the hon. Member for Caernarfon and I discussed the number of meetings that should take place. I think that he was relatively reassured by what I said. Some hon. Members mentioned the use of the Welsh language; my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House made an announcement about that earlier today. I do not think it fair to say that consultation has been ignored during the process that has taken place.

Mr. Rowlands: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Flynn: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Hague: I must press on, because I want to comment on the amendments. If there is time, however, I will give way to the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney.

We have heard some proposals this evening that were not made during our consultations, although there is nothing wrong with that. It has been proposed, for instance, that the Committee's quorum should be smaller. Given that the Committee became inquorate at various times during its most recent meeting, the proposition is not entirely unreasonable. The quorum of the Scottish Grand Committee is 10, as has been pointed out. That is a fair point, and the Government will accept the amendment.

Other amendments refer to the use of the Welsh language. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said that the matter could be referred to the Procedure Committee. We recognise that powerful points have been made. The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) did not need to watch me on television at the Council of Ministers, listening to a simultaneous translation; he could have seen me chairing a meeting this morning in the chamber of Montgomeryshire district council, half of which was conducted in Welsh. I readily appreciate the ease, speed and simplicity with which those arrangements can be introduced and how many of the places in which the Grand Committee could meet already have the relevant equipment. All those factors must be borne in mind by the Procedure Committee which, of course, must also bear in mind the important change of principle that would be involved for the House as a whole. We intend the Committee to examine all those questions. There are other things—

Mr. Flynn rose—

Mr. Hague: I must deal with the remaining points.

We have had frank disagreements on other matters. There were proposals for an increased or enhanced legislative role for the Grand Committee. Of course, the hon. Member for Caernarfon spoke from a completely different viewpoint on these matters. He has a wholly different perception of how the United Kingdom should be governed. We understand that; he wants to take the United Kingdom apart, so we approach the subject quite differently. We are making our proposals on the basis of the government of the UK as a whole.

There have been elections in which the Labour party won in the UK as a whole entirely because of votes cast in Scotland and Wales. Everyone accepted that, and I have never noticed Labour saying that English Members should make separate legislative decisions because they won a majority only because of votes cast in Scotland. The UK continues to be governed on the original basis.

Amendment (p) would set up the role of the Welsh Grand Committee quite differently from that of the Scottish Grand Committee, the European Standing Committees, Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation and Second Reading Committees, so we cannot accept it.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney wanted to intervene, and I now have time to give way to him.

Mr. Rowlands: I had intended to press my amendment to a vote, so I want further clarification from the Secretary of State. The key to amendment (dd) is the second paragraph which sets out a specific procedure about the first hour of questions. That provision does not appear in the draft Standing Orders, which contain many prescriptive procedural provisions. I cannot see how the provision that I seek can be added or informally agreed unless it is part of the Standing Order itself.

Mr. Hague: My advice is that it is possible to adopt the procedure that the hon. Gentleman envisages under the proposed Standing Orders. A Minister can make a statement and be questioned on it. That will be followed by a debate. The difficulty with the amendment is that it also contains other proposals, such as deciding matters on a substantive motion—perhaps that might be suggested in the amendment linked with amendment (dd).

I give an undertaking to the hon. Gentleman that if any difficulty arises in the coming months in following the procedure that he advocates, I shall certainly want to introduce a further change by way of clarification. I assure him that all my advice is in the direction that he seeks.

The changes are being proposed on the basis of government of the United Kingdom. That is the key to them, and it is the difference between our proposals and those of some Opposition Members. We have suggested a series of proposals to improve the workings of the Grand Committee. No one who has attended its meetings can fail to think anything other than that its proceedings should be improved. We have incorporated proposals made by the Opposition, but, in many respects, we have gone further, which is unfortunate for members of the Labour Front Bench who have struggled ever since to make this a party issue.

We have taken the proposals through a consultation process during which a number of additional ideas have been accepted. We have brought them for debate to the Floor of the House where we propose to accept further amendments which have only now been brought forward. That lengthy procedure, in which every Welsh Member has had the opportunity to participate, has been described at times as lacking in consultation or disgraceful. This full evening's debate on the Floor of the House has, oddly, been described by the hon. Member for Caerphilly as restrictive. This is the first time that a full evening's debate on the Floor of the House, as opposed to a debate in Committee, has been described as restrictive.

After examination, and given the range of reasons for improving the workings of the Grand Committee, we have now come to the right proposals. It is time to press ahead with them, so I commend them to the House and I hope that they will receive its support. Amendments that do not fit in with them, other than those that I have already shown flexibility over or that I have accepted, should be rejected by the House.

Amendment proposed: (a), in line 15, leave out 'five' and insert 'three'.—[Mr. Ron. Davies.]

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That—

(1) Standing Order No. 98 (Welsh Grand Committee) shall be repealed and Standing Orders A to G below shall have effect;

(2) Standing Order No. 87 (Attendance of law officers and ministers in standing committees) shall be amended, in line 9, after "business))", by inserting "or a motion in the Welsh Grand Committee under Standing Order (Welsh Grand Committee (composition and business))";

(3) Standing Order No. 89 (Procedure in standing committees) shall be amended, in line 3, after "business))", by inserting "Standing Order (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings))"; and

(4) other Standing Orders shall have effect subject to the foregoing provisions of this Order.

A. Welsh Grand Committee (composition and business)

(1) There shall be a standing committee called the Welsh Grand Committee, which shall consist of all Members representing Welsh constituencies, together with not more than five other Members nominated by the Committee of Selection, which shall have power from time to time to discharge the Members so nominated by it and to appoint others in substitution for those discharged.

(2) The quorum of the committee shall be seven, subject to paragraph (5) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)).

(3) The business of the committee shall include—

(a) questions tabled in accordance with Standing Order B (Welsh Grand Committee (questions for oral answer));

(b) short debates held in accordance with Standing Order C (Welsh Grand Committee (short debates));

(c) ministerial statements proceeded with under Standing Order D (Welsh Grand Committee (ministerial statements));

(d) bills referred to it in accordance with Standing Order E (Welsh Grand Committee (bills));

(e) such specified matters relating exclusively to Wales as may be referred to it in accordance with Standing Order F (Welsh Grand Committee (matters relating exclusively to Wales)); and

(f) motions for the adjournment of the committee, made under paragraph (5) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)).

(4) Any Minister of the Crown, being a Member of the House, though not a member of the committee, may take part in the deliberations of the committee and may make a motion, but shall not vote or be counted in the quorum.

B. Welsh Grand Committee (questions for oral answer)

(1) Notices of questions for oral answer in the Welsh Grand Committee by Welsh Office ministers on a day specified in an order made under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)) may be given by members of the committee in the Table Office.

(2) Notices of questions given under this order shall bear an indication that they are for oral answer in the Welsh Grand Committee.

(3) No more than one notice of a question may be given under this order by any member of the committee for each day specified under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)) for the taking of questions.

(4) On any day so specified under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)), questions shall be taken at the commencement of the sitting; no such question shall be taken later than half an hour after the commencement of the proceedings thereon; and replies to questions not reached shall be printed with the Official Report of the committee's debates for that day.

(5) Notices of questions under this order may be given ten sitting days before that on which an answer is desired:

Provided that when it is proposed that the House shall adjourn for a period of fewer than four days, any day during that period (other than a Saturday or a Sunday) shall be counted as a sitting day for the purposes of the calculation made under this paragraph.

C. Welsh Grand Committee (short debates)

(1) Notices of subjects to be raised in short debates in the Welsh Grand Committee, on a day specified in an order made under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)), may be given by members of the committee in the Table Office.

(2) Subjects of which notice is given under paragraph (1) of this order must relate to Wales.

(3) Not more than one notice of a subject may be given under this order by any member of the committee for each day specified under paragraph (1) of Standing Order G (Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)) for the holding of short debates.

(4) On any day so specified such debates shall be held at the commencement of the sitting or, if the order under paragraph (1) specifies also the taking of questions on that day, immediately after questions.

(5)(a) No Member except the Minister of the Crown replying to the debate shall be called to speak later than half an hour after the commencement of the first such debate.

(b) The Member who gave notice of the subject and the Minister of the Crown replying to the debate may each speak for five minutes. Other Members may speak for three minutes.

(c) The chairman may direct any Member who exceeds the limits in sub-paragraph (b) to resume his seat forthwith.

(6) Notice of subjects under this order may be given 10 sitting days before that on which they are sought to be raised:

Provided that when it is proposed that the House shall adjourn for a period of fewer than four days, any day during that period (other than a Saturday or a Sunday) shall be counted as a sitting day for the purposes of the calculation made under this paragraph.

D. Welsh Grand Committee (ministerial statements)

(1) The chairman of the Welsh Grand Committee may permit a Minister of the Crown, whether or not a Member of the House, to make a statement, of which prior notice has been given to him, on a matter relating to Wales, and to answer questions thereon put by members of the committee.

(2) Ministerial statements may be made—

(a) at the commencement of a sitting; or

(b) if questions are taken, immediately after the conclusion of proceedings thereon; or

(c) if short debates are held, immediately after the conclusion of those proceedings.

(3) Proceedings under this order shall be brought to a conclusion at the discretion of the chairman.

(4) A Minister of the Crown making a statement under paragraph (1) of this Order, who is not a Member of the House, may not do so from the body of the committee; and shall not vote, make any motion or be counted in the quorum.

E. Welsh Grand Committee (bills)

(1) A motion, of which at least ten days' notice has been given, may be made by a Minister of the Crown at the commencement of public business, that a public bill be referred to the Welsh Grand Committee, and the question thereupon shall be put forthwith; and if, on the question being put, not fewer than twenty Members rise in their places and signify their objection thereto, the Speaker shall declare that the noes have it:

Provided that no such notice shall be given until the bill has been printed and delivered to the Vote Office.

(2) The committee shall report to the House either that it recommends that the bill ought to be read a second time or that it recommends that the bill ought not to be read a second time, and in the latter case it shall have power to state its reasons for so recommending.

(3) Upon a motion being made for the second reading of a bill reported from the committee, the question thereon shall be put forthwith.

F. Welsh Grand Committee (matters relating exclusively to Wales)

(1) A motion may be made by a Minister of the Crown at the commencement of public business to the effect that a specified matter or matters relating exclusively to Wales be referred to the Welsh Grand Committee for its consideration, and the question thereon shall be put forthwith.

(2) If such a motion be agreed to, the committee shall consider the matter or matters referred to it and shall report only that it has considered the said matter or matters.

G. Welsh Grand Committee (sittings)

(1) A motion may be made by a Minister of the Crown providing (or varying previous provision) for the Welsh Grand Committee—

(a) to sit on specified days at a specified place in Wales, the sitting commencing, and proceedings being interrupted, at such hours as shall be specified;

(b) to sit on other specified days at Westminster at half-past ten o'clock, or at half-past ten o'clock and between four o'clock and six o'clock;

(c) to take questions under Standing Order B (Welsh Grand Committee (questions for oral answer)) on certain of the days specified under paragraph (a) or paragraph (b) above; and

(d) to hold short debates under Standing Order C (Welsh Grand Committee (short debates)) on certain of the days so specified;

(e) to consider specified bills which shall have been referred to it under Standing Order E (Welsh Grand Committee (bills)) on certain of the days so specified; and

(f) to consider specified matters which shall have been referred to it under Standing Order F (Welsh Grand Committee (matters relating exclusively to Wales) on certain of the days so specified;

and the Speaker shall put forthwith the question on such a motion, which may be decided at any hour, though opposed:

Provided that nothing in this order shall prevent the committee from considering further at a sitting at Westminster business adjourned at a previous sitting in Wales, nor from considering at a sitting in Wales business adjourned at a sitting at Westminster.

(2) The provisions of Standing Order No. 88 (Meetings of standing committees), so far as they relate to the naming of a day in respect of business by the Member appointed chairman and the committee's appointment of future days in respect of business not completed at a sitting, shall not apply to the Welsh Grand Committee.

(3) The chairman shall interrupt proceedings (other than on a motion made under paragraph (5) below) at the time specified in relation to the sitting by an order made under paragraph (1) above or, in the absence of such provision, at one o'clock, subject to paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 88 (Meetings of standing committees).

(4) At the moment of interruption, proceedings under consideration and not disposed of shall stand adjourned.

(5) After the interruption of proceedings, or on the completion of the business appointed for consideration at that sitting, whichever is the earlier, a motion for the adjournment of the committee may be made by a Minister of the Crown, and, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 88 (Meetings of standing committees) the chairman shall, not later than half an hour after the motion has been made, adjourn the committee without putting any question; and in respect of business taken under this paragraph, the quorum of the committee shall be three.

ESTIMATES [2ND ALLOTTED DAY, 1ST PART]

It being after Ten o'clock, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to paragraph (5) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates) and the Order [this day], put forthwith the deferred Question necessary to dispose of the proceedings on Supplementary Estimates 1995-96.

Class XIII, Vote 4

Question put,

That a further supplementary sum not exceeding £19,355,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to complete or defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on administration, for agency payments, the promotion of Government policy on disability issues, and for certain other services including grants to local authorities and voluntary organisations.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That a further supplementary sum not exceeding £19,355,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to complete or defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1996 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on administration, for agency payments, the promotion of Government policy on disability issues, and for certain other services including grants to local authorities and voluntary organisations.

MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER then put the Questions which she was directed to put at that hour, pursuant to paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 53 (Questions on voting of estimates &c.).

ESTIMATES 1996-97 (NAVY) VOTE A

Resolved,

That during the year ending on 31st March 1997 a number not exceeding 52,050 all ranks be maintained for Naval Service.

ESTIMATES 1996-97 (ARMY) VOTE A

Resolved,

That during the year ending on 31st March 1997 a number not exceeding 140,260 all ranks be maintained for Army Service, a number not exceeding 131,500 for the Individual Reserves, and a number not exceeding 59,000 for the Territorial Army.

ESTIMATES 1996-97 (AIR) VOTE A

Resolved,

That during the year ending on 31st March 1997 a number not exceeding 70,100 all ranks be maintained for the Air Force Service, a number not exceeding 19,305 for the Royal Air Force Reserve, and a number not exceeding 2,310 for the Royal Auxiliary Air Force.

ESTIMATES, EXCESSES, 1994-95

Resolved,

That a sum not exceeding £148,670,792.82 be granted to her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to make good excesses of certain grants for Civil Services for the year ended on 31st March 1995, as set out in House of Commons paper No. 196.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1995-96

Resolved,

That a further supplementary sum not exceeding £3,426,734,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to complete or defray the charges for Defence and Civil Services for the year ending on 31st March 1996, as set out in House of Commons Papers Nos. 197 and 260.

Ordered,

That a Bill be brought in upon the foregoing Resolutions relating to Supplementary Estimates 1995-96 and the Estimates, Excesses, 1994-95; And that the Chairman of Ways and Means, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Waldegrave, Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory, Mrs. Angela Knight and Mr. Michael Jack do prepare and bring it in.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (NO. 2) BILL

Mr. Michael Jack accordingly presented a Bill to apply certain sums out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the years ending on 31st March 1995 and 1996; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 72.]

Pensioner War Veterans

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

10.49 pm

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford): I wish to take up the case of my constituent, Mr. Jack Conn, which is linked to the cases of many constituents of other hon. Members.

Mr. Conn served in the Royal Medical Corps from 1 November 1939 to May 1946 and rose to the rank of acting corporal. He saw service in the middle east from 1942, and spent most of the time there until he left the Army.

Mr. Conn had, by all accounts, a fairly uneventful war, although, being in the Royal Medical Corps, he dealt with many casualties of battles such as El Alamein and beyond. Interestingly, his wife Sheena was the operator who sent the signal that conveyed from General Eisenhower's headquarters in Rheims the historic words:

"unconditional surrender of all German land, sea and air forces in Europe . . . all active operations cease".

That is a small by the bye for my hon. Friend the Minister.

On 13 June 1994, Mr. Conn, worried that he would have no medals for the 50th anniversary of VE day because they had been stolen from his son's house, contacted the Ministry of Defence medal office, requesting that his 1939-45 star, defence medal, Africa star and war medal be replaced, as they had been stolen in a burglary. They were being stored at his son's house at the time. The property was not insured because he had not believed that he had enough money to insure the medals.

Mr. Conn received a standard response, advising him that his records would be checked and that he would have to pay a charge to have his medals replaced. He had already sent his AB64 book and he thought that that would cover the search. He received another letter from the Ministry of Defence on 11 October 1994, saying that his records had not been found and asking that he fill in a further questionnaire, although he had already sent his AB64 which he had thought would be enough. The Ministry of Defence still needed more information.

Mr. Conn contacted me on 5 April 1995, and I went to the MOD and contacted the medal office, enclosing a copy of Mr. Conn's AB64, which he had sent to the MOD the previous year without much success.

Eventually, on 11 May, I received a letter from my hon. Friend Lord Henley, then Under-Secretary of State for Defence, saying that Mr. Conn's service records were still unavailable, but that he expected that his application for replacement medals would be finalised by July. That was during the 50th anniversary year and obviously it was important that Mr. Conn had the medals in the year.

On 18 August, I had to write to my noble Friend Earl Howe, who had replaced Lord Henley, asking what had happened to the application as Mr. Conn had heard nothing further from the MOD. On 8 September, my noble Friend responded, confirming that the medals that Mr. Conn was entitled to receive were there and saying that it would cost him £56.95 plus postage to have them sent to him.

Mr. Conn contacted me again to say that, unfortunately, he was unable to afford that sum at that time and would therefore be unable to claim his medals. Like many people, he was under financial restraints as a pensioner and the charge would, he believed, add to his outgoings and he could not justify it.

It is interesting to note that when the local pensioner group of which Mr. Conn is a member took up his case, the secretary received a letter from the medal office saying:

"Free replacements would be an unfair burden on official finances and it would be impossible to manage such a procedure and effect control to avoid abuse."

It was that statement that annoyed, if not concerned, Mr. Conn, as he felt that he was being dismissed as a problem rather than being seen as part of a previous solution.

I was subsequently asked by my constituents to petition Parliament. There were 1,400 names on the petition, which I lodged behind the Chair. Many of those names came from outside the constituency and I received a flood a letters at the time from many people laying out similar cases and problems. The petition requested that the House urge the Ministry of Defence to consider the plight of Mr. Conn and others of like disposition, having been awarded medals in recognition of their service in the armed forces of Her Majesty the Queen or her predecessors, and having been deprived of them by unlawful means or by misadventure and now being unable to replace them, and to endeavour to replace those medals. In essence, that is what tonight's debate is about; it is about the spirit behind that petition.

There was a small press campaign in The Sun to gain support for the cause. I received some fascinating letters as a result of that campaign, and I should like to draw the attention of the House to just one of them. It was from Mrs. Marie Meikleham of Andersonstown, Belfast, who had just paid the same sum for her husband's RAF medals. That amount of money constituted her weekly income from her pension and she felt that, although she had paid it, she had had to make some serious savings elsewhere. Her letter stated:

"I recently paid £56.89 to the RAF to have my late husband's medals replaced . . . He died 19 years ago after suffering five heart attacks in six years. Professor Frank Partridge, who was also a prisoner of war in the Far East, and a very well known heart specialist, told us that my husband's heart problems were probably caused by a lack of B1 while a prisoner."

I do not intend to draw on that letter too much, but it strikes me that Mrs. Meikleham's husband had died and she wished to have some memento of her husband, whose medals had obviously disappeared. She found herself in an invidious position; despite the fact that her husband, like many others, had put his life on the line for this country, she found that she had to pay for the medals. She had to pay what seemed to me to be a reasonably small sum, but was, to her and many like her, a large sum.

Realising that the problem was so widespread, I presented an early-day motion. To date, about 122 hon. Members have signed it; I asked only about 50 to do so but, remarkably, over the following few weeks, more and more hon. Members went to the Table Office and added their names. That is unusual; I did not chase them, but clearly the cause struck a chord with many of my colleagues.

[Mr. Iain Duncan Smith]

I later received a letter from Earl Howe in response to another letter that I sent to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the cost of the medals. Once again, the Ministry of Defence stayed with the line that the cost of replacing those medals must be borne by the recipient.

I should like to raise a few thoughts with my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces. Are we going to go through this saga every time we come up to the 50th anniversary of important military actions in which our constituents and their parents have fought—such as those in Korea or Malaysia? If many of those dismissive letters are sent out, it augurs ill for the relationship between the Ministry of Defence and pensioner groups, many of whom include veterans.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State is perhaps unique in Government in that he is one of a dwindling number of people who have seen service in the armed forces. I hope that he understands the importance of medals to many people—I am pleased to see him on the Front Bench to respond to me tonight.

Many like Jack Conn were not boy's own heroes, but simply went out and served their country. But it is that very sense of service that is at stake tonight. It is the fact that when their country called on them, they were not found wanting. Many of their friends and colleagues, who will be remembered through the medals, are not here today, because they were not as lucky as Mr. Conn and his like. The medals are a doorway to the past—a way of opening up memories and handing them on to their children.

As my hon. Friend the Minister will know, I am the last person to ask for increased Government expenditure, and I am not making an exception here. Such a small amount could probably be saved from any number of administrative budgets in almost any Whitehall Department.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): The £30 million of compensation to Spanish fishermen, for instance.

Mr. Duncan Smith: My hon. Friend places yet another amount on the table. I should be grateful if that were taken into consideration.

We set great store by entertaining overseas dignitaries and others. I wonder who comes first at the end of the day, when the budgets come up for grabs.

I make no apology for calling the debate, or for detaining the House longer than necessary. Although my hon. Friend the Minister is unlikely to accept my suggestion that the Government should find some way of paying for the medals, I urge him to accept the natural justice of the case, and to find some way in which Mr. Conn and others like him can receive their medals so that they need not, in exceptional circumstances, make the invidious choice of doing without medals which are important to them and which they may wish to pass on.

I hope that all Members of Parliament, from our right hon. Friend the Prime Minister downwards, will consider it fair and reasonable for my hon. Friend the Minister and other Ministers to understand the true nature of the sacrifice made by these men and women, and will make recompense by giving them what they deserve—their medals—as soon as possible.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Nicholas Soames): I warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan Smith) on securing this important debate, and on presenting his case in such a measured and moving manner. As a former Scots Guardsman, he is a worthy and eminently well-qualified champion of the cause of our service veterans—and this is not the first representation that he has made on their behalf. He has written to my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State, laid a substantial petition before the House and tabled an early-day motion which has—as he said—commanded substantial and largely unsought support. I am sure that those who have given a great deal in the service of their country welcome his support, and the robust, clear and sensible way in which he presented his case.

Campaign medals have been awarded to officers since the Armada, and to other ranks since the battle of Waterloo. Gallantry awards have a similar history: the Crimean war saw the introduction of the distinguished conduct medal for other ranks. All medals are a tangible reminder of gallant exploits, and are naturally a source of considerable pride both to those to whom they are awarded and to their families. After all, they represent public recognition of dedicated and honourable service to the Crown, sometimes in the most dangerous and difficult circumstances. Any of us who saw it need only recall the unbelievable, very moving and memorable sight of the massed ranks of veterans marching on the VE and VJ day parades last year to realise the wholesome pride and inestimable value that veterans rightly attach to their medals.

Before I deal with the points made by my hon. Friend, let me point out that—as he said—he sees the issue in a broader context than that of Mr. Conn. I trust that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I set out a little of the background. He outlined the details of one case, but I know that he will not wish me to limit the scope of my response. I hope that what I say will clarify the position of Mr. Conn, whose interests he has represented so tenaciously.

Our policy on the issue of medals is clear, and has been followed by all Governments. First-issue medals are issued free of charge to recipients; replacements are issued in certain circumstances on a pre-payment basis. All who have qualified for medals receive their awards free of charge. If they are still serving—as is the case with many medals awarded for service in the Falklands, with the coalition forces in the Gulf, in Northern Ireland or, most recently, with the United Nations protection force and the implementation force in Bosnia—service men are given their medals to wear with their uniform by their commanding officers.

In the case of service rendered during the two world wars, campaign medals were issued after the majority of service men were demobbed. After the first world war, medals were issued to individuals or their next of kin automatically. The situation after the second world war was slightly different, as ex-service men were invited to apply for their medals. Many did and received them at the time. Others did not, and it was not until the celebrations last year stimulated, for obvious reasons, wonderful, happy old memories—and not such happy old memories—that many finally came forward. Although, I regret to say, because of that there have been inevitable delays in issuing medals—delays caused by the sudden, immense demand—all those who have made their first application are entitled to free issue of their awards.

Indeed, I should like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the staff of the medal offices in Droitwich, Innsworth and Gosport, who have dealt with a huge number of applications in a very short time. Their work has brought great pleasure to many veterans and their families.

I should stress that, once issued, medals are, in common with any other personal belongings, the responsibility of the recipient. We expect those who are entrusted with their safety, whether veterans or their families, to take reasonable care of them and ensure that they are safe from casual loss. Most people have their medals insured as part of their house contents policy and do not leave them lying about or loan them to others without first considering their safety.

If an individual chooses not to take such care, or not to take out such a policy, it is entirely his own decision. To do so is not mandatory; nor, of course, am I suggesting that it should be, but there are always those who trust to luck that they will not suffer the unspeakable and unfortunate invasion of privacy or unforeseen disaster that might result in the theft of their valuables and do not make adequate provision for that possibility. My hon. Friend and I would not disagree about that, and such an event is, of course, a tragedy. I have every sympathy for those who suffer what is undeniably a trauma, but we cannot escape the fact that it was entirely due to their free choice.

I entirely understand and accept that medals will be lost in wholly unforeseen circumstances. Unfortunately, it is a fact of life that, despite the very best efforts of those looking after them, some medals will be mislaid through theft, fire, flood or other natural disaster. In such cases, my Department does all that it can to provide replacements where entitlement has been confirmed from surviving service records and where proof of loss has been provided by the claimant. We ask for copies of police reports or insurance claims to prove genuine loss.

Regrettably, when records are not to hand, the process of reassessment of entitlement can take many months to complete. To ensure that all are treated fairly, claims are dealt with in the strict order that they are received. Nevertheless, we are happy to provide replacements in such cases.

My hon. Friend will be aware that this policy extends, where medal stocks allow, even to veterans who served as long ago as the first world war. That alone is an extraordinarily remarkable feat—let us not forget that this is for service rendered some 80 years ago. In addition, if the circumstances are as I have outlined, my Department may supply replacement medals to first-generation next of kin.

I come now to the point of my hon. Friend's complaint. My Department does charge for the costs of replacing lost or stolen medals. Although we freely and willingly issue medals in the first place for nothing, we do not consider it appropriate for the taxpayer to foot the bill for replacements, although I accept what my hon. Friend said about the sum of money involved.

Replacements for medals lost in circumstances beyond the owner's control are therefore supplied only on pre-payment of the appropriate charge. I understand that this position is shared by the Central Chancery of the Orders of Knighthood, which has confirmed that it is its practice to issue replacement insignia or medals only on pre-payment.

I fully understand and acknowledge the splendid efforts made by my hon. Friend on behalf of his constituent, Mr. Conn. I understand that Mr. Conn lost his medals, the 1939-45 star, the Africa star, the defence medal and war medal—all of which are very honourable and form an impressive line-up by anyone's stretch of service—during a burglary at his son's home. The House and I have every sympathy for him. He is, as he knows, entitled to have his medals replaced on pre-payment of £56.95, the cost of the medals and postage. Unfortunately, we cannot make an exception in his case, since to treat an individual specially would be to treat many others unfairly.

I hasten to add that our policy of charging for the replacement of lost medals is not a new one dreamt up by a wicked, parsimonious Government. As early as 1899, paragraph 2042 of Queen's Regulations stated that "replacement at public expense will not be recommended unless the loss is proved to come under (a)",

that is,

"when the soldier was on duty and from causes entirely beyond his control".

We expect that the costs of providing replacement medals, whether to the recipient, serving or non-serving, or to relatives should not be borne by the defence budget. To do so would be a foolish waste of money.

I make it abundantly clear that, as my hon. Friend will understand, the Ministry of Defence is not in the business of selling campaign medals for profit. We leave that business to independent medal dealers. The charge for replacing medals represents the unit cost of doing so and is carefully costed from different elements.

Medals are manufactured for us by the Royal Mint, which invoices my Department for its services and for its material costs, including any bullion charges involved. Most campaign medals are, of course, made from base metals, but others have a precious metal content. On top of that, my Department makes a small administrative charge, which is intended to cover purely the staff cost of checking medal entitlement from records kept at the appropriate medal office, or, more expensively, of recovering an individual's service records from the archives. My hon. Friend will know better than me that that is an appallingly difficult task. Finally, value added tax will be charged if the recipient resides in the United Kingdom.

My hon. Friend may be aware that the value of medals can vary widely, even though the prices charged by my Department for certain categories of medal do not. For example, second world war campaign stars, which are issued in significant numbers, like the 1939-45 star or the France and Germany star, have only a marginal "collectors" value once they appear on the open market. In contrast, medals that were issued far less frequently, like the Aircrew Europe star, are worth more than £100 in a dealer's window, yet all three medals are issued as replacements on the pre-payment of just under £13. As my hon. Friend will realise, that is hardly the action of an organisation that seeks to amass profit.

In recent years, an increasing number of veterans have reported the loss of their medals for a variety of reasons. Apart from those such as theft or fire, for which little blame could be attached to the owner, other reasons cited have been house moves, medals being pawned or sold by the family or, understandably, medals being mislaid over the passage of time. I regret that, where the loss was avoidable or through simple carelessness, replacement medals clearly cannot be provided.

That will appear harsh on the face of it, but there are sound reasons for that stance. British campaign medals are highly prized, not in monetary terms, but because of what they represent. They are approved by the sovereign and granted for specific service where the rigours and hardship of campaigns justify national recognition. If we were to supply replacement medals on demand, without thought or care as to how the originals have been lost, the honours system's integrity would be undermined. We know that some individuals seek to abuse the system by falsely claiming replacement medals as spares, or more cynically for monetary gain. That is clearly unacceptable.

The onus must be on the owner to take good care of medals awarded by the sovereign on the nation's behalf in gratitude for loyal service. It would be wrong, after all, to use up stocks of medals by issuing them to people who had mislaid them at the expense of people awaiting their first issue.

I am glad that I have had the chance once again to pay tribute to the people who have given such service to this country over the years. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me the opportunity to set out my Department's policy. Although some medals have a high collectors value, it is the emotional and sentimental attachments of those emblems of past honour that are so important and I accept that they are what is so important to Mr. Conn and to his family. I am pleased to report that medals for service rendered many years previously are still available to people entitled to receive them. I confirm that it is the policy that first-issue medals are distributed by a grateful nation free of any charge and I hope that that will always happen.

It is entirely reasonable, however, for the Ministry of Defence to seek pre-payment for any replacement medals that are issued to recipients or their next of kin, following loss beyond their control. I do not consider it an appropriate charge to the taxpayer to pay for such replacements. If people choose not to protect their valuables through a simple insurance policy, that is their choice. If they do not take out insurance, they must be prepared to pay for replacement medals.

As I have said, no one is better qualified or more suited to raise such a matter than my hon. Friend. I hope that he will understand that I deeply regret that I am not able to accede to his request in this case. He has done a signal and valuable service in raising the matter. We have dealt with Mr. Conn's case, as we deal with all medal cases, with great care and diligence. I am most grateful, as I am sure is the House, to my hon. Friend for raising this important matter of behalf of his constituent.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

Disability Living Allowance

1. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received on how the changes to the disability living allowance regulations have affected current NHS patients. [18384]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): None. I have received copies of three letters to the Department of Social Security.

Mr. Turner: Does the Minister agree that reducing or abolishing mobility payments will have an adverse effect on the lives of disabled people everywhere?

Mr. Bowis: The hon. Gentleman is not one of the three people who have written to me about that subject. I am not surprised because, as an experienced Member of Parliament, he will know that it is entirely a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Mr. Tom Clarke: This is an important matter for 6.5 million disabled people. Do the Government accept that getting the issue right, in co-operation with the Disablement Income Group, will affect those who suffer from spinal cord injuries, for example? They are not supported by the national health service trusts, which have let them down by not making available the kind of services that they need. Why should disabled people pay for the Government's incompetence and insensitivity?

Mr. Bowis: The question on the Order Paper is not a matter for the Department of Health. The hon. Gentleman has raised issues that relate to my Department, which will play a full part in looking after the interests of disabled people, as he well knows. We have legislation on direct payments before Parliament and—as the hon. Gentleman might have had the grace and courtesy to remind the House and the public—only a few days ago we announced the introduction of the new powered indoor-outdoor wheelchair service for severely disabled people.

Organophosphate Poisoning

2. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many known cases of organophosphate poisoning in England and Wales in 1994 and 1995 were notified to his Department; and if he will make a statement. [18385]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): Suspected adverse reactions involving veterinary medicines are notified to the Veterinary Medicines Directorate and those involving pesticides to the Health and Safety Executive, and my Department is informed. Some 47 suspected adverse reactions to organophosphate sheep dips were reported in 1994 and 40 provisionally in 1995 in the United Kingdom. There were 29 cases of suspected organophosphate poisoning from pesticides in Great Britain in 1993-94 and 43 in 1994-95. My Department will shortly be publishing updated guidance for doctors on pesticide poisoning, which includes a reminder of the notification schemes.

Mr. Llwyd: I take no comfort from the Minister's answer, bearing in mind the fact that, since 1985, the Health and Safety Executive has made it a notifiable occurrence. Before long, the Government will be viewed by history as another Nero, who fiddled while Rome burned. While the Department of Health has played ping-pong with the subject—throwing it back and forth to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food—thousands of people in England, Wales and Scotland have fallen ill with that terrible disease. When will the Department get to grips with the problem by ensuring that those substances are banned and compensating the thousands of people who have suffered as a result of the illness?

Mr. Horam: As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the Veterinary Products Committee, which is the appropriate authority, has always said that the pesticides should not be banned. As I said in my original reply, we are issuing new guidance to doctors. The hon. Gentleman will also be aware that the Government are considering the Select Committee report on the matter and taking it very seriously.

Nurses' Work Load

3. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent discussions he has had with the British Medical Association about the work load of nurses. [18386]

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I have not recently met the BMA specifically on the subject of nurses' work load. I am, however, in frequent contact with the medical profession and we discuss a wide range of health issues.

Mr. Marshall: Does the Secretary of State accept that the new deal for junior hospital doctors can be implemented only with the co-operation of the nursing profession as nurses must adapt their role and take on new responsibilities? Is it not unfair that nurses should be awarded a pay increase of only 2 per cent. whereas junior hospital doctors are to receive an increase of 4.3 to 5.8 per cent?

Mr. Dorrell: I certainly acknowledge that the implementation of the new deal has implications for the nursing work load as well as that of junior doctors. I might have hoped that, in mentioning the implementation of the new deal, the hon. Gentleman would have welcomed the 2,400 new doctor posts that were created under that programme. The hon. Gentleman referred to a 2 per cent. pay increase for nurses. As he knows, that is not the position. As the review body recommended, the Government accepted the proposition that nurses' pay should be negotiated locally, subject to a floor of 2 per cent.

Mrs. Roe: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the warm welcome that will be given to the steps that the Government have taken to ease the work load of junior doctors? Will he confirm that there is now 99 per cent. compliance with the targets to reduce on-call contracted hours for junior doctors to 72 hours per week?

Madam Speaker: Order. The question relates to the work load of nurses.

Mrs. Roe: I beg your pardon, Madam Speaker. I thought that it related to work loads within hospitals—a matter that has been raised by the BMA. The hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) referred to doctors in his supplementary question.

Mr. Dorrell: As I said to the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall), the implementation of the new deal affects the work load of nurses. My hon. Friend is right to say that the new deal for junior doctors has led to a dramatic reduction in the absurdly extended hours that junior doctors used to work. The review body on nurses also reported:

"The allocation of resources for the NHS for 1996-97 means that most providers should be able to reward staff for improvements in efficiency and effectiveness while delivering increased volume of quality of care to patients."

The review body regarded that as a "win-win" outcome for the NHS.

Mr. Battle: Is the Secretary of State aware that the hospital trusts in Leeds have sent all nurses a letter saying that, from 1 April, they will be covered by new and independent bodies and that their terms and conditions could change? Will it not be the case that in future nurses will be held in reserve and hired and fired on zero-hour contracts that will undermine the profession as young potential nurses will not want to join a profession that has no apparent career structure?

Mr. Dorrell: No. The hon. Gentleman is wrong on virtually every count. By agreement with the unions, new nurses joining the NHS are being recruited on local contracts. The holders of existing national contracts continue to benefit from the terms of those national contracts and the trusts continue to be bound by them.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend accept that we have the best and most professional nurses in the world in our national health service and that we have recognised the special work that they do by the independent pay review body, although there is now an element of local pay bargaining? Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is some concern that, because of the pressure under which nurses are now obliged to work, some people believe that we are taking the care out of nursing and that only the treatment matters when, in a vocational profession such as nursing, care is equally as important as the treatment?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is right to say that we are blessed in the health service with an immensely dedicated nursing work force, among other professions in the service, and to stress the broader aspects of care for which nurses are famed and their contribution respected. I am sure that my hon. Friend will welcome the fact that, since 1979, at a time when earnings in the rest of the economy have risen 36 per cent. in real terms, the Government have seen nurses' earnings rise by a total of 70 per cent. over the same period. That shows the value that we attach to the nursing profession.

Ms Harman: Will the Secretary of State stop being complacent and admit that the British Medical Association is concerned, as we are, about the effect on patients of a shortage of nurses and doctors in accident and emergency departments? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that there are in most A and E departments shortages of specialist nurses, junior doctors, middle-grade doctors and even consultants? What action does the Secretary of State plan?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Lady is still playing the record that she played before Christmas, and she has been proven wrong by events. Before Christmas, the hon. Lady said that we would run into a shortage of junior doctors in A and E departments. I told the House last week that we conducted an audit on the subject a few weeks ago and found that 5 per cent. of junior doctor posts in A and E departments were vacant. The hon. Lady was wrong before Christmas and she remains wrong now.

Health Care

4. Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations he has had over the future of the independent sector hospitals in the provision of health care. [18387]

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): I have met representatives from the Independent Healthcare Association and individual independent health care companies from time to time, to discuss issues of concern to the independent sector.

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: My hon. Friend may know that the third largest independent hospital in this country is Benenden hospital in Kent, originally founded for postal workers and their families. Despite the fact that Unison has questioned whether that represents a two-tier system, will my hon. Friend assure the House that he has no intention of denying choice and diversity to trade union and Labour party members who continue to use that excellent hospital for health care outside the national health service?

Mr. Malone: It is rather good to see the words of partnership in the bible that was published 10 days ago by the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) being put into practice by some Labour party members. That particular aspect of the mixed economy in health care is welcome, and I am sure that it will endure.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: Will the Minister confirm that NHS hospitals have been asked to reduce waiting lists in the period leading to the next general election to 12 months wherever possible and that, as a result, Addenbrookes hospital in Cambridge has been contracting patients into private hospitals, including the BUPA hospital in Norwich? Why cannot the NHS provide for NHS patients?

Mr. Malone: I find it extraordinary that the hon. Lady attacks us for reducing NHS waiting lists. I understood that it has been accepted by the Labour party that we have partnership in health care. If the hon. Lady is suggesting that where value for money and effective treatment can be obtained in the private sector, that should be denied to patients, I hope she will explain why to her constituents,who would be denied the sort of health care that they are now receiving if the hon. Lady were ever to get into office.

Coronary Heart Disease

5. Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in reducing the incidence of coronary heart disease in England in the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [18388]

Mr. Horam: I am pleased to report that the trend in coronary heart disease is in the right direction. Mortality rates for CHD in people under 65 fell by 25 per cent. between 1987 and 1992. Since "The Health of the Nation" report in 1992, the trend has continued with falls of 10.7 per cent. in CHD mortality for under 65s and 7.7 per cent. for the 65 to 74 age group between 1993 and 1994. Progress, therefore, is very encouraging.

Mr. Coombs: The figures that my hon. Friend has given to the House are extremely encouraging, but can he confirm that there are still 140,000 deaths from coronary heart disease every year? Given that fact, how can the Government build on the success so far of "The Health of the Nation" strategy to convince that proportion of the population that continues to believe that it is immortal that that is not the case, and that sensible diet and exercise are worth while?

Mr. Horam: My hon. Friend is right. Coronary heart disease is still the major killer and my advice to everyone is to take more regular physical exercise. The House is not setting a good example. You will be aware, Madam Speaker, of the excellent facilities in the Boothroyd studio over the road in the Westminster gym. It is not well used by Members of Parliament and I say to everybody, "Get physical, release your endorphins and feel the stimulus of exercise. Look after your heart and your heart will look after you."

Mr. Kevin Hughes: What has the Minister to say about a recent Audit Commission report which says that access to coronary bypass operations depends on where one happens to live?

Mr. Horam: That is not the case. I have seen the report in question, but I shall certainly look at it again. If that is the hon. Gentleman's impression of the report, it is contrary to mine.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: While it is true that moderate exercise is very good for the health and for the prevention of coronary disease, does my hon. Friend believe that it is reasonable to ask young people to bicycle nine miles to school every day, perhaps to a school in my hon. Friend's constituency? Is it reasonable for parents to ask children to travel those nine miles?

Mr. Horam: My hon. Friend has a very real point.

Mr. McLeish: I am sure the Minister will acknowledge that, after the next election, Conservative Members will have more time to do any exercise that they choose. Will the Minister accept that, as 18,000 people die of coronary heart disease every year, we should be making a bigger effort to reduce those figures by more preventative measures and more treatment? Will the Minister also accept that a recently published report by the House of Commons Library shows that 40 per cent. of the district health authorities in England will not make the reduced target of 40 per cent. by 2000? Is not it a disgrace that people on waiting lists are dying because they cannot have access to a bypass operation? When will the Government stop being complacent and introduce policies that will address the real issues in the national health service?

Mr. Horam: If that is the case, I hope that I can count on the partnership of the hon. Gentleman in our Health Education Authority campaign, "Active for Life", which starts next week. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me to promote good habits.

"The Health of the Nation"

6. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on the targets set in "The Health of the Nation" in respect of encouraging (a) exercise and (b) a healthy life style. [18389]

Mr. Bowis: Good progress has been made on both.

Mr. Robathan: "The Health of the Nation" report rightly stresses the importance of physical activity and exercise—to follow on from the last question. Will my hon. Friend speak to his colleagues at the Departments of Transport, of the Environment, and for Education and Employment and ask them to encourage people to walk and to bicycle rather than to use private cars? Will my hon. Friend note especially that only 2 per cent. of schoolchildren in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), as elsewhere, now bicycle to school, whereas a huge number travel by private car? Does my hon. Friend believe that the House could set a better example and can he think of anybody who could set a better example in physical exercise?

Mr. Bowis: I cannot think what my hon. Friend means. The basic thrust of his energetic question is right. Moderate exercise is what is required, and a modest increase in the level of exercise taken by all of us would be beneficial. School sports certainly have a part to play—which is why it is such a pity that, not so many years ago, Labour authorities such as the Inner London education authority banned competitive sports.

Mr. Simon Hughes: In "The Health of the Nation", published in 1992, the Government set a target for reducing smoking by 11 to 15-year-olds by 33 per cent. within two years—by 1994. In fact, over that period smoking in that age group that rose by 20 per cent, according to a survey at the end of last year—especially among girls. When will the Government follow the advice of the chief medical officer and support a ban on tobacco advertising? When will they support the Bill which hon. Members on both sides of the House, including me, are promoting to discourage youngsters from smoking? Without that, youngsters will keep smoking throughout adult life and kill themselves much earlier.

Mr. Bowis: It is certainly true that not smoking is part of a healthy life style, but the hon. Gentleman is not quite right about 11 to 15-year-olds. Over the 10 years to 1994, there was a slight decrease in smoking among young boys, while the figure for young girls remained steady. That is not good enough; I want to reduce the numbers.

All the evidence shows that it is not advertising, but price and parental example, that has an impact. On that basis, we are setting an example that the rest of Europe should follow.

Mr. Garnier: With regard to the target set in "The Health of the Nation", will my hon. Friend encourage and commend the work of district nurses, community health nurses and school nurses, especially those employed by the Fosse health trust in Leicestershire, who have done a tremendous amount of work to encourage all sections of the community, from schoolchildren to elderly people, to take moderate, healthy exercise so as to fulfil the targets to which my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) referred?

Mr. Bowis: My hon. and learned Friend is right. We seek not a maoist regime of collective physical jerks but an informed society of people with the facts about exercise and life styles, who can then decide for themselves and their families what to do. There is clear evidence, as my hon. and learned Friend rightly says, that the nursing community plays its part in this. If we can get across the message about moderate exercise, moderate drinking, knowing how to cope with stress, and cutting out tobacco and drugs, we shall end up with a healthier nation that will meet "The Health of the Nation" targets.

Mr. Barron: The targets for smoking among 11 to 15-year-olds set by "The Health of the Nation" were for a total of 6 per cent., but the figure is currently double that, so the Government are clearly failing to dissuade teenagers from starting to smoke. On the eve of national no-smoking day, what further action do the Government propose to take, given that they are clearly failing our young people?

Mr. Bowis: The hon. Gentleman is right to refer to national no-smoking day, which we confidently expect to lead to another 40,000 people giving up. He will also want to welcome the work being done in the campaign to persuade people to stop smoking, or not to start it, and in the three-year campaign, about to start in April, aimed at young people. The Government, the health service and the nation make tremendous efforts to persuade young people to understand the facts about smoking; and we reinforce that with a price mechanism which results in part from the Chancellor's commitment to an annual 3 per cent. real terms increase in tobacco prices. Price and example are the ways to stop young people smoking and persuade them not to start.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Is my hon. Friend aware that the oldest person in the world, Jeanne Calment, recently celebrated her 121st birthday and reportedly gave up smoking at the age of 117? Does he think that there are lessons in that for a healthy life style? If so, what are they?

Mr. Bowis: I suspect that the message is to give up smoking at least four years before becoming the oldest person in the world.

District Health Authorities

8. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what adjustments he plans to make in the basis of the capitation formula for funding district health authorities. [18392]

Mr. Horam: The weighted capitation formula is kept under constant review, and a number of refinements are planned over the next few years.

Mr. Spearing: Does the Minister agree that, even with the York refinements, the present formula is unsatisfactory, as shown by the fact that, until recently, a psychiatric consultant in Newham was dealing with a case load that was double the national average? Does the Minister agree that the 12 per cent. that is allocated to psychiatric care is unrealistic and that the 24 per cent. allocated to community care is inadequate? Should not whatever cake that is provided by the Treasury be divided equitably and be seen to have been so?

Mr. Horam: I entirely accept the hon. Gentleman's point, but we are refining the formula continually. On his point about psychiatric care, we are developing the index for community health services. It may not quite be ready for the next allocation, but none the less work is being done on it, which, I am sure, will benefit his area.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Prime Minister's efforts to persuade public bodies and others to use the funding with which they are provided to pay the bills of those who supply the NHS will be welcomed by those suppliers? Does my hon. Friend recall that, in 1975, under a Labour Government, when inflation was running at 27 per cent., there was no inducement to pay bills promptly, and hospital treasurers referred to 31 March as the longest day in the year, because they did not close their books on 31 March, and did not pay their bills until the end of April?

Mr. Horam: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I certainly agree that the Prime Minister's initiative yesterday to publish a list of shame of Departments and the way in which they dealt with small companies is appropriate. I hope that the Department of Health will not come at the bottom of that list.

Private Finance Initiative

9. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many projects for health facilities in England are currently subject to consideration under the private finance initiative. [18393]

Mr. Dorrell: All capital investment proposals in the national health service are considered for suitability for private finance as part of the capital planning process.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Secretary of State accept that some projects and locations are singularly inappropriate for private finance? Will he give the House an assurance that the Government will not impose private finance criteria on inappropriate projects, thereby delaying them for long periods when they could have made rapid progress?

Mr. Dorrell: I acknowledge that there are schemes for which public capital continues to be necessary. That is why there is still a huge public capital investment programme in the NHS. I also believe it true that the private finance initiative offers us the best opportunity that we have had in the history of the NHS to bring the facilities of the health service up to date and to give the best possible opportunity to the professions working in it to use modern technology and modern facilities to deliver the best health care to our patients.

Dame Jill Knight: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the PFI is one of the great NHS successes? Bearing in mind its success, would he like to open a book as to when the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) might decide on this one to change tack again, to follow her leader and to back the PFI?

Mr. Dorrell: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's assertion that the PFI is an exciting thing happening in the health service.

Ms Harman: Nothing has happened.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Lady might like to take into account the fact that, over the past 10 years, despite the fact that the capital programme has been much bigger than it ever was under the previous Government, more than 10 projects—costing more than £25 million—have been given the go-ahead. That is 10 projects in 10 years. I have given the go-ahead to two more projects over the past three months. The hon. Lady knows that another 23 such projects are currently being assessed in the NHS. She seems to think it surprising that a project for which we announced a go-ahead in principle three months ago, costing £40 million, has not yet been signed in every particular. She is virtually unique in thinking that.

Mrs. Mahon: The Secretary of State will be aware that the tenders have gone out for the building of the new Halifax general hospital, and Tarmac, Mediclean or another company will presumably get the contract. Will he, first, give us his definition of clinical services and, secondly, give the people of Halifax a guarantee that their clinical services will not be put out to tender or run by such private companies?

Mr. Dorrell: I have given the assurance many times that I shall not approve private finance projects, the viability of which depend on clinical or clinical support services being delivered by the private contractor, unless there is clinical support locally for that particular scenario. That has been the position in the health service for many years now and I do not propose to change it.

Mr. Gallie: Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents can now use a magnetic resonance imaging facility in the South Ayrshire Hospitals NHS trust? It used a modified PFI, setting up a non-profit-making private company to provide that facility. Is that not tremendous news and a great example to every trust throughout the country?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. What he recounts is good news for his constituents and it is good news for every citizen of the United Kingdom because it shows the way by which we will be able progressively to improve the capital stock of the NHS. My hon. Friend is a trail-blazer. My hon. Friends will all want to follow where he has led.

Prescription Charges

10. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many increases there have been in prescription charges since 1979. [18394]

Mr. Malone: Sixteen.

Mr. Banks: If I had not heard that answer of 16 prescription increases from the lips of a Minister of the Crown, I simply would not have believed it. Does the Minister recall that in 1979 the prescription charge was 20p and, if that had been raised in line with inflation, it would still have been only 51p today instead of £5.50? Is it not also a fact that most of the commonly prescribed drugs cost less than the prescription charge? Prescription charges are a rip-off and, what is more, they are an inefficient rip-off. What miserable, pathetic, cringing excuse has the Minister to offer?

Mr. Malone: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but I have a few facts which might put what he has been saying in perspective. First, I hope that he understands that prescription charges will contribute £310 million next year to health care. How, if the hon. Gentleman were choosing to modify that policy, would he replace those funds? I hope that he also understands that the average cost of a prescribed item is £9.30, so the prescription charge is two thirds the average cost of the prescribed item. Those are important contributions to NHS health care. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman might well welcome them.

Mr. Booth: While my hon. Friend is asked to take tablets of scorn from Opposition Members, will he accept a dose of pride from Conservative Members? What other country in the world has 80 per cent. of all its prescription charges, regardless of cost, completely free to patients?

Mr. Malone: My hon. Friend is right to remind the House of that fact, but that is last year's figure. I am pleased to tell him that, according to next year's estimates, that figure will increase to 85 per cent.

Mr. Ashton: Where did the Minister get that figure of £9 from? Has he taken the highest prescription cost and the lowest to get that average, or has he taken the average of the pyramid of all drugs?

Mr. Malone: The figure of £9.30 is an average of all items that are prescribed. I am delighted to confirm that the charge still represents good value for money for what those who make the contribution to the NHS pay. If it is put in perspective, it will be seen by the country to be very good value indeed.

Mr. Devlin: Will my hon. Friend remind us who introduced prescription charges and who, after abolishing them briefly, reintroduced them at a higher rate? Will he also tell us by how much prescription charges are likely to fall under a Labour Government after a careful examination of the policy documents put out by the Labour party?

Mr. Malone: On the second point, my hon. Friend will get absolutely no answer from the Opposition. He is right: he need look no further than the Opposition to find the answers to his first two questions.

Young Girls (Smokers)

11. Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the proportion of 15-year-old girls who smoke regularly. [18395]

Mr. Bowis: The survey conducted by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys showed that, in 1994, 30 per cent. of 15-year-old girls reported that they smoked at least one cigarette a week.

Ms Lynne: One of the Government's reasons for not banning tobacco advertising is that it has little effect on young people taking up smoking, so why are the Government spending £800,000 on advertising smoking's dangers to teenagers? I know that that is a small amount of money, but if it has no effect, why bother to spend it?

Mr. Bowis: We do not say that advertising has no effect, which is why we have gone to great lengths to reach a voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry. That agreement has successfully reduced advertising at places where young people are. There has been a 70 per cent. cut in poster advertising. We have cut shop-front and bus advertising. There are controls on advertising within 200 m of a school and close to playgrounds. Price and example are the two key ways to stop young people smoking. The hon. Lady should recall that in Spain, where smoking is a major problem, the price of cigarettes is 56p a pack, but in this country it is £2.74 a pack. Since 1990, consumption of cigarettes here has decreased by 15 billion cigarettes a year. That is the way to success.

Mr. Sims: It is of course right for Ministers to encourage a healthy life style, as my hon. Friends have been doing this afternoon, but is it not also their duty to discourage people, especially young people, from smoking? My hon. Friend has enumerated a number of factors, but there is ample evidence that advertising is also a factor. Why do the Government resolutely set their face against the advice that they have received to impose a ban on tobacco product advertising?

Mr. Bowis: My hon. Friend is right in saying that we must go on seeking to influence young people, but the evidence that we have received is that a total ban on advertising would not be effective. The voluntary route that we and the Netherlands have followed is effective. We have had clear evidence that we need to go on educating young people about tobacco, keeping the price up, and encouraging parents and others to stop smoking, because smoking parents often lead to smoking children. That is the purpose of our campaigns, which have led to decreases in the number of people who smoke. Whereas in 1974, 45 per cent. of people smoked, in 1992 that figure had fallen to 28 per cent.

Mr. Miller: If the Minister is serious about this, why is it that prescription charges, for medicines that people need, have gone up faster than cigarette prices, for drugs that people do not need?

Mr. Bowis: That is a totally different question. We have one question about people who can afford to pay contributing to the cost of their medication—with, as we have heard, a colossal exemption in this country for people who cannot afford to—and another about ways of encouraging people not to smoke because it can harm their health. The price of cigarettes and the example set by parents, older brothers and sisters and other role models are crucial in winning that battle.

GP Fundholding (Lichfield)

12. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement concerning general practitioner fundholding in Lichfield. [18396]

Mr. Malone: Fundholding has brought considerable benefits to the people of Lichfield—not least improved physiotherapy and day care services at Victoria hospital. I expect all general practitioners in Lichfield to be fundholding from April.

Mr. Fabricant: Does my hon. Friend recall the prophetic words of the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) when she said that general practitioners do not support the concept of fundholding? Does not the fact that, by April, every GP in Lichfield will be a fundholder show that she was just a false prophet?

Mr. Malone: The hon. Lady wishes to abolish fundholding not only for everyone in Lichfield who will be served by it from April but for everyone else.

The example in Lichfield is being followed in the rest of the country. From April, fundholding will cover more than 50 per cent. of England's population.

Medical Research Grants

14. Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds his Department grants to medical research. [18398]

Mr. Dorrell: Expenditure from my Department's budget devoted to research and development in 1995-96 is expected to total £454 million. As well as the centrally funded programmes of research, that includes NHS expenditure on research and research-related activities. We are currently implementing the recommendations of the Culyer report, which are designed to strengthen our commitment to research and development.

Mr. Booth: When will my right hon. Friend and the Government spend much more on the hundreds of thousands of children who suffer from autism? Does not that subject need more Government funds?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is right to point to the importance of research and development to the future of mental health services. It is for exactly that reason that the directorate of research and development has said that it intends to use its increasing budget to commit extra resources to research and development in the broader field of mental health.

PRIME MINISTER

Deregulation

Q1. Mr. Steen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will establish a league table of deregulation initiatives from each Government Department. [18414]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): I am sure that my hon. Friend will welcome the further measures that I announced yesterday on simplified tax registration, new rights for business against enforcement action and simplified planning and development controls. I have arranged for a copy of details of the number of regulations repealed or amended by each Department to be placed in the Library.

Mr. Steen: I understand my right hon. Friend's reluctance to cover the walls of No. 10 Downing street with deregulation league tables. If he did so, however, it would highlight the difference between his approach to small firms and that of the Opposition, which will certainly increase the number of rules and regulations emanating not only from this country but from Europe. Will my right hon. Friend boost his own excellent approach by promoting Ministers—and, indeed, Back Benchers—who have good ideas on deregulation, and demoting those who have not? Perhaps he will have a word with the Leader of the Opposition, suggesting that he take similar action with his Front Benchers.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right about the importance of deregulation. We have undertaken comprehensive consultation with small businesses, and, as a result of what they had to say to us, we have set out a comprehensive range of action which will, I believe, have been welcomed across the small business sector. I very much regret the necessity to place extra burdens on business sometimes, but we are utterly resolute in not accepting burdens such as the social chapter which would undoubtedly make the country inefficient and cost us jobs. Small firms are the life-blood of the economy, and they deserve our support.

Engagements

Q2. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 12 March. [18415]

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Prime Minister recall that last Thursday he gave the House the clear impression that the Government had no intention of taking away the employment protection rights of 10 million workers in private businesses? The very same day, he was contradicted by the Deputy Prime Minister. Who really speaks for the Government, and what is the true position?

The Prime Minister: In no sense did my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister contradict what I said yesterday. [Interruption.] I am sorry, Madam Speaker, but noise from the Opposition does not make them right; they are just as wrong whether they are noisy or silent.

I made it clear that I had no intention of announcing those changes yesterday; nor did I. I also made it clear that we intended to look at unnecessary regulations across the board: I made that clear to the House. Nothing is automatically exempt, but, having been examined, nothing will automatically be changed unless the examination suggests that that is worth while.

Sir Terence Higgins: As the referendum is an alien concept inconsistent with our system of representative parliamentary democracy, would it not be a mistake to change the Government's policy on the issue? On a single currency referendum, does my right hon. Friend agree that a single currency, in the sense that every member of the European Union gives up its own currency in favour of it, is not likely to happen before the next general election, the one after or the one after that and that a referendum on a core currency, which would split the Union, is even less likely to produce a sensible result?

The Prime Minister: As I have said to the House before, let me say again to my right hon. Friend that there are circumstances in which we think that it might be appropriate to have a referendum on the particular matter of whether this country should decide to join a single currency, were one to go ahead in 1999. I have made that point to the House before; that is a matter under consideration and it remains so.

Mr. Blair: Does the Prime Minister recall that he used to be flatly against a referendum on a single currency and then—

Mr. Ashby: Tell us your policies.

Madam Speaker: Order. Mr. Ashby, you are not at a football match now.

Mr. Blair: And then the Prime Minister's position changed to say that the question of whether to have a referendum would not arise until after a British Cabinet had recommended joining a single currency. That was the position reiterated a few days ago by the Chancellor of the Exchequer: it would be postponed until the decision about the single currency. Is that still the Government's position?

The Prime Minister: If the right hon. Gentleman wishes to swap quotes on these matters—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] If the House is patient, I will come directly to the right hon. Gentleman's point, but I remind him, on the subject of consistency, that he once said:

"we'll negotiate a withdrawal from the EEC".

To be strictly fair, he did subsequently say that he "wasn't actually opposed to membership of the EC . . . I said at the election, within the closed doors of the Labour Party, that I disagreed with that policy on Europe."

The right hon. Gentleman did not of course say that publicly, which one might have expected from such an ambitious Member.

I have often said before that, although I do not in general favour referendums in our parliamentary democracy, there are circumstances in which one might be appropriate. One of those circumstances is were the Cabinet to make a decision to join a single currency. I have made that clear; that is still the case. We are examining at the moment what the appropriate circumstances might be. When we have completed that examination, I will ensure that the right hon. Gentleman is among the first few hundred people to know.

Mr. Blair: The right hon. Gentleman did not actually tell us whether the Chancellor's position remains the position of the Government. Can I put this question to him? Is it still his view that collective responsibility during the course of such a referendum would still apply?

The Prime Minister: The fact is, on the first point, that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor was with me and agreed in Cabinet to the examination that we are undertaking. The examination that we are undertaking covers not only the point that the right hon. Gentleman raised but a series of other important points that would need to be clear were such a decision to be taken.

Mr. Blair: So everything is up for review. The right hon. Gentleman used to be flatly against a referendum; now he cannot say. He used to be in favour of collective responsibility; now he cannot say. Is it not the truth that on this issue—[Interruption.] They do not like it, Madam Speaker. The right hon. Gentleman now cannot say on either issue. Is it not the truth that, on this issue, as in so many other areas, he is no longer able to be a Prime Minister taking these decisions in the interests of the country but is simply a full-time party manager trying to manage irreconcilable factions in his own party?

The Prime Minister: One of these days, the right hon. Gentleman will learn to quit when he is losing. [Interruption.] He just made it perfectly clear that he has no interest in collective responsibility, no interest in Cabinet government and no interest in the Cabinet discussing these matters—which is precisely what his Back Benchers say about the way in which he determines his own policies. When he has had a little more experience, he will realise that that will never work in government.

Mr. Churchill: Is it not fantastic that the European Court, the European Commission and the leader of the Labour party should be so hellbent on pricing British and European workers out of jobs and exporting those jobs to the Pacific rim? If people in this country choose, of their own volition, to work 48 hours or more a week, why on earth should not they be allowed to do so?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I strongly disagree with the ruling of the Advocate General this morning. We have one of the best records on health and safety at work across Europe. I do not believe that the working time directive can make any significant contribution to health and safety. We shall continue to argue the case that these matters are best agreed between employers and employees in the light of their own circumstances.

European legislation such as the working time directive is ludicrous, and we will continue to tell our partners in Europe that that is so. It is precisely because of legislation like that and stupidities like that, that the European Union is becoming uncompetitive and losing jobs to other parts of the world. It is complete nonsense and it is time that people began to stand up and say so.

Mr. Ashdown: So why did not the Prime Minister and the Government vote against the directive in the Council of Ministers? As the Prime Minister is in the business of swapping quotes, I shall remind him of two. In June 1992 he said to me, "I am not in favour of referendums and I will not put one before the British people." Last week he said, "I have never changed my view—it remains that a referendum might be the course of action to take."

Is it not perfectly clear that the right hon. Gentleman is not the leader of his party, but the prisoner of his party? How long will it now take for him to join us in saying that, when it comes to deciding Britain's future in Europe, Britain's people have a right to a say?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will know that his hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) has in the past admitted the differences in their party on the question of a referendum. He knows that there are sharp differences. The right hon. Gentleman has said that he favours a referendum on this issue. He should not be so uncharacteristically modest—has it not occurred to him that his splendid advocacy might just possibly change my hon. Friends' minds?

Mr. Hayes: If my right hon. Friend has the good fortune to bump into Sir James Goldsmith, will he remind him that, although he might think that wealth can buy privilege, it does not buy Members of Parliament and it does not buy Governments?

The Prime Minister: The only things for sale in this House are Labour party policies to the trade unions. [Interruption.] The deputy leader of the Labour party, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), says, "Change the computer." We would like him to change the fact that half the Labour party's policies are determined by the trade unions, that most of its money comes from the trade unions, that it is the handmaiden of the trade unions and that it has no independence. The trade unions pay for the Labour party and they own it—it was that way, it is that way and it always will be that way.

Q3. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 12 March. [18416]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wareing: Does the Prime Minister remember saying in April 1992, "Vote Conservative on Thursday and the recovery will continue on Friday"? When he became Prime Minister, the unemployment figure was 1,754,811, but in January this year it was 2,224,207. They are his figures. What went wrong?

The Prime Minister: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman what has gone right with our economy, and he can then compare what has happened in this country with what has happened in other countries. If he is worrying about what has gone wrong, he should look at Liverpool council to get an indication. The leader of the Labour party said, I think, to The Spectator some time ago that one does not know the character of a party until it is in power. We have seen Labour in power in Liverpool council, and we know exactly the character of the Labour party.

I shall tell the hon. Gentleman what has happened in Britain. We have the lowest sustained rate of inflation for almost 50 years—it is below 3 per cent; we have the lowest mortgage rates for 30 years; we have an unemployment rate well below the European Union average; we have the lowest basic rate of tax for 50 years; we are the largest recipients of foreign investment outside Europe, into Europe and more than the rest of Europe added together; and we export more per person than any other country in Europe. In spite of the pantomime drivellings of the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, that is what has happened in this country, and it is time that he woke up and saw it. It surely would not have happened with any other Government.

Intergovernmental Conference (White Paper)

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): With permission, Madam Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the forthcoming intergovernmental conference.

Britain has a vision of Europe that is reflected in the White Paper that we are publishing today, which is entitled "A Partnership of Nations". We want to see a Europe that respects cultural and political diversity; that does only those things at the European level that need to be done at that level; and that is outward-looking, free-trading, democratic and flexible—a partnership of nations working together to advance their national interests. The intergovernmental conference is, of course, only one means available to us through which we intend to realise our objectives. We shall continue to work tirelessly in all the other forums for the same goal.

Successive British Governments have seen the European Union as a means of safeguarding stability and creating prosperity in Europe. There have been frustrations and controversies, but, overall, the United Kingdom has greatly benefited from more than 20 years of membership.

The Government approach the launch of the intergovernmental conference in Turin on 29 March unambiguously committed to our membership of the European Union. We shall play a leading role in the Union as one of Europe's biggest and most powerful nations. Britain's voice is influential and it has helped shape the European Community in the past. Britain was the pioneer of the single market. We have been one of the leading advocates of enlargement and of a European Union open to the world. The Government believe that the European Union will succeed only if it respects the integrity of the independent democratic nation states that comprise its membership and if it is flexible enough to accommodate their political and cultural differences. The Government are totally opposed to a monolithic, centralised, federal Europe.

The treaty on European Union—like the original treaty of Rome—calls for an "ever closer union among the peoples of Europe"—

not, let it be noted, among the states of Europe or among their Governments. That aspiration for strengthened co-operation and friendship across the whole of Europe is a noble one, and is fully shared by the Government. However, it should not mean an ever closer political union in the sense of an inexorable drift of power towards supra-national institutions, the erosion of the powers of national Parliaments or the gradual development of a united states of Europe. The Government reject that conception of Europe's future. That is why it is crucial that national Parliaments remain the central focus of democratic legitimacy. Europe must develop with the instincts of free people in free nations. As the European Union matures, it needs a clearer sense of what it is and of what it should never aspire to be. Those principles are closely adhered to in the White Paper.

The intergovernmental conference is obviously important to the European Union's future, but it is not the only, or perhaps even the most important, challenge confronting the Union. Outside the intergovernmental conference, we must prepare for the enlargement of the Union to the east and the south, which will involve the Herculean task of reforming the Community's agricultural and regional policies. Meanwhile, we cannot ignore the urgent need to strengthen Europe's competitiveness and thereby generate new jobs. There will also be hard choices to make on a single currency and on the Union's future financing. Those crucial matters do not fall within the scope of the intergovernmental conference, although the United Kingdom is developing clear and robust policies in each area.

The Maastricht treaty came into force little more than two years ago. We agree with the conclusion of the study group that was set up to prepare for the IGC that "the Conference should focus on necessary changes, without embarking on a complete revision of the Treaty".

British objectives, such as a major reform of the common agricultural policy, do not need treaty amendment and will be pursued in other negotiations.

The IGC has yet to begin. In common with other member states, the Government are still considering their detailed approach. We may have further proposals to make as the negotiations proceed. The following represent our specific proposals for this intergovernmental conference.

First is subsidiarity. That is the key to ensuring that the Union concentrates single-mindedly on doing what needs to be done at a European level, and only that. The United Kingdom introduced that vital concept into the treaty of Maastricht. The principle has been developed at subsequent European Councils. It is having the effect that we intended, but more clarity is needed in the treaty. We shall therefore make proposals at the intergovernmental conference to entrench subsidiarity still further in the treaty.

Secondly, we are concerned at the way in which certain directives have been used or may be used for purposes that were never intended by the Governments who agreed to them—for example, health and safety articles that may be used for social policy, or fiscal measures that may be added on to single market or environmental proposals. Another example is the common fisheries policy, where the practice of "quota hopping" is preventing fishing communities from enjoying a secure benefit from national quotas, thereby undermining their entire purpose. The Government do not believe that directives, once enacted, are irreversible, and will press for treaty amendment if that proves to be the best way of ensuring that the original purpose of those directives is fully respected.

Thirdly, the President of the Commission, Jacques Santer, has said that the Union should do "less but better". Britain agrees. The volume of new legislative proposals being put forward has been falling rapidly, with only 19 proposals for principal legislation expected in 1996 compared with 61 in 1990, but there is also an urgent need to improve the quality of European legislation, and we shall be pressing for a range of measures to achieve that, including much wider consultation of interested parties via the Commission before proposals are put forward, and the automatic withdrawal of proposals that are not adopted by the Council within a given time.

Fourthly, national Parliaments are the primary focus of democratic legitimacy in the Union. The House, like the Government, rightly attaches importance to the role of national Parliaments in European Union decision making. We have taken careful note of views expressed in several helpful reports by Committees of the House.

We are examining a range of ideas, including a binding period for Parliaments to scrutinise Community documents before decisions are taken in the Council, and a greater role for national Parliaments in the justice and home affairs pillar.

The European Parliament, by contrast, already has a major role in the European legislative process, including a number of new powers acquired at Maastricht, some of which have yet to be fully tested. The Government do not, therefore, see the case for new powers for the European Parliament at the expense of national Parliaments or Governments.

Fifthly, we believe that foreign and defence policy must remain the responsibility of national Governments. The common foreign and security policy has, since its inception, achieved more than many had expected. It is in this country's national interest that members of the European Union should speak and act together on the world stage where our objectives are the same. Our joint support for the middle east peace process or for democratic institutions and market economies in central and eastern Europe is an obvious example. We shall be pressing for a more effective common foreign and security policy at the forthcoming conference. But, crucially, Britain believes that the common foreign and security policy must remain based on unanimity and be intergovernmental in character if it is to succeed. As the House knows, I put forward our ideas in a speech in Paris last week. Ultimately, the common foreign and security policy will carry weight internationally only if it represents a genuinely common policy, not a majority one.

Sixthly, the intergovernmental conference will also be considering the arrangements for European defence co-operation. The Government set out their approach in a full memorandum last year. That memorandum has been attached to the White Paper that is being issued today. We believe that it would be useful to improve defence co-operation in Europe by closer co-operation between the European Union and the Western European Union. We do not, however, believe in the integration of those two bodies or in the subordination of the WEU to the European Union. NATO must remain the bedrock of western security. The European Union, four of whose member states are neutrals, and which are neither in NATO nor in the WEU, cannot expect to take decisions on defence policy or on the use of military forces.

Seventhly, co-operation in justice and home affairs will be of particular importance in the intergovernmental conference, because terrorism, organised crime, illegal immigration and drug trafficking are among the greatest challenges facing modern society. They require a co-ordinated, multinational response. Substantial progress has been achieved in the past few years in that area, and Britain has proposals for improving that co-operation. But, as with foreign policy, the Government believe that those issues must remain intergovernmental and subject to unanimity if they are to carry the support of the peoples of Europe. Those are matters of high political sensitivity, involving questions of national sovereignty.

Eighthly, the European Court of Justice is another area in which we shall be pressing for improvements at the intergovernmental conference. Britain is committed to a strong and independent Court, without which it would be impossible to ensure even application of Community law or to prevent abuse of power by the Community's institutions. But the functioning of the court can and, in the Government's view, must be improved. There is very great concern that the court's interpretations sometimes seem to go beyond what Governments intended when laws were framed.

The Government are working up a number of proposals to enable the court to address those concerns better. They include: strengthening the ability of the court to limit retrospective application of its judgments; introducing the principle that a member state should be liable for damages only in cases of serious and manifest breach of its obligations; applying national time limits to all cases based on European Community laws, except where the member state's failure to implement a directive is in serious and manifest breach of its obligations; an internal appeals procedure; streamlined procedures for the rapid amendment of European Community legislation that has been interpreted in a way that was never intended by the Council; an accelerated procedure for time-sensitive cases; and a treaty provision clarifying the application of subsidiarity in the interpretation of Community laws. The Government will shortly be issuing a memorandum setting out their proposals in detail.

Ninthly, certain changes to the Council voting system will be necessary if the Union is to continue to function democratically in an enlarged Union. At present, the system of weighted votes is biased against the larger member states. There is growing acceptance across Europe that a way must be found to address that imbalance. Possible alternatives include changing the number of votes of larger countries so that population is better reflected. What is clear is that the system must not allow countries representing a significant percentage of the European Union's population or the major net contributors as a group to be outvoted.

Tenthly, as the Union enlarges to as many as 27 members, it will be necessary to change the current policy whereby every member state, however small, has a Commissioner and is responsible for a six-month presidency. Such a structure would quickly become unworkable in an enlarged Union.

As the White Paper makes clear, there are a number of other specific areas where the Government see scope for improving the treaty at this intergovernmental conference. Those areas include animal welfare and possible changes to the common fisheries policy, as announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food last week. There are many areas where the countries of the Union could and should co-operate more closely in their own national interests, and in the interest of Europe as a whole. But at a time when there is concern about Europe trying to do too much, we do not believe that the rules on qualified majority voting in the treaty should be changed to make it easier to override national concerns in matters of particular sensitivity. That is why we shall oppose the extension of majority voting at the intergovernmental conference.

Nor do we favour further harmonisation or the extension of Community competence in the area of employment. The need to create jobs is one of the highest priorities facing the European Union. But jobs cannot be wished into being simply by legislating for them; it is businesses that make jobs. That is why the Prime Minister negotiated Britain's social chapter opt-out at Maastricht—and our opt-out is here to stay.

The Government approach this intergovernmental conference with confidence and determination. This country's national interest is the starting point for our approach as, for all free nations, the national interest can be defined as the collective expression of the democratic process. In many spheres, our national interest coincides with that of our European partners and, in those spheres, working with our partners enables our collective effort better to achieve our ends. We shall argue constructively for treaty changes to improve the operation of the Union. We want to strengthen the treaty so that Europe can face and overcome the challenges ahead and, in particular, so that we can prepare for further enlargement.

As I have said, the conference is only one forum where we shall press for our vision of Europe. There are others and we shall argue robustly in all of them. Britain will be at the heart of the debate about the future of the European Union, because it is our future and we can best shape our national destiny by working with our closest neighbours to make a strong and effective partnership of nations.

Mr. Robin Cook (Livingston): As Britain approaches the important intergovernmental conference, it is obviously in the national interest that we should, wherever possible, seek agreement on the agenda for that IGC. I therefore begin by welcoming the matters on which we agree with the Government's approach.

Does the Foreign Secretary accept that we endorse what he said about the justice and home affairs pillars and the common foreign and security policy? Both subjects should be dealt with by intergovernmental agreement rather than through participation of the European institutions. Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the common foreign and security policy must remain a common policy, not a majority foreign and security policy? Does he accept that he will have our full support in resisting any defence competence for the European Union, which is not where Britain should look for its security interests?

We support entirely what the Foreign Secretary said about the importance of subsidiarity in making Europe more accountable to the people, by bringing decisions closer to them. Our only regret is that the Government do not practise subsidiarity in Britain. Does the Foreign Secretary agree that if the Government are successful in winning back some powers from Brussels, they should not keep all those powers to themselves, but should decentralise some of them from Whitehall?

I entirely endorse what the Foreign Secretary said about the importance of the enlargement of the European Union. There can be no greater mission for western Europe than to open its doors to the new democracies of central and eastern Europe, and to support democracy in those countries as well as the stability of their borders. If, however, the Government's commitment to enlargement is to be taken seriously, the Foreign Secretary must answer the following question. Does he believe that the European Union can admit another 10 or 15 members, each clutching a veto over the full range of issues that are now settled by unanimous vote? Does he accept that he has our full support in retaining a British veto on taxation, on changes to the treaty and on strategic political issues? Does he accept also that many people will consider the Government hypocritical when they discover that, after the Government presided over the massive extension of qualified majority voting and the Single European Act, opposition to qualified majority voting is now a guiding principle? Finally, I welcome most of all the positive tone of much of his statement.

The Foreign Secretary began by reminding the House that Britain had benefited greatly from 20 years' membership of the European Union. He ended by saying that we must work closely with our neighbours to ensure a strong and effective partnership. The Foreign Secretary's problem is that many of his hon. Friends do not agree with either statement. Is that not why neither his White Paper nor his statement has anything positive to offer on the three major issues facing Europe? Does he accept that Opposition Members believe that the top priority of European policy should be the provision of jobs?

Why then does the White Paper rule out the proposal before the IGC that the treaty should be amended to include employment as an objective of the European Union? The Government agreed at Maastricht to set targets on inflation, interest rates, fiscal deficits and national debt. Why can they not agree that a priority for the IGC should be to balance those monetary targets with a commitment to employment?

The Foreign Secretary said that the opt-out on the social chapter is "here to stay". Does he accept that the opt-out will go when this Government go? Does the Foreign Secretary not know that two thirds of the public want Britain to join the social chapter? Why should they not have a Government who speak for them at the IGC? Why should the workers of Britain be denied the same rights to information and consultation about the future of their country as those who work in Europe? The social chapter is a competitive issue: how do the Government, in the age of the knowledge industries, imagine that Britain can be competitive when the work force is kept in the dark?

The greatest omission from the Foreign Secretary's statement and from the White Paper was any contribution to the debate on the single currency. Does the Foreign Secretary not understand that no one will believe his claim that the White Paper does not discuss the single currency issue because it is not part of the IGC's formal agenda? Everyone knows that the real reason why the White Paper does not mention the single currency is that Conservative Members cannot agree on what to say about it.

Does the Foreign Secretary agree with the views of his colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who tells us that he is sympathetic to the single currency, or does he agree with the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), who tells us that the Conservatives would never give up the pound? The reality is that the Foreign Secretary dare not present a White Paper that tells us where the Government stand, because he knows that it would not be possible for both his colleagues to vote for it. Will he accept the simple, honest truth that no British Government can join a single currency without the consent of the British people?

The right hon. and learned Gentleman has produced a White Paper that tries to please everyone, but the result will please no one. The Government cannot make progress in Europe because they are paralysed by divisions at home. Britain needs a Government who can provide a lead for Britain in the IGC on an agenda of reform for Europe. The Foreign Secretary's statement and his White Paper's silence about the great issues facing Europe have demonstrated why Britain cannot have such a Government until it gets a change of Government.

Mr. Rifkind: It is rather rich for the hon. Gentleman to remind me that some of my hon. Friends might not take the view that the European Union has been good for Britain, when he spent his first 20 years in the House and several general elections campaigning to take us out of the European Union. He went on to comment about jobs. The Labour party, as represented by the hon. Gentleman, invites derision by pontificating about the need to help employment in this country while simultaneously seeking to impose upon industry the social chapter, which, as the Labour deputy leader admitted, would destroy jobs in Britain.

The hon. Gentleman was careful not to point out that the Labour party is already committed to removing the British veto on social policy, regional policy, environmental policy and industrial policy. Its documents say explicitly that there would be no permanent opt-outs under a Labour Government. If that means anything, it means that a Labour Government would roll over and lie down whenever a majority wished to press for some other proposal. When the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues say that they would never be isolated in Europe, that appears to mean that they would rather be popular than right. As long as they take that position, their views on the European Union do not deserve the respect of the House or of the country.

Mr. Norman Lamont (Kingston upon Thames): May I welcome much of what is in the White Paper and what my right hon. and learned Friend said about qualified majority voting and about the European Parliament, if we have to have one? Is not the real test of what my right hon. and learned Friend has said whether, over the next few years, Britain can avoid being sucked into a European state of the kind that many of our partners want, as I discovered at the previous intergovernmental conference? Does he know of any organisation in history that had an elected Parliament, a supreme court, a passport, a right of citizenship and a single currency, but was not a state?

Mr. Rifkind: I entirely accept from my right hon. Friend that the European Union is unprecedented. It will be unprecedented whether it remains in its present form, as we would like, or whether other member states press for it to go further. It is already unique, even in its present form. I remind my right hon. Friend that any changes in the treaty require unanimity, and we have made it abundantly clear that we are not prepared to countenance moves towards the supra-national structure that remains the aspiration of some of our partners.

Increasingly, the peoples of Europe—if not yet their Governments—are moving in a similar direction. We saw the way in which French opinion expressed itself during the referendum in France two or three years ago. There are similar developments in other countries. There is a historic process at work and a great debate throughout Europe. That debate may be slightly more voluble here than in some other countries, but it is already happening in France, Germany and elsewhere. It is our historic role to lead those who call for a Europe that is, as we have described it, a partnership of nations and not an incipient super-state. That will be our role and we shall continue to fight for that objective.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): Is not the Government's strategy—if it can be dignified by that term—towards the IGC in danger of imminent collapse under the weight of its own internal contradictions? How can the Government achieve a Europe that is closer to European citizens when, even now, they are denying the European Parliament—the one elected representative of European citizens—the right of access to and representation at the IGC?

How will the Foreign Secretary square what he described in his statement as the Herculean task of structural and institutional reform that will be occasioned by enlargement, with the fact that incoming states will carry vetos, but there will be no logical extension of qualified majority voting? They will be allowed a veto, but not always a Commissionership. That seems utterly illogical.

Mr. Rifkind: On the latter point, I do not think that anyone is seriously suggesting—unless the Liberals are—that, if we have 27 member states, we must have 27 Commissioners, regardless of whether there is any work for them to do. That would be a typical Liberal solution to such a problem.

On the earlier part of his question, I ask the hon. Gentleman to reflect on the wisdom of what he has just said. We oppose the European Parliament playing a negotiating role in the intergovernmental conference, because the IGC is exactly what the letters mean—it is an intergovernmental conference. The European Parliament has never had such a role in the past, and Britain and France strongly opposed such a suggestion when it was discussed in recent weeks. The French Government share our view that it would be totally unacceptable in an intergovernmental conference for the European Parliament, which is just one of several institutions, to acquire such a role. Why should it have powers that national Parliaments, which have at least as much claim to democratic legitimacy—some would say more—will not have in the IGC?

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): Does my right hon. and learned Friend recall that Chancellor Kohl, in his widely but partially reported speech at Louvain last month, said that no one wants a centralised super-state and that one does not and will not exist? Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that that approach is entirely compatible with the Government's statement that they want a partnership of nations, which offers an encouraging way forward in developing a European Union that responds to the aspirations of this country and of our European partners?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right to remind the House of that welcome statement, which Chancellor Kohl has made on several occasions. We must examine particular proposals for changing the treaty or the institutions, as to whether they would move us in that direction. I entirely accept Chancellor Kohl's good faith in making that statement, and we welcome his repeated assertion of that view.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): The House will want to study carefully the White Paper, which is important, but one's first impression is that its tone is right. I particularly welcome the emphasis on enlargement, subsidiarity, and the retention of powers by this Parliament and our own people. Following the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook), I put it to the Secretary of State that the issue that worries the people of Europe more than any other, rising long-term unemployment, is not centrally on the IGC agenda. There is a connection between the level of unemployment and the existence of the commitment to economic and monetary union in the Maastricht treaty. It is precisely deflationary convergence factors that have driven unemployment up to 20 million. Surely that issue ought to be brought forward and put centrally on the IGC agenda.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his earlier comments, and I agree about the crucial importance of employment and jobs. The IGC is one of several, parallel negotiations that will be taking up the time of the European Union over the next two or three years. The IGC deals with specific treaty amendments and the powers of institutions. At the same time, negotiations will begin on enlargement, and there are the continuing questions of European monetary union and the EU's future financing.

Employment will be an important feature in all those negotiations. We do not believe that the IGC can itself make a significant contribution in that regard, because amending the treaty or the powers of institutions would not, in our view, make a significant contribution to real jobs. Perhaps it is no coincidence that the one major country in the European Union that has falling unemployment happens to be the one country—the United Kingdom—that has declined to introduce the social chapter. It is worth reflecting on that point.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Given that the European Court is demolishing our fishing industry and social chapter opt-out, will the Government consider stronger measures to assert the rights of this Parliament against the European Court, including modifying the 1972 legislation or asserting our parliamentary right to review European Court judgments—just as the German court does?

Mr. Rifkind: Of course, we are willing to consider any constructive proposal to ensure that the European Court does not frustrate the clear objectives of Governments when they introduce legislation. That has been one of the most worrying features of a number of judgments in the past few months. I do not pretend for a moment that the task is easy. One way of completing it, as I mentioned in my statement, is to seek to amend the treaty where appropriate.

Earlier, I said specifically that if health and safety legislation is, in our view, being misused to seek to impose the social chapter by the back door, and that requires a treaty amendment, we shall seek to achieve such an amendment in the intergovernmental conference. That applies in a number of other areas, including those that I mentioned. In addition, we must review the European Court's procedures, to limit wherever possible the means by which it can advance objectives that are inconsistent with those of the Governments who negotiated particular policy proposals.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): In view of the centrality of the deliberations of national Governments, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman stressed, how can—will he listen to me—how can a British Cabinet even contemplate a referendum on anything?

Mr. Rifkind: I hear the hon. Gentleman's views, and they are not relevant to the statement that I made today. As he well knows, the question of a referendum is under consideration, and I cannot usefully add to what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, although there will be a wide welcome for his support of the centrality of the nation state, the fact remains that the European Court of Justice, with its present powers, can exist only to serve as an engine for a federated super-state? It will not be enough merely to contain the extension of those powers. If we are to maintain the supremacy and the centrality of the nation state, we shall have to reduce the powers that the European Court has given itself.

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that a serious challenge has to be addressed. On the one hand, we need a European Court to ensure, for example, that the single market is properly observed. Many would like to avoid their responsibilities under the single market, if they felt that they could get away with it, and the European Court has been extremely useful in preventing that. The European Court has also been very effective in a number of its judgments. For example, it fined Italy for avoiding milk quotas. We have been happy to welcome a number of such judgments.

At the same time, I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that we do not want a European Court that sees its role as making law—rather than interpreting the law that Governments have agreed—or that inadvertently makes law. That is a difficult problem and I do not say that we have the absolute answer, but it is an increasing priority that must be addressed, not just by the United Kingdom, but by the Council of Ministers as a whole.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Foreign Secretary aware that—quite apart from the effect of the convergence criteria for a single currency, which would probably cost millions of jobs in the Union—the right to tax, to borrow and to spend belongs, in a democracy, to the people through their representatives in Parliament, and no Government—Conservative, Labour or any other—have any moral or legal authority to transfer that power to others who are not accountable to the British electorate? Therefore, were such a proposal to come forward, it would be an attempted coup d'état to try to carry that through without the explicit consent of the British people in a vote on that issue in a referendum. That is a question that cannot be avoided, however long it is before the single currency becomes the immediate issue.

Mr. Rifkind: I very much agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the right to tax is one of the fundamental powers of a democratic and sovereign Parliament, and that is one of the reasons why any fiscal proposal must have unanimity under the current rules and why, as I commented earlier, we would be gravely concerned at any attempt to use single market directives as a means of indirectly implementing or proposing fiscal measures. If a treaty consideration is also required to prevent such an eventuality, we would not hesitate to argue powerfully for such a change.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that, whether one considers the question of Bosnia, the exchange rate mechanism, fishing, monetary union or a whole range of other matters, there is a clear sense in the electorates of Europe and the United Kingdom that the Maastricht treaty has failed the people of Europe? Does my right hon. and learned Friend also accept that the treaty amendments needed to make the changes to put that right, in the interests of Europe and the United Kingdom, require unanimity? How will he be able to achieve the objectives in the wish list that is set out in the White Paper except by renegotiating the Maastricht treaty?

Mr. Rifkind: The proposals in the White Paper do not in themselves require a renegotiation of the Maastricht treaty; but I accept that some of them will be controversial. We may start off with few allies at the conference as regards some of the proposals. That does not alarm or depress me. I recall that when the Government identified the need for a British budget rebate, we started without any allies, but after robust negotiations we got what we believed to be our right. So if the merits of the argument are powerful and convincing, in due course we shall prevail.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): As the cost to the British economy of exchanges with mainland European currencies is now as great as, or even greater than, the cost of our contribution to the budget of the EU, has not the time come to give positive consideration to the case for a single European currency?

Mr. Rifkind: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. We believe that the proper time to consider the question of a single currency is not in this Parliament. There is no possibility of that before 1999, and the Government's view on the matter has in any case been presented clearly on previous occasions.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend that NATO is the bedrock of European security and defence. Given his welcome approach, does he agree that the future of the Western European Union is probably very good if it can at last become the proper pillar of NATO in the European context? Does he further agree that a takeover by the European Union, which he has resisted today, must be repelled at all costs?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree. I welcome my hon. Friend's support, particularly as he is fully involved in defence issues affecting the WEU. The crucial point is that co-operation between the WEU and the EU makes sense, but it must be co-operation, not subordination. The membership of the two bodies is different; they have different treaty bases. It would be quite improper for the EU to aspire to a defence role—that is not its function, nor should it become so.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is it not true that, without the pressure of convergence, a number of our European partners would have found themselves in far greater financial trouble today—certainly on the inflation front?

Mr. Rifkind: If Governments choose to try to bring their inflation down—their public sector deficits down—that is highly desirable. If it happens throughout Europe in a rational and sensible way, the European economy can only benefit from that; but it must be done consistently with economic reality.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that his White Paper, which I know has not been easy to draft, sounds extremely positive? That seems to be recognised on both sides of the House, and it is welcome. Also welcome was his warning about the unending accumulation of powers by central authorities in the Union, and the need to hold them in check. But will he explain precisely how we shall put some substance into the drive for subsidiarity and the returning of powers to nation states? Has he seen a recent report that claims that, after two years of listing all the measures that ought to be returned to nation state level by subsidiarity, the only one that has in fact been returned is a directive on the management of zoos? That does not sound as if great progress has been made.

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my right hon. Friend for his welcoming opening remarks. The first step towards achieving what we all seek is to get entrenched in the treaty not only the principle of subsidiarity but, as we now propose, some of the detailed guidelines agreed at European summits. We know that whenever issues are in dispute, it is what is in the treaty that ultimately decides what the end product will be. So that is a high priority.

There has already been a welcome reduction in the number of new directives from Brussels, in part because of the completion of the single market process and in part because of the substantial difference in style of Mr. Santer, compared with the Commission headed by Jacques Delors. The trend in that respect is encouraging, but we have one heck of a long way to go. The more subsidiarity we can get entrenched in the treaty, the easier it will be to ensure that that is reflected in how the EU operates.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is not it time that some Minister or Opposition Front Bencher made it clear that political treaties do not last for ever, whether they are bilateral or multilateral? That will have to be faced at some time. We have had 23 years of this unmitigated disaster. We no longer use our own fishing fleets; the shipbuilding industry around Britain has been wrecked. Europeans never bought our coal and bought only very little of our steel. There are 20 million people out of work in Europe, and 4 million—the real figure—out of work here.

This has been a trail of disasters, and millions of people out there are longing for someone to admit that it has not worked. The halcyon days are over now. Neo-fascist parties are scattered all round Europe. Most Common

[Mr. Dennis Skinner]

Market countries have different views on Bosnia, Croatia and the rest. It has to be admitted at some time. The emperor has no clothes, and all treaties eventually finish up in the political dustbin. That is where this will end.

Hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Rifkind: I am interested in hearing these wise philosophical statements. I noticed that they were addressed to both Front Benches. I do not know whether I speak on behalf of the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) in any response that I make, but I ask the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to ponder on one thing. If the European Union has been as unremittingly bad as he implies, it is interesting that countries continue to queue up to join. At the moment, 12 countries are anxious to join the European Union. [Interruption.] There may be a variety of motives, but nevertheless the hon. Gentleman perhaps slightly exaggerated his point.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (South Thanet): May I welcome the parts of my right hon. and learned Friend's White Paper which, for the first time, seem to strike some good Euro-sceptic themes, such as the demands for new limits on Community action and new limits on the European Court of Justice, and, of course, the commitments to defend firmly our national opt-outs and our national veto? May I warn him, however, that if by any chance the important battles that he and his negotiating team will fight were to be lost or be surrendered by the revealingly new Europhile Labour Front Bench that we witnessed this afternoon, the House would, for the first time in many years, have to consider seriously the option of withdrawal?

Mr. Rifkind: I believe that an historic debate is taking place throughout Europe. I freely acknowledge that progress with the ideas that we represent is slow, but I believe that the partnership of nations that we envisage for the European Union goes with the grain not just of British opinion, but ultimately of that in other member states as well. I do not detect any enthusiasm in any country in Europe, outside, perhaps, certain elements of the political class, for some supra-national European nation state. I do not believe that there is any enthusiasm for that. If that is the case, given that these are all democratic nations, I believe that that will show itself in due course.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): That is a pipe dream. Is not the reality that the Foreign Secretary has said that he will negotiate changes to the European Court of Justice? He has said that he will robustly ask for this and for that. He is on a loser. Look at the position taken by the French and German Governments. A simple question: what will he do when his position is rejected, as inevitably it will be?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman may be able to put such a remark to his hon. Friends on his own Front Bench, who are terrified of being isolated, who have said that there will be no permanent opt-outs, and who wish to give up our veto in areas where we currently have it, but he is not entitled to make such a remark to the Government, who negotiated the British budget rebate, the opt-out from the social chapter, and the opt-out on the principle of a single currency. The hon. Gentleman should know that the Government's record in achieving targets that they set themselves has been exemplary.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that although it is necessary for us to support the enlargement of the Community, any such enlargement would involve as a prerequisite substantial and significant renegotiation of the finances of the Community and of the common agricultural policy? Does he further agree that there are some areas where the powers and resources of the Commission need to be increased, in particular the stamping out of fraud and the policing and elimination of illegal state subsidies?

Mr. Rifkind: Yes, that is indeed a high priority, and we have attached importance to improving the controls against fraud both in previous initiatives and in some of the ideas in the White Paper. I also agree with my hon. Friend that, as we move towards enlargement, that enlargement will render essential what the Government have long argued for—a major reform of the common agricultural policy in order to remove some of its more irrational features.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that the IGC will give the Government an opportunity to look again at their definition of the principle of subsidiarity? Does he accept that throughout most of Europe the principle of subsidiarity means that decisions are taken at three levels—the European level, the member state level and the national and regional level? Will he now answer the point put to him from the Labour Front Bench, that that should be the position adopted by the British Government at the IGC?

Mr. Rifkind: We believe very strongly in and have practised the policy of decentralising to individual people—giving people rights. The hon. Gentleman is obsessed by institutions and believes that freedom is extended when institutions are given powers. We believe that the best way of expanding liberty is to allow people to have greater control over their own lives.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): May I ask my right hon. and learned Friend two very quick questions? Will he clarify whether, as the White Paper suggests, we shall seriously challenge the Maastricht treaty and look for changes to it which would lead back to less pressure for federalism? Does he agree that a common currency—I ask him to be very explicit in his view—would lead to either increased interest rates or greater regional unemployment?

Mr. Rifkind: On the latter point, with regard to a single currency, that is obviously part of the current debate as to what the implications of a single currency would be. I shall not comment on that this afternoon. Those are issues that would need to be addressed before the Government could come to a judgment as to what the national interest might justify. However, with regard to any changes to the Maastricht treaty or to other parts of the acquis, we are very willing to argue robustly for changes wherever we believe that policies are being implemented in a way contrary to that which the Council of Ministers intended when the proposals were originally approved.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): Is not it the case that the Foreign Secretary said that British national interest would be the starting point in negotiations at the IGC? Why will he therefore not support the idea of extending majority voting in areas where there is a clear national interest, as in research and development?

Mr. Rifkind: I do not accept that that would be in the national interest. One of the most crucial questions is control of public expenditure, and there has often been a tendency in a majority of other countries to have a much laxer approach to increasing public expenditure, including in that area, than we believe appropriate. Therefore, I do not acknowledge the point that the hon. Gentleman is implying.

Mr. Tim Rathbone (Lewes): Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that there is a dilemma in people's minds on both sides of the House about the question of a referendum, in that those who defend the rights of this Parliament seem to be the ones who argue most vociferously for having a referendum, which would undercut those rights? Will he bear that in mind when approaching that subject?

Will my right hon. and learned Friend also bear in mind the help that we would gain as a nation from the extension of qualified majority voting to the reform of some of the areas of Community activity where we want to see reform, most particularly, perhaps, the common agricultural policy, to which he referred in his statement?

Mr. Rifkind: The reform of the common agricultural policy is already subject to qualified majority voting in every respect other than the guidelines of total expenditure. All the changes that we would wish to see can, almost without exception, be achieved under the existing arrangements of qualified majority voting in the CAP. The problem is getting the majority. That is itself a pretty difficult task, but it is not the system of voting that is the difficulty in this case.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): If the Foreign Secretary is serious about giving people control over their own lives, why will he not put the results of these negotiations to the British people in a referendum?

Mr. Rifkind: We do not yet know what the results of the negotiations will be. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said some time ago, we cannot contemplate how to present the results of the negotiations until we know whether they are minor, significant or substantial.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): May I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on making it plain that Britain does not want any further moves towards federalism in Europe, but may I suggest that that will not be enough for the British people and that, at some stage, we shall have to say no to one of the ludicrous laws that comes from Brussels, to disobey and thus demonstrate to the peoples of Europe that we must have a looser relationship through amendment of existing treaties?

Mr. Rifkind: I thank my hon. Friend for his earlier comments. With regard to the latter part of his question, the appropriate way to ensure the protection of the national interest is to enter into negotiation on any changes that we believe to be necessary. Of course, negotiations are always difficult—they are difficult for other countries as well. The unanimity that is a protection for us is also a protection for them, but, in such a partnership, one needs to identify what is acceptable to each member state if the European Union is to prosper.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Do not the Foreign Secretary's comments about the European Court of Justice smack of sour grapes, especially after this morning's ruling on the working hours directive, which surely exposed the Government's dishonesty in attempting to suppress information from the Department of Health, which stated that working more than 48 hours a week doubles the risk of coronary heart disease and that it is a myth that working longer hours means working more productively? Did not the Government know that their case was fundamentally flawed when they brought it? Surely the answer should have been not to bring it in the first place.

Mr. Rifkind: If the requirement of a maximum of 48 hours were to apply to hon. Members and, in particular, to members of the Government, that would represent a remarkable change in our life style. Whether it would improve my health is not for me to comment on.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): I welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's espousal today of a vision of a Europe of sovereign nation states, and I note his comment that we have few allies. If negotiations do not make satisfactory progress from our point of view, is he prepared to veto the whole process?

Mr. Rifkind: This negotiation may run for a whole year, so I shall not speculate on what might happen at the end of that process, but we can prevent any proposals from other countries that we find unacceptable. There is an absolute requirement for unanimity. That sometimes works to our advantage and it might sometimes work to our disadvantage, but it ensures that no new proposals can be imposed on us without our agreement.

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East): In his statement, the Foreign Secretary said that the Government are approaching the IGC with confidence and determination. Why then do the Government so lack confidence in their Back Benchers that they have refused to table a motion that could be amended, for the debate on Thursday week? Is it because they know that they could not win such a vote? Is that not a sign of weakness and cowardice?

Mr. Rifkind: On the contrary; it has been the custom, in relation to all previous conferences of this sort, to provide an opportunity for the House to debate and to raise such issues at the beginning of the negotiation. When conclusions were reached, the Government would of course require the support of the House if any were to be implemented.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): In welcoming the publication of the White Paper and the broad thrust of the proposals—apart from the Foreign Office Euro-nonsense on page 3—should we not feel rather depressed, observing that the wording of this morning's decision by the Advocate General effectively means that the whole social chapter will be applied to Britain, despite the massive battle that the Government have put up? We give the Foreign Secretary our best wishes for his hard battle; does he agree that there is no way that he will bring any treaty to the House unless the European Court of Justice fundamentally changes its policies?

Mr. Rifkind: What we have today is an opinion by the Advocate General. We shall continue to argue our view to the Court, but as I said in my statement and in the White Paper, even if we are unsuccessful, we shall raise the matter, if necessary, in the IGC and seek the treaty or other changes that will be necessary, to ensure that the Council of Ministers' decisions are not rendered nugatory by an abuse of the procedure.

Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham): The White Paper will repay careful study. On a quick reading, however, one verb jumps from many a page: oppose, oppose, oppose. The trouble with the White Paper is that, rather than being a document of constructive Government engagement, it is a document for the Back Benchers of the Foreign Secretary's own party.

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell us whether Sir James Goldsmith will be consulted in connection with this document or future White Papers? He certainly seems to be determining Cabinet policy on the referendum at present.

Mr. Rifkind: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman read the document. He was good enough to acknowledge that he had not yet had a chance to do so—and, if I may say so, that was obvious from his question.

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford): My right hon. and learned Friend will have noticed that many hon. Members have mentioned the European Court of Justice. Does he accept that the European Court has become the ratchet of centralisation, mostly because it legislates by reading what it believes to be the intentions of the legislators, rather than treaty-based documents? I urge my right hon. and learned Friend, at the forthcoming IGC, to get our partners to agree to exclude that possibility from future judgments; part of the problem will then be resolved.

Mr. Rifkind: I agree that good progress would be made if there were a requirement for strict interpretation of matters in the treaty or the directives. That would not eliminate, but would considerably reduce, the opportunity for the European Court to make law as opposed to interpreting it. That could only be in the public interest not just of this country, but of Europe as a whole.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): The Foreign Secretary said that he wanted a flexible Europe, and also enlargement. Given that other European Union countries are hardly likely to agree to an enlargement to 27 states without moving towards qualified majority voting, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman's position mean either that he favours total inflexibility and immobility in the Union, or that he is really against enlargement?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman implies that we do not already have substantial qualified majority voting. He knows perfectly well that we do: that is the whole point. We have a substantial amount of qualified majority voting on the common agricultural policy, the single market and a number of other matters. We believe that that process has gone far enough, and we do not see any need to take it further because of enlargement. I reflect on the fact that NATO, with 15 members, has never had a vote in the past 50 years—it has never had a vote in its history—yet it has been able to function very effectively. I know that we are talking about a different organisation, but to some extent similar principles apply.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, over the centuries, Britain's time-honoured role has been to speak on behalf of the peoples of Europe and to protect them from the actions of patrician and arrogant elites—whether those elites incorporate kings, emperors, dictators or Commissioners? Does he also agree that it is honourable and not sceptical to oppose policies in Europe that would produce a slow but inevitable economic decline, and that it is honourable and not sceptical to oppose forces that would still like to bring about a European corporate state? I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend on the tone of his statement and the way in which he set out his objectives in that regard, but I ask him to consider seriously the points that have been made about the European Court of Justice. Britain is uniquely defenceless against its acts.

Mr. Rifkind: I agree that the European Court is a matter of increasing importance. I said in my statement that, in addition to the White Paper, we would publish a memorandum in the near future that would go into greater detail about what we believe ought to be achieved and ought to be negotiated with our partners. That demonstrates the priority that we attach to the subject.

Madam Speaker: Thank you. We shall now move on to other business.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Will hon. Members who have been standing for an hour without being called get favourable consideration the next time that the subject of the statement comes up?

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that with a major statement, it is virtually impossible to call all hon. Members who are anxious to put questions. Questions went on for more than an hour. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I am fully aware of the Members whom I have not been able to call. I have a complete list of such Members from both sides of the House. I cannot give a commitment that they will be called the next time that the subject comes before us.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West) rose—

Madam Speaker: Just a moment; I have not finished. The hon. Gentleman has a lot to say; I have quite a lot to say, too. I cannot give a commitment that those Members will be called next week when we debate the subject, but I shall certainly do my best to ensure that they are recognised as often as I can. I know who has been standing today, how long the statement went on and the keenness with which Members wanted to question the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Banks: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. During a ministerial statement, do you have to follow the convention of calling Privy Councillors, who all get called nearly every time that we have a statement? I understand that they take precedence in debates, but does that hold true for ministerial statements?

Madam Speaker: I called the hon. Gentleman twice out of the last three times that the Prime Minister made a statement on European affairs at the Dispatch Box. I have a list of the times that hon. Members are called. The hon. Gentleman does very well indeed at statements. If he would let me have a list of the Privy Councillors who have had privileges over him, I should be glad to receive it. I called two Opposition Privy Councillors. One of those I called first, the other by no means first, but way down the list. I am not clear about the Privy Councillors on the Government Benches. I tend to call some of them first, but by no means do they get priority during statements. They receive a little priority during debates, but certainly not for asking questions on statements.

Mr. Banks: How many were left standing?

Madam Speaker: I asked the hon. Gentleman to let me have a list of how many stood in the first place. I know how many there were; I doubt whether he does.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(4) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

ROAD TRAFFIC

That the Vehicle Excise Duty (Immobilisation, Removal and Disposal of Vehicles) Regulations 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 107) be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.—[Mr. Bates.]

Question agreed to.

Welfare of Broiler Chickens

4.36 pm

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to protect the health and welfare of broiler chickens kept in indoor husbandry systems.

The UK chicken flock comprises two separate flocks. One is kept to lay eggs. Most of those birds are kept in battery cages and their welfare problems are relatively well known. In the other, much larger, flock, chickens known as broilers are reared for their meat.

In Britain, we rear over 700 million broiler chickens a year, yet they are the only one of the UK's major factory-farmed animals to have no specific laws to protect them. The Welfare of Livestock Regulations 1994 contain detailed provisions on pigs, calves and battery hens. On broiler chickens, however, the law is largely silent despite the severity of the health and welfare problems encountered by the birds.

The vast majority of broiler chickens are reared intensively indoors. They are kept in huge, windowless sheds that often hold up to 30,000 birds. The sheds are so overcrowded that, as the birds grow bigger, one can barely see the floors, so thickly are they carpeted with chickens. There are fears that the maximum stocking density recommended by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in its welfare code is frequently exceeded. To solve that problem, the Farm Animal Welfare Council recommended in its 1992 report on broilers that the maximum stocking density should be laid down in legal, binding regulations, rather than being left, as at present, to an unenforceable welfare code. To date, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has failed to act on that recommendation. No maximum stocking density is laid down by law. I hope that my Bill will remedy that omission.

The worst welfare problems, however, stem from the broiler industry's use of selective breeding methods and rich diets to get chickens to reach their slaughter weights in double-quick time. Today's broiler chickens have been bred to reach their slaughter weights in only six weeks. That is twice as fast as 30 years ago. It is the muscle that grows quickly—the part that is sold for meat. However, their legs fail to keep pace and cannot properly support the overgrown body. As a result, each year millions of chickens suffer from painful, sometimes crippling, leg disorders.

Academic research, which assessed the walking ability of broilers, suggests that as many as 180 million chickens a year are suffering from those painful problems. Indeed, the Farm Animal Welfare Council's working group found leg problems of varying degrees of severity on almost every farm that it visited. In the worst cases, chickens are incapable of sustained walking and can move only with the help of their wings or by crawling on their shanks.

Professor John Webster, head of the veterinary school at the university of Bristol, describes those broilers as suffering from a long list of painful bone and joint disorders. He adds that the chronic pain suffered by many of them "must constitute the single most extreme example of man's inhumanity to another sentient creature".

Hon. Members should know that broiler chickens reared in Britain are growing too fast not only for their legs, but for their hearts and lungs. Many birds develop congestive heart failure, which causes ascites—a pooling of body fluids in the abdomen. About 7 million broilers die of ascites each year before reaching their slaughter age of six weeks.

Professor Webster also said:

"It is absolutely not right that animals in the first weeks of their life should be experiencing heart disease; it is absolutely not right that animals in the first weeks of their life should be crippled."

That is something with which I agree wholeheartedly.

A significant number of broilers suffer from painful breast blisters, ulcerated feet and hock burns. Those injuries arise because, owing to leg weakness, many birds spend long periods squatting down on the litter. That is often contaminated with droppings and prolonged contact with it can lead to the injuries to which I have referred. Wood shavings are the material most commonly used as litter in broiler sheds. After two or three weeks, however, often there are hardly any wood shavings left; what remains is largely solid poultry manure. Improved litter management is a key factor in reducing the incidence of breast blisters, ulcerated feet and hock burns. My Bill includes a requirement that litter is kept clean and dry.

Regular inspections are essential if acceptable standards of broiler health and welfare are to be achieved. Indeed, the Farm Animal Welfare Council recommended that a law should be brought in requiring all flocks to be inspected twice a day. My Bill includes such a requirement. I fear that, at present, the absence of adequate inspections means that many diseased, injured or dying birds are not being identified as such and, as a result, are given no appropriate attention or treatment.

So extreme are the health problems of today's chicken broilers that if, instead of being slaughtered at six weeks, they were allowed to live on, 80 per cent. would die before reaching the age of puberty at 18 weeks. That presents a massive problem to one particular sector of the broiler industry. The broiler breeders—the birds whose role it is to produce the subsequent generations—must remain fit and healthy into adulthood so that they can breed. If fed normally many would, as I have said, die before reaching puberty. Those that survive would suffer from reduced fertility.

To address those problems, the parent stock—the breeders—are fed on restricted rations to slow down their growth rate. One study found that broiler breeders ate only a quarter to a half of what they would have eaten if given free access to food. The researchers concluded that restricted-fed broiler breeders are

"chronically hungry, frustrated and stressed."

There can be no justification for keeping birds in a state of constant hunger. My Bill requires broilers to be given sufficient food to prevent hunger.

Further problems arise during what the industry calls harvesting, which is when the birds are removed from the sheds and packed into crates ready for the journey to the slaughterhouse. Teams of catchers depopulate the sheds at great speed, carrying four or even more chickens in each hand. The birds are held by just one leg, with rough handling being commonplace. The extent of the brutality involved in the catching process was highlighted in a Bristol university study that examined the cause of death in broilers that were dead on arrival at the slaughterhouse. Just over half had died from heart failure. The researchers presumed that, for those birds, the stress of catching, loading and transporting had been simply too much for them to cope with. Some 35 per cent. had died from traumatic injuries, with a dislocated hip being the most common injury. That was associated with profuse haemorrhaging and in about one third of the cases the femur—a major bone—had actually been forced into the chicken's abdominal cavity. The researchers suggested that catching and carrying large birds by one leg is conducive to dislocation of the hip. Clearly, the catching process is not just stressful and frightening for the chickens, but in many cases leads to injury and even death. My Bill requires catching to be carried out in such a manner as to avoid injury to the birds.

I believe that if people knew of the suffering experienced by broiler chickens in Britain there would be a public outcry no less strong than that occasioned by the export of calves. Urgent reforms are needed to deal with the very serious health and welfare problems experienced by chicken broilers. My Bill would require the broiler industry in Britain to take a much more responsible approach in the rearing of its chickens. I hope that, one day, the Bill will stand as a benchmark for this House and for the remainder of Europe.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Alan Meale, Mr. Tony Banks, Sir Richard Body, Mr. Simon Hughes, Mr. Bill Etherington, Sir Andrew Bowden, Mr. Eric Martlew, Sir Teddy Taylor, Mr. Eric Clarke, Mr. Gary Waller, Mr. Terry Lewis and Mr. Don Dixon.

Welfare of Broiler Chickens

Mr. Alan Meale accordingly presented a Bill to protect the health and welfare of broiler chickens kept in indoor husbandry systems: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 22 March and to be printed. [Bill 83.]

Orders of the Day

CONSOLIDATED FUND (NO. 2) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Question, That the Bill be now read a Second time, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 54 (Consolidated Fund Bills), and agreed to.

Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put forthwith, and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

National Health Service (Residual Liabilities) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): I must inform the House that Madam Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.46 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The question before the House this afternoon is extremely simple—whether the national health service should pay its debts. Until three months ago, I assumed that there was no doubt about that, not only in my mind but in anyone else's mind. It seemed to me inconceivable that anyone could believe that a public sector national health service should be expected to or have the freedom to walk away from its debts.

Still more unthinkable in my mind, until a few weeks ago, was any suggestion that the Opposition would think it desirable policy to advocate the proposition that the NHS should walk away from its debts—but that, apparently, is the argument that the House will hear in the debate this afternoon. I look forward to hearing that argument advanced because I am absolutely confident not only that it is one with which I shall not agree, but that no one outside this House will agree that the NHS should be free to walk away from its debts.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North): Does that mean that the Secretary of State will have a say in what those debts are? Or will it be a case of, "You borrow as much as you like and I, Secretary of State, will pick up the tab"?

Mr. Dorrell: That is an absurd proposition. As I shall show, controls have been, are and will remain in place to limit the borrowings of NHS trusts. They are unaffected by the Bill, which deals with a very simple question—whether NHS bodies should meet their liabilities.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Does my right hon. Friend share my astonishment that the Labour party dares to talk about paying debts? When the Labour party was in office, national health service hospitals never paid their debts on time and inflation was as high as 27 per cent.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is entirely right: in the late 1970s I was a business man and NHS bodies were among the customers that I supplied. In those days, the NHS was famous for paying its debts late—but that situation has improved dramatically in recent years.

The question before the House is whether the public sector, particularly the NHS, should pay its debts. Until a few days ago, I had understood that it was Labour's position that the public sector should pay its debts—it did not occur to me that there was a distinction between the two Front Benches on this proposition. I thought that the Labour party believed that the NHS was a key part of the public sector and that it believed that the public sector, including the national health service, should pay its debts.

[Mr. Dorrell]

I thought that the Labour party was opposed to the proposition that the national health service should be a privatised institution.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I share my right hon. Friend's astonishment and dismay at the perceived attitude of the Opposition.

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): You have not even heard it yet.

Mr. Dykes: I am referring to what we have seen so far in relation to the Opposition's reaction to the Bill. Is it not more ominous than that? I thank my right hon. Friend for introducing this crucial Bill. I declare an indirect interest in that I have a constituent who has a company that is involved in helping with these matters. Is not the danger of the Labour party's destructive attitude, which is ominous, in opposing the Bill—I hope that it passes—that it will stop some crucial transactions from going ahead which would help the public in terms of new hospital developments? That will be directly the fault—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has made a long intervention. I would like a bit of order from the Government Front Bench and from the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) for raising that point and he is entirely right. If the Labour party sustains the view that it is reported to have taken in this morning's Financial Times on the tapes earlier today—that the NHS should be free to walk away from its debts—private finance initiative partners will not see the NHS as a credit-worthy borrower under a Labour Government and all its trading relationships will be affected. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) reminded hon. Members, that would be a return to the payment record of the NHS when the Labour party was in power.

I have introduced the Bill because approximately three months ago it was pointed out to me that there is a weakness in the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990—

Mr. Alan Milburn (Darlington): Why did you not know?

Mr. Dorrell: Because I do not know the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 off by heart—and I presume that the hon. Gentleman does not either. It was pointed out to me that schedule 2, paragraph 30, of the Act—which is at the forefront of the hon. Gentleman's mind; he knows every detail of every schedule of the Act—contains the following provision:

"If an NHS trust is dissolved under this Part of this Schedule, the Secretary of State may by order transfer—

Ms Harman: I know.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Lady may know, but other hon. Members probably have not memorised this schedule. It continues:

"or provide for the transfer to—

(a) the Secretary of State, or

(b) the health authority, or

(c) another NHS trust,

of such of the property, rights and liabilities of the NHS trust which is dissolved".

In other words, I have the power to deal with the liabilities of an NHS trust—I do not have the duty to deal with the liabilities of an NHS trust that is to be dissolved. That was the provision contained in the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 and in case any hon. Member thinks that this is an oversight associated specifically with that Act, it is worth referring to the fact that the National Health Service Act 1977 contained an even more general proposition, which is that an order of this kind may contain "such provisions for the transfer of officers, property, rights and liabilities as the Secretary of State thinks fit".

In other words, the door is left completely open—particularly in relation to the reorganisation of a trust—for the Secretary of State to reorganise the trust and to make no provision for the liabilities of that trust. That seems to me to be a wholly unsatisfactory basis on which to expect people to trade with NHS trusts.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey) rose—

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South) rose—

Mr. Dorrell: I shall give way in a moment. It is unsatisfactory for people engaging in long-term investments to support a trading relationship with an NHS trust. As I said to the Treasury Select Committee a few days ago, it is equally unsatisfactory from the point of view of the potato supplier to the hospital. Whatever the basis of the trading relationship, it is completely unsatisfactory that traders dealing with trusts should face a position where the Secretary of State has the power to reorganise the trust without making any provision for the liabilities of the trust.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I understand the point that the Secretary of State has made and I also understand the original Act. If national health service trusts have to submit their accounts every year—and they are looked at by the regional office, by the executive or the Secretary of State—and if all capital projects have to go through the accounting officer procedure and be approved, what are the circumstances in which the Secretary of State envisages that a trust would be in such a position that it would be at the risk of ending its life by the writ of the Secretary of State with a great amount of debt yet to be paid? If that were to happen, why would it not be dealt with in the normal way—by an insurance policy that ensures that the debts will be met?

Mr. Dorrell: I followed the point made by the hon. Gentleman until his last phrase. The answer to the first part of his question is that I can conceive of no circumstance where it would be in the public interest for me to use the discretion that is left to me in the legislation, and that is why I am in favour of removing it. The hon. Gentleman asked why a trader cannot insure against the possibility that I might use that discretion. Surely the answer is that it would be absurd for the public sector to pay, through a trading relationship with a trader, to insure against a risk of the Secretary of State doing something that he has not got the slightest intention of ever doing. It would be much cheaper and much cleaner to remove a discretion that I have made it abundantly clear that I have not the slightest intention of ever using.

Mr. Hughes: I understand what the Secretary of State is saying. He concedes that one way of dealing with it is that there is an insurance that covers the risk of any arm of the NHS being in a position where it could not meet its debts—I was not talking about the insurance of the trader with the NHS, but about NHS bodies, such as the trust. That is one way of doing it, but the Secretary of State is saying that he would rather not do it that way but would rather legislate so that it is on the face of an Act.

Mr. Dorrell: That is exactly the position: I can conceive of no circumstance in which it would be legitimate for a Secretary of State to use the discretion. Therefore, I am in favour of removing the discretion—and that is the sole purpose of the Bill. As soon as I was told about the position in the existing legislation, I decided to remedy it. I have no doubt whatsoever about the public's view of this issue: they regard the national health service as their health service; they believe that the national health service should meet its obligations, just as the overwhelming majority of our fellow countrymen believe that they have a duty to meet their obligations; and they would be outraged at the proposition that I should come to the Dispatch Box and defend the right of the NHS to do a moonlight flit on its liabilities.

That is the case that the Labour party is reduced to making in this debate. It is reduced to defending the right of any Secretary of State for Health to walk away knowingly from the liabilities properly entered into by the national health service. It is no good the hon. Member for Peckham saying that that is not true, because that will be the result of voting against the Bill.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): I thank the Secretary of State for giving way—he has made the same point about eight times and at different levels of volume. As the National Health Service Act 1977 contained a similar provision, why have these problems been created so suddenly?

Mr. Dorrell: I have made no secret of the answer to that question, which is that the issue has not previously arisen. If the inadequacy of the present provision had been drawn to the attention of any of my Conservative or Labour predecessors, they would have tackled it as I am tackling it. [Interruption.] I have answered the question—because it was pointed out to me. [Laughter.] It seems to me that—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair is finding great difficulty in following the debate. He cannot hear what the Secretary of State is saying.

Mr. Dorrell: It is not difficult to defend the proposition that if someone says to a Secretary of State in charge of a major public service that the condition of the current law is unsatisfactory—and I consider the condition of the current law and find it unsatisfactory—I should place the unsatisfactory provision before the House, as I have done, and ask the House to remedy its unsatisfactory nature.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): The Secretary of State said several times:

"It was pointed out to me".

Who pointed it out to him? Was it the banks, who were failing to support PFI schemes? Is that why this legislation is being rushed through the House tonight?

Mr. Dorrell: We have legislation that is brought before the House in the usual course of events to remedy something that is unsatisfactory in the present state of the law. The Opposition ask who pointed it out. It was the people with whom we are negotiating about the private finance initiative. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] The House expresses surprise. If the House had read the evidence that I gave to the Treasury Select Committee a fortnight ago, it would have found that I have never made a secret of the fact that those people raised the matter. It does not seem to me to matter who raised it. What matters—

Mr. Gunnell: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dorrell: Not at the moment, because I am answering the previous intervention.

What matters is the simple question, should the NHS preserve its current discretion to walk away from liabilities properly entered into? That is the only question in the Bill that the House must decide. If Opposition Members walk through the No Lobby later, they will be voting for the NHS to walk away from liabilities properly entered into by the management structure established by the House and charged with managing the national health service.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): The Secretary of State has just admitted that there are no conceivable circumstances in which the Secretary of State and the NHS would walk away from liabilities. Why, therefore, did those individuals or groups of individuals draw that problem to the attention of the Secretary of State? Did they not believe the Secretary of State about that?

Mr. Dorrell: Perhaps they have heard the utterings of Opposition Members and are worried that Labour Members might at a time far in the future walk away from the liabilities of the health service. In those circumstances, potential traders are entitled to the assurance that the NHS will not exploit a freedom to do a moonlight flit. It is the type of behaviour that, when undertaken by directors of bankrupt shyster companies, leads to those directors being revealed on television by Esther Rantzen and her like. To argue as a specific proposition that people should be free to walk away from a liability entered into legitimately, is an activity associated with shyster, second-rate lawyers. I am amazed that the Labour party and Labour Front Benchers should want to have anything to do with such behaviour.

Mr. Gunnell: Would it not be fair to say that the Secretary of State has been told that none of the contracts for those private sector initiatives can be signed because the clause is not in place?

Mr. Dorrell: It is certainly not true that no PFI projects can go ahead because of the absence of the clause.

Mr. Gunnell: Signed.

Mr. Dorrell: Signed, go ahead—I accept the amendment. I can say that with total confidence because 48 schemes, costing a total of £225 million, in the NHS private finance initiative have already gone ahead.

Mr. Spellar: How many are held up?

Mr. Dorrell: Because they are in the national health service, they are all health-related schemes. We are negotiating with partners the details of arrangements that have already been announced, and later I shall talk about the others that are still being assessed. We are negotiating with partners the terms on which those contracts will go ahead. The inadequacy of the law was revealed in the context of those discussions, and it seems to me straightforward that the House should remedy a weakness in the law.

I have absolutely no doubt that the public view of that question would be that the NHS should pay its debts. That is the question that the hon. Member for Peckham must answer. The Bill does not change the powers and duties of trusts, which are set out clearly in the legislation. Schedule 2, paragraph 6 of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 says:

"An NHS trust shall carried out effectively, efficiently and economically the functions for the time being conferred on it".

The financial control regime of trusts places three clear financial obligations on trusts—to break even taking one year with another, to stay within the external financing limit of the trust and to deliver a 6 per cent. return on average relevant net assets.

Ms Harman: Where is the statute?

Mr. Dorrell: It is in section 10(2) of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. Section 10(1) of the 1990 Act imposes an explicit obligation that every trust

"shall ensure that its revenue is not less than sufficient, taking one financial year with another, to meet outgoings properly chargeable to revenue account."

That is one of the three financial obligations of the trusts. The other two were set out clearly in the financial control regime.

I give the hon. Lady an undertaking. If she can produce any demonstrable example of trusts borrowing irresponsibly and using their power to borrow in a way that does not match the external financing limit controls and the requirement to operate effectively, efficiently and economically within the 1990 Act, I will use the power set out in section 10(2) that allows me to define that as a statutory obligation. At the moment, there appears to be no problem for me to tackle on the issue that the hon. Lady has raised. In those circumstances it would be, to put it mildly, an absurd over-reaction to a debating point that the hon. Lady likes making, for me to use a statutory power that has not been demonstrated to be necessary. The answer to the question, "Where is the power if it is necessary?" is on the face of the 1990 Act.

Ms Harman: First, does the Secretary of State agree that he cannot use his powers under section 10 of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 to restrict the rights that trusts have under schedule 3 of that Act to borrow without his approval?

Secondly, does the Secretary of State agree that the reason why trusts have not borrowed from the private sector hitherto, despite the fact that they have had the power to do so since 1990, is that they have been unable to provide security for those loans because they have been unable to mortgage their assets? The Bill provides that security, and that is why the trusts will start borrowing.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Lady is wrong on both points.

First, section 10(2) of the 1990 Act says:

"It shall be the duty of every NHS trust to achieve such financial objectives as may from time to time be set by the Secretary of State with the consent of the Treasury".

That is a clear power, which I could use to give EFLs the statutory backing if it were demonstrated to be necessary. The hon. Lady must demonstrate that it is necessary, and she has not done so.

Secondly, the answer to the question, does the Bill provide a basis of guarantee or allow a lender to a trust access to the assets of the trust, is no, it does not; and the bar on the pledging of assets of trusts remains in place because it is in the statute.

I have answered both questions the hon. Lady asked me directly and in the negative. They are irrelevant to the key question that the House must address today, which is not whether the controls are adequate—although I should be very happy to debate that. If the House wants to demonstrate the need for extra controls on NHS trusts, it must be demonstrated that existing controls are inadequate. The hon. Member for Peckham has not done that. Whether the controls are adequate or inadequate does not alter the fact that I believe that NHS trusts and the NHS as an institution should meet the financial obligations that it properly takes on. That is the Bill's only effect.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Secretary of State has, as yet, left two questions unanswered. The hon. Member for Peckham asked whether he agrees that it is open to trusts to borrow without his approval. The second question, which has not yet been asked, is why the original power in the 1990 Act is a power of discretion—either to pick up the tab or not to pick it up? What reasons was the Secretary of State given by his civil servants for the fact that the Bill, as originally drafted, gave him a discretion that is no longer thought to be appropriate?

Mr. Dorrell: The answer to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question—I have asked that question myself—rests on the proposition that the same principle was carried forward from the 1977 Act. There are currently not many people advising me on the drafting of the legislation who remember the precise arguments that went on nearly 20 years ago. I have no intention of ever using that discretion, as I have already made clear to the House, which is why I am in favour of getting rid of it.

On the question about the nature of controls on trust borrowing, that is set out in the financial regime of trust financial control. If it were shown that the regime was in some sense flawed and that trusts were not living within the controls set out in this document, I would be the first to argue—as one would expect of a former Treasury Minister—that we need to take effective action to ensure that trusts live within their financial obligations.

Trusts can borrow without my specific consent, but they must first show that they are borrowing in a way in which good value is delivered. The overwhelming scale of trust borrowings—[Interruption.] They do because they have a statutory obligation, which I have read out to the House, to trade in an effective, efficient and economical manner. A trust that borrows expensively when a cheap alternative is available would very quickly and quite properly find itself before the Public Accounts Committee, with its accountable officer sitting beside Mr. Alan Langlands, the accounting officer for the NHS, explaining why it was borrowing expensive money when cheap money was available in the public sector.

The hon. Member for Peckham, however much she may throw up dust and fog around this issue, has failed to obscure the central question of whether the NHS will stand by its liabilities. That is the only question that the House is being asked to decide today. I assure the House that if the trust financial regime is shown to deliver inadequate control on trusts, we shall of course address that inadequacy. I have given that assurance three times now. She has not, however, shown that the trust financial regime is inadequate.

The hon. Lady has spoken to many people on this subject, and I look forward to hearing what she has to say in the debate. If she plans to argue that we need extra controls on trusts' financial obligations, she will have to demonstrate that they are not staying within the existing financial regime, which provides all the controls that could possibly be required.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The issue of the trusts is central to the Secretary of State's argument. He has raised the issue of the trust walking away from its responsibilities. As all trusts are approved by the Secretary of State and are responsible to him, will he tell us how a trust will be able to walk away from its liabilities?

Mr. Dorrell: The Bill's purpose is to provide that trusts and the NHS as a body cannot walk away from their liabilities. I do not think that a public sector body should have that freedom, which is why I am proposing to withdraw from the Secretary of State the discretion in the current law to reorganise a trust without providing for its liabilities.

The answer to how much a trust can borrow is the amount set out in its external financing limit.

Ms Harman: It is £5 billion.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Lady says that the amount that trusts can borrow is £5 billion. That is perfectly true. The amount that one trust can borrow is set out in its EFL, or in the amount that is provided for in the figure underlying its EFL.

The Bill does not change any of those controls, and no evidence has been produced to suggest that the controls are inadequate. As has already been revealed in this debate, the fact is that the Bill changes—[Laughter.] It changes nothing, because I have not the slightest intention of using the discretion that it removes. Therefore, the Bill will have no practical consequence—unless one believes that the members of a successor Government want to protect for themselves the freedom to walk away from NHS liabilities that have been properly entered into. That is the Bill's only effect and it introduces only that change. It changes nothing unless one believes that a successor Government want the freedom to walk away from NHS liabilities.

The proposals in the Bill cannot be answered by talk about the approvals process, as that would be a red herring. I am quite happy to defend the approvals process, but that is not the question before the House. The question is whether a debt, once entered into by the NHS, should be paid. If we believe that the answer to that question is yes, we should vote in the Aye Lobby at the conclusion of the debate. If we believe that the answer is no—

Mr. Spellar: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Dorrell: I shall give way in a moment. I have plenty more to say; I am not finished yet.

If the answer to that question is no, we are entering a quite extraordinary world, in which the first element will be a completely new definition of stakeholding. Opposition Front Benchers are now defining for us their belief that, should someone be a creditor of the NHS under Labour, he will no doubt hold a stake in it, but he cannot be sure of being paid. He would be given a piece of paper that was of as much value as a voucher issued by the Tsarist railway system. Opposition Front Benchers want to retain the freedom to walk away—[Interruption.] I am absolutely on my place. They want to retain the freedom to walk away from liabilities, in the manner of a tinpot third-world country, which is exactly the type of behaviour we condemn when it is unearthed in the darker fringes of the corporate sector by investigative journalists.

I should have thought that Opposition Front Benchers would want nothing whatever to do with such a practice. That is the type of shyster trick beloved of smart Aleck lawyers, who pay attention to the small print without recognising the liability that every taxpayer who pays for the NHS wants us properly to respect. Nye Bevan must be turning in his grave at the way in which Opposition Front Benchers are demeaning the name of the service that he established. They want to preserve for themselves the freedom that they condemn in the dark fringes of the corporate sector.

Mr. Spellar rose—

Mr. Dorrell: I have excited the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar), and I give way to him.

Mr. Spellar: The Secretary of State has been slightly confusing. Stripping away all the rhetoric, he has given a very interesting redefinition of risk management and risk assessment in the health service and under the PFI. Is he saying that the PFI will be reckoned as guaranteed by the Department of Health, with no risk to the private sector? How does that affect its relationship to the public sector borrowing requirement?

[Mr. Spellar]

Mr. Dorrell: I am saying no such thing. All that I am doing is removing from a private sector trader dealing with the health service—whether a PFI partner or the famous potato dealer—the risk that a Secretary of State might walk away from a properly defined liability on the health service. The whole point of the PFI—which I shall address later and which I am sure that the hon. Member for Peckham will want to touch on in her speech—is that it defines a series of risks that do not rest on the health service or the public sector and are therefore not liabilities of the public sector which are dealt with in the Bill. Those risks are taken by the private sector partner—that is the point of the PFI.

The purpose of the Bill is not to address those liabilities and risks, but to address the relationship between every NHS trust and every supplier of goods and services to that trust, such as the PFI contractor and the potato supplier. My belief—I am sure that it is held by all my hon. Friends—is that the NHS should honour its obligations to those people while understanding that they have taken on properly assessed commercial risks in the establishment of that trading relationship with the health service.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Dorrell: No, I must make progress.

I said that Nye Bevan must be turning in his grave at the prospect of the NHS being dealt with in that way. I notice that other, more contemporary people, do not associate themselves with the tactics of the hon. Member for Peckham. The hon. Lady has tabled a reasoned amendment to the Bill, which she believes is exclusively related to the PFI—I do not deny the Bill's relevance to the PFI, but it extends far beyond it. The hon. Lady believes that the Bill relates only to the PFI; I therefore find it passing strange that not one member of the shadow Front-Bench Treasury team was prepared to put his or her name to the reasoned amendment tabled by the hon. Lady.

The shadow Chancellor, the shadow Chief Secretary and the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) have all been visiting potential PFI partners and trying to sound orthodox. They have been trying to underwrite Labour's respectability in that community. Members of the shadow Front-Bench Treasury team who are touring that circuit will find their hosts choking on their prawn cocktails when they explain to them that they want to preserve the freedom to walk away from private finance liabilities.

The hon. Member for Peckham must answer another question in the context of the debate. She does not merely have to explain why the shadow Treasury Front-Bench team wants nothing to do with the reasoned amendment, but whether she has yet resolved her difficulties with her colleagues on the Opposition Front Bench about their attitude to the PFI. It is not only every potential PFI partner, but everyone working in the health service and every voter who want some clear answers.

Ms Harman: I shall give them.

Mr. Dorrell: I look forward to that as it will be a first.

I shall remind the hon. Lady of where she is coming from in terms of the obscurity of Labour's position on the PFI. On the "Today" programme on 28 November the hon. Lady said that the PFI was "a new trick to privatise the Health Service."

That was the hon. Lady's line, and it was not just a slip of the tongue. We both attended a public meeting in Birmingham town hall at the beginning of this year and, with my own ears, I heard her say:

"I don't call it a Private Finance Initiative, I call it a privatisation initiative."

The hon. Lady has twice taken that line—she was explicit and specific: she is against the PFI.

The hon. Member for Dulwich (Ms Jowell) used to be a member of Labour's Front-Bench team. She made it clear that the hon. Member for Peckham was not the only one to hold that view. The hon. Member for Dulwich said:

"The Private Finance Initiative is the Tories' route map to the privatisation of the Health Service."

Those views are entirely wrong, but, more interestingly in the context of today's debate, they reveal the position of the shadow health team on the PFI: its members are explicitly and clearly against it.

The hon. Member for Peckham says that the Bill is all to do with the PFI and I am responding to her concerns about that. If the Bill is all about the PFI, the House, in order to consider the Bill, needs to know where the hon. Lady stands on the PFI. We need to hear the hon. Member for Peckham reconcile her position with that of the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron).

While the hon. Member for Peckham says that she is against the PFI and calls it the privatisation initiative, the hon. Member for Rother Valley told the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry in January:

"We do not disagree with the PFI, how could we? It was Labour who first thought of partnerships between the public and private sector."

The hon. Lady says that she is against the PFI; the hon. Member for Rother Valley says that he is in favour of it and that it would be inconceivable for the Labour party to oppose it.

At least the hon. Member for Rother Valley has the leader of the Labour party on his side. The leader of the Labour party was explicit about the PFI and health when he said at the party's conference in 1994—

Mr. Milburn: We have heard this old story before.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman says that it was a long time ago—it was 17 months ago. Are we to believe that the Labour party has changed its position on the subject in 17 months? Are we to believe that the leader of the Labour party goes to his party conference and sets out his stall and, 17 months later, a member of the Labour party's Front-Bench team says, "That was all 17 months ago"?

Seventeen months ago the leader of the Labour party said:

"We would get public and private finance working together in transport, in housing, in capital projects in health and education."

Ms Harman: Yes.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Lady says yes—public and private finance will work together in health and education.

I look forward to hearing the hon. Lady explain to the House how she anticipates getting public and private finance to work together while defending the proposition that the NHS must be free to walk away from its debts. Those propositions make strange bedfellows and I look forward to hearing the hon. Lady's explanation.

As well as making that statement at the Labour party conference, in the Budget debate in the autumn of 1995, the leader of the Labour party was once again explicit when he said:

"The PFI is right in principle."—[Official Report, 28 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1077.]

We need the Opposition Front-Bench team to tell us their policy on the PFI in the health service. Does the Labour party believe that it is a privatisation initiative? If it does and it can demonstrate that, I imagine that most hon. Members would make common cause against it. It is because I do not believe that it is a privatisation initiative, but believe that it reinforces the delivery of high quality public health, that I am a strong supporter of the PFI. In that, I enjoy the support of the hon. Member for Rother Valley and the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), but I do not enjoy the support of the holder of the shadow health brief, the hon. Member for Peckham. I look forward to hearing how the hon. Lady reconciles those positions.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Does my right hon. Friend realise that my constituents do not consider the PFI as a privatisation initiative, but see it as a massive opportunity for a new district general hospital? The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) does not have the support of Gravesham Labour party, which has been deafening in its silence on the subject because it supports the PFI as a great hope for the future.

Mr. Dorrell: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, who speaks for his own constituents, who rightly see the PFI as the best way of delivering—not just to his constituents—more than 25 other big projects in the health service. They are currently being assessed and some of them have already been approved—25 projects costing £25 million or more are all going ahead under the PFI. Three of them have been given the go-ahead already. At Budget time I announced that we were taking the PFI up a gear and would be assessing all the projects coming through the system. I anticipated that the go-ahead for those projects would be announced at the rate of about one a month. That was three months ago and so far we have approved three projects. I regard that as delivering almost precisely on the prediction that I gave at the time of the Budget.

Mr. Martlew: About 18 months ago the second stage of the Cumberland infirmary in my constituency was ready to go to tender, but it was stopped because of the private finance initiative. My constituents are suffering as a result of the PFI, which is simply a delaying tactic designed to save the Government some money.

Mr. Dorrell: Anyone who believes that the PFI—which offers the possibility of investing in health service capital stock without any need for Treasury authorisation or queuing for rationed capital within the context of conventional public sector capital planning processes—is a delaying tactic with regard to NHS capital investment is living in a different world from the one in which I have lived all my adult life. The hon. Gentleman knows that the project in his constituency is being assessed, together with 25 others. He knows also that the Government have increased publicly funded capital investment in the health service by nearly 70 per cent. in real terms, whereas Labour cut it by 30 per cent.

Despite the increased pace of capital investment in the health service, 10 big projects have gone ahead in the past 10 years—that is roughly one a year. Since the programme was launched on a higher plane at the time of the last Budget, we have been announcing projects at a rate of one a month. Exchanging a system that approved projects at the rate of one a year for a system that is currently approving them at the rate of one per month seems a significant improvement—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are far too many sedentary interventions—not least from the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Dorrell: To move from one project a year to one a month is, by anyone's definition, a significant increase in the health service's capital investment programme.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): Name them.

Mr. Dorrell: I shall name three schemes for which I have announced the go-ahead: the South Buckinghamshire NHS trust, St. James's in Leeds and the Royal Berkshire and Battle hospitals NHS trust. They have received the go-ahead since the Budget.

Mr. Gunnell: Will the Secretary of State make it clear that, in talking about the "go-ahead", he is referring to a go-ahead on the planning stage? Does he concede that the contract has not been signed in Leeds? We are led to believe that it will be the first contract signed, which means that the initiative has not yet provided anything on the ground: all the projects are still at the planning stage.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman is wrong about the initiative's not having provided anything on the ground. I have referred to 48 smaller schemes and £225 million which has been provided under the private finance initiative. It is true that none of the three big schemes that I announced since the Budget has been signed. At the time, I would have been amazed to hear that the contracts would be signed within three months. It is an absurd idea that one can sign the contract for a £38 million or £40 million scheme—sketch it out on the back of an envelope and sign all the documentation—within a week. Anyone who believes that has never met a lawyer.

Labour Members live in a totally surreal world. We announced the go-ahead for one scheme in December and for the other two in January. It is totally absurd to suggest that I should come to the House with a great pile of contractual documents six weeks after the announcement of intent.

If the House is to address the issue seriously this afternoon, it must recognise that the health service faces a huge task in ensuring that it puts in place all the capital stock that can be used to deliver high-quality health care into the next century. The Leader of the Opposition and the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) recognise that fact, but apparently the hon. Member for Peckham does not. Today she has the opportunity to emerge from the shadows and to make two things clear to the House and to the country: first, that she believes that the NHS should pay its debts; and, secondly, that she favours the kind of public-private partnership that has been espoused by her hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley and by her right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and which is being carried forward by the Government. The time has come for her to respond to those two simple points.

Mr. Simon Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not know whether it is the fault of the amplifying system or the Secretary of State, but we should not have to listen to his shouting in future debates. It is a serious point: whatever the merits of his argument, the Secretary of State shouted at us for almost 50 minutes. Perhaps the amplifier volume could be turned down so that we are not blasted out of the Chamber.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a serious point of order.

5.35 pm

Ms Harriet Harman (Peckham): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to the National Health Service (Residual Liabilities) Bill because it does not include safeguards against government abuse of the Private Finance Initiative to advance privatisation of the NHS with damaging effects on patients and staff; gives an open-ended commitment on the part of the taxpayer to honour the liabilities of NHS Trusts irrespective of the manner in which they have accrued; and fails to ensure government appraisal and control of potential liabilities or their adequate scrutiny by Parliament."

This is a short Bill, but, if passed by the House, it will have long-lasting consequences for the national health service. The legislation raises five key points. First, it shows that the Government's promises about hospital building are set to be broken. Up and down the country, new hospitals promised by the Government are no more than castles in the air. The Secretary of State said that he is moving the programme to a higher plane—it is not merely a higher plane: it is in outer space. It is not about hospitals on the ground, but castles in the air.

Secondly, the Bill exposes the private finance initiative as a Trojan horse for privatisation. Thirdly, it offers a blank cheque of up to £5 billion from the public purse as the price of baling out the shambles of the Tories' private finance initiative. Fourthly, it ends the role of the Secretary of State in prioritising and agreeing our hospital building programme. The Secretary of State looks puzzled about that. When people read the Treasury Select Committee minutes they will understand why he is puzzled: he is slightly behind the game. When he appeared before the Treasury Select Committee he did not know that trusts have the power to borrow. The Secretary of State still looks puzzled. In the course of my speech, I shall help him to understand the unintended consequences that the Bill will have for him and for any future Secretary of State.

Fifthly, the presentation of the Bill raises serious questions about the Secretary of State's competence to run the health service or to look after public money. The problem that the Bill tries—and fails—to sort out began in 1990 when the Tories turned NHS hospitals into trusts. They made them independent and freestanding from Government and gave them the power to borrow. Because of the independence afforded by the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, the Secretary of State had the discretion only to take over the "assets, rights and liabilities" of trusts in the event of their "dissolution". He did not have to take over their liabilities. It is quite wrong to suggest that the parliamentary draftspeople were dozing and included provisions in the 1990 Act simply because they existed already.

Under this Bill, the Secretary of State will be compelled to take over the liabilities of NHS bodies in the event of their "ceasing to exist". So he must stand behind trusts' borrowings, but he does not have any power over how much they borrow, which trusts do the borrowing and why they borrow. That is why we oppose the Bill. The effect of the legislation, considered in conjunction with the rights of trusts as stated in the 1990 Act, is to give a blank cheque to independent trust hospitals. The Secretary of State will have to underwrite any liabilities that are incurred, even though he has no control over how they are incurred. By his own hand—pushed by the bankers, of course—the Secretary of State will have the worst of all worlds—responsibility without power.

The reason why the Secretary of State rushed the Bill into Parliament without properly thinking it through has nothing to do with the potato traders. All his talk about traders is disingenuous. When he says traders, he means bankers. The Secretary of State rushed the Bill into Parliament without properly thinking it through because he is a desperate man.

The Secretary of State's private finance initiative policy for new hospital building is a shambles. The Government have made themselves completely dependent on private finance for hospital building. They have slashed the public funds for NHS capital projects. The Budget cut the NHS capital programme by 17 per cent. in just one year. The Secretary of State promised that the gap would be filled by using private money—magic money—and that he would use his Treasury acumen to bring it in. Even if he delivers everything that he promised on the PFI—a total of £135 million next year—that is less than half what he has cut from the NHS capital programme.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Harman: In a moment.

In their speeches and the briefings that appeared in the press, the Secretary of State and the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave the strong impression that building was about to begin on PFI-based new hospital contracts. New hospitals have been trumpeted for Norwich, Carlisle, Amersham and Swindon. [Interruption.] The Secretary of State now says that is absolutely untrue. Is he telling the House that it will not happen?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Lady draws no distinction between Amersham, where I have made an announcement that the hospital is to go ahead, and Norwich and Carlisle, where the projects are still subject to assessment. If we are still assessing the projects, how can I possibly say that they will go ahead? I have never said—nor would I say—that decisions have been made to go ahead with those projects. We have decided to go ahead with three hospitals since Budget day and I listed them in the House this afternoon. The others are subject to assessment, as the hon. Lady and the House would expect.

Ms Harman: I cannot answer for anything that the Secretary of State might say. I simply refer to his speech to the Royal College of Physicians on 21 November. If he is telling people in Norwich, Carlisle, Amersham, Swindon, north Durham and Bishop Auckland that they cannot expect the hospitals that he promised, we want some clarity on that. The Secretary of State trumpeted them as his six flagship hospitals, first on the front page of The Independent on 30 May 1995, secondly, in the Health Service Journal on 5 October 1995 and, thirdly, in The Independent on 27 November 1995. In his speech to the Royal College of Physicians on 21 November, the Secretary of State said:

"Over the next few months . . . we shall see a regular flow of new projects", but it seems to be a flow of projects for paperwork in the Department of Health, not for building work on new hospitals.

What is the real position? Just last week, the Secretary of State was asked by the Treasury Select Committee whether any PFI contracts had actually been signed. The answer was no. None of the deals for the new hospitals has been signed. We have to watch him when he says that they have been agreed or given the go ahead. My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell) was absolutely right about that.

The Secretary of State says that he has agreed contracts, but he is not paying for them. The local hospital trust has agreed them, but it is not paying for them. The people who are supposed to be paying for them—the banks—have not agreed them, so now he is backpedalling fast and no contracts have been signed. [Interruption.] Hon. Members say that he is not. They should have seen him on the Select Committee, when he said that he was trying to play them down. He is playing them down now because he is in deep trouble as the PFI is a shambles. The Secretary of State told the Treasury Select Committee that he could not say when the contracts will be signed. Now he is trying to play them down, but his promises to people throughout the country are set to be broken.

The Secretary of State follows a common pattern with each of the six flagship hospitals. First, he announces a new hospital, then there is a delay because the project has to be referred to get private finance, then a private finance initiative proposal emerges, but it involves far fewer beds than there are now or than were originally planned and finally, there is nothing—no contract is signed and no work begins. It is the same story up and down the country.

Mr. Henry McLeish (Fife, Central): It is fantasy finance.

Ms Harman: As my hon. Friend says, it is fantasy finance. Let us look at each of the flagship hospitals. The first is Norwich and Norfolk district general hospital.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Harman: I shall give way when I have dealt with the six flagship hospitals. I shall also deal with the hon. Gentleman's hospital because the Secretary of State will not tell him when it will be started.

Let me quote from a Department of Health press release about the Norfolk and Norwich hospital. The Secretary of State is screwing up his eyes to read it. Let me read it to him. It is headed:

"Go-ahead for new £100 million hospital in Norwich".

The only problem is that it is dated 1990. There has been plenty of time to write on the back of envelopes, but no hospital has been built. In the press statement, the then Secretary of State for Health, who is now Chancellor of the Exchequer, confidently told local people:

"Construction for the new hospital is expected to start in 1992"—

but it did not. Six years after the first announcement, there is still no hospital. No contract has been signed and the people of Norwich are still waiting for their new hospital. When will they get it?

Mr. Dorrell: I was a junior Health Minister in 1990. I was responsible for what was rather quaintly called unconventional finance. Since then, the rules for the use of private capital within the health service have been changed, as the Opposition often argued should happen, and have moved in the direction for which the Opposition argued. The hon. Lady should welcome the fact that an announcement made six years ago is now a great deal closer to fruition.

Ms Harman: The Secretary of State said that he was Minister for unconventional finance. He is now Secretary of State for unconventional finance and where is it?

It is the same story in Carlisle. Plans for a new hospital were developed as long ago as 1989. By summer 1994, the trust had finalised and submitted its plans. Carlisle Hospitals NHS trust reached the stage of signing a contract with the public sector two years ago, but it had to be stopped when the Government required the project to get private finance. Again, although the plan was first mooted in 1989, no contract has yet been signed and the people of Carlisle are still waiting for their new hospital.

It is the same story in Amersham. The plan to develop Amersham and Wycombe hospitals was approved in October 1994. Then the Tories changed the rules and said that any new hospital required private finance. No contract has been signed and no building has been started. The people of Amersham are still waiting for their new hospital.

It is the same in Swindon. The Secretary of State gave approval for a replacement for the Princess Margaret hospital in December 1993. He gave it what would now be described as the go-ahead, but in October 1994 the project was required to get private finance. No contract has been signed and the people of Swindon are still waiting for their hospital.

In north Durham, the Department of Health agreed plans with North Durham Acute NHS trust for a new district general hospital in January 1994. Then the Department said, "Sorry, but none of that is going forward. You must obtain private finance." No contract has been signed and the people of Durham are still waiting for their hospital.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): I have a letter from North Durham Acute hospital trust saying that it will now consider two private sector bids for financing. That letter promises that the first phase of a new hospital will be built by 1999. My hon. Friend's remarks are deeply worrying. I will be meeting the trust's chief executive, Colin Douglas, on Friday. Does my hon. Friend advise me to tell Mr. Douglas that he ought to look elsewhere for finance and not depend on the private sector because the Government will not give their permission?

Ms Harman: The problem is that if the trust looks to the public sector, it will find that Government finance for hospital building has been slashed. If the trust looks to the private sector, it will discover a whole load of bankers saying, "Health service PFI does not add up under this Government." My hon. Friend illustrates the situation well. Durham is the location of supposedly one of the programme's flagship hospitals, yet the terms of the contract have not even been agreed with the parties who are to design, finance and build that hospital—let alone the matter of getting the money from the banks.

Plans for rebuilding Bishop Auckland hospital have been in the pipeline since 1988. In 1993, local Members of Parliament received assurances from the now chair of the Tory party, then Minister of State in the Department of Health, that a new hospital would be built. In 1994, the Chancellor announced that the hospital would have to secure private finance. Again, no contract has been signed and the people of Bishop Auckland are still waiting for their hospital. The Tories' new hospital building programme is a cruel hoax—nothing more than the launching and relaunching of six flagship hospital projects, none of them built. The flow of announcements increases, but the building of new hospitals fails to materialise. The hopes of local people are raised, then dashed.

Where does that leave the Secretary of State? In the PFI process, the right hon. Gentleman has shown himself incompetent. He makes promises, trumpets them on the front pages of newspapers, and then discovers that he cannot deliver because the bankers will not sign the cheques. The whole thing is a shambles. The Secretary of State was so keen to air dogma that he overlooked the detail, which has nothing to do with potato traders. The private sector will not sign contracts involving tens of millions of pounds under current law, and it is easy to understand why. The private sector must have a contract with the trust, which is the private sector partner. Under the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, the Secretary of State can abolish a trust and does not have to pick up its liabilities. Any banker would be unwise to enter into a contract valued at hundreds of millions of pounds with a public sector partner that can be abolished by the Secretary of State—so the bankers will not sign. The Secretary of State did not notice that fact before announcing the PFI and cutting public sector funds, but the bankers drew it to his attention.

Because the bankers will not sign, the Secretary of State has rushed this new Bill into the House, telling us that it is about potatoes. Although the Secretary of State taking over all the debts will sort out the problems for the private sector, the Bill will create impossible problems for the public sector. The trusts retain the independent status that they were given under the 1990 Act. The Secretary of State has no powers of control over them and underwrites all their liabilities in the Bill. He is making a blanket agreement to stand behind liabilities over which he has no statutory control. The Secretary of State is abolishing any control over or accountability for major areas of NHS capital funding. He is offering the banks a blank cheque from the taxpayer, and he tells the House that that is a mere technicality. Why should the public purse pay for NHS trust liabilities if the public have not played a part in agreeing to those liabilities? The Bill will make it impossible for the Government to oversee the £5 billion of borrowing allowed in schedule 3, which will end up as public expenditure.

Last week, the Treasury Select Committee took evidence from the Secretary of State for Health and asked him about PFI. Fortunately I was present to hear the right hon. Gentleman's replies. I pay tribute to the skilful questioning of my hon. Friends the Members for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott), for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore), for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms) and for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts). They asked the Secretary of State about the implications of the Bill. Let us consider the right hon. Gentleman's replies.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Surely the hon. Lady will give way now?

Ms Harman: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman when I reach the point in my speech about which he is asking, but I have not reached it yet.

The Select Committee asked why the Bill is needed now. The Secretary of State replied that the Bill remedies a problem that has existed since 1948. In fact, the problem has arisen only since the 1990 Act, which established trusts as independent. Before, they were an integral part of the NHS and their actions were controlled by and accountable to the Secretary of State. The right hon. Gentleman has not just stumbled across a problem that has been invisible for almost 50 years, but he created the situation. He was a Minister in the Department when trusts were made freestanding in 1990.

The Select Committee asked what controls exist over trust borrowing. As that question was put, the Secretary of State rudely interrupted and said that trusts do not have the power to borrow—he denied that trusts have the power to borrow. He had not read the 1990 Act. Even though the right hon. Gentleman served on the Committee that considered that legislation, was a Minister in the Department of Health and is now presenting a Bill to guarantee trust liabilities, he had not asked himself whether trusts can borrow and whether he has any control over them. The Secretary of State asserted that trusts do not have the power to borrow, not knowing that they have to borrow. That is a spectacular admission of ignorance, particularly as the Bill requires the right hon. Gentleman and any future Secretary of State for Health to stand behind liabilities accrued by borrowing trusts.

In case the Secretary of State still has not grasped the point, I refer him to schedule 3 to the 1990 Act, under which NHS trusts can borrow—forget about section 10, which does not override schedule 3. The only restrictions are that trusts should not mortgage their assets, borrow foreign currency or together borrow more than £5 billion. Trusts can borrow without the Secretary of State' approval. They do not have to tell him that they are borrowing—they do not even have to notify him. It is all the more extraordinary that the Secretary of State had forgotten—perhaps he never knew—that trusts have borrowing powers, given that my hon. Friends and I have asked parliamentary questions about that aspect.

Last December, my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) asked the Secretary of State how many national health service trusts had borrowed money from commercial sources. The answer was

"Information on national health service trusts' borrowing from commercial sources during the year is not available".—[Official Report, 4 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 35.]

The trusts have the power to borrow, but they do not have to tell the Secretary of State.

We all know that the trusts have not borrowed much in the past six years. They have not been able to borrow because they have not had security for the loans and they cannot mortgage their assets. But the Bill would give them blanket security for all loans. Under the 1990 Act, they will be able to borrow up to £5 billion. The Secretary of State wants to rush the Bill through the House and press on with the PFI, not only to save himself the embarrassment of all the broken promises of new hospitals that have not materialised, but because, under the Tories, the PFI in the NHS is a Government ramp for privatisation.

Under the Tories, the PFI is not a public-private partnership, but the private sector cherry-picking deals. Under the Tories, the PFI is not private finance working in the public interest, but private commercial interests driving into the heart of the NHS. Market testing is already threatening to privatise clinical support services. The PFI is set to accelerate that yet faster and will let the private sector take over not only the design, building, financing and operation of hospitals, but the running of clinical services.

The Secretary of State says that he will not let clinical services be put out to the private sector—with a qualification—without the consent of local clinicians. That reassurance means nothing because the Secretary of State will not define what he means by clinical services and nor will he identify any mechanisms for establishing the consent or otherwise of local clinicians. Presumably, he means that if anyone applies for a job when it is advertised by the private sector, that will signify the support of local clinicians. It is no surprise that the Secretary of State does not want to be specific, because he knows that the medical profession and all those who work in the health service are wholly opposed to privatisation, especially the privatisation of clinical services.

The PFI is already set to create the first privatised NHS hospital, in Stonehaven in Scotland. The design, building and management of a new hospital, including the delivery of clinical services, will be put out to tender to private sector bidders. When the private sector is designing, building, financing, operating and running the hospital, and employing the doctors and nurses, that is privatisation and that is what the Government are all about.

The Secretary of State has asked about our position. Our position is perfectly clear, but the Secretary of State must try to distinguish between our criticisms of what he is doing and our plans for what we would do. We have made it clear that when private finance can work in partnership with public finance in the public interest to secure investment, we welcome it. We have led the way—across the whole range of services, and especially transport—in realising that private finance can work in the public interest, but we have always been clear that our health service must be run by the NHS and that private finance must be in partnership with public finance, not a substitute for it. The public sector, not the private sector, must set priorities in the public interest.

We believe that the Tories are using the PFI in health as a back door to privatisation. This debate raises serious questions about whether people will get their much-needed hospitals.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. On several occasions, the hon. Lady has said that she would give way to me in a moment. Could you, Madam Deputy Speaker, tell us what a parliamentary moment is, as I fear she has not the guts to give way?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. Whether an hon. Member gives way is not a matter for the Chair.

Ms Harman: I have just remembered that every time I have given way to the hon. Gentleman previously, he has asked me questions that had nothing to do with the issue that we were debating. I reminded myself not to waste my time, or that of the House, by answering his questions.

The Bill also raises serious questions about public services and public accountability, because the Tories are not hostile to public spending. They are hostile to public services. When it comes to the chance to privatise and subsidise the private sector, money is no object. The Tories are not prudent with the public purse, they are reckless with it. That is what the Bill is about. For the sake of our public services and the accountability of the public purse, I call on the House to decline to give the Bill a Second Reading and to support our amendment.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): We have been treated to a speech of quite stunning disingenuousness by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman). We have heard a series of criticisms of the private finance initiative, which is now beginning to deliver benefits to my constituents and those of other right hon. and hon. Members, but we have heard not one scrap of detail about how the Opposition propose to alter the rules of the PFI to bring about the remedies that they claim are now needed. We have seen a rather feeble attempt to gloss over the differences between the hon. Lady, with her avowed hostility to the whole concept of the private finance initiative, and her deputy, the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), who—rather than decry the PFI—wishes to claim authorship of it for himself and for his party.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Surely the differences are not just between hon. Members on the Front Bench but between the hon. Member for Peckham and the local Labour parties in Dartford and Gravesham, which fully support the private finance initiative in the construction of a new hospital on the Darenth Park site. The hon. Lady must know that because she has made inquiries, but she has not raised that point today. That tells me that she knows that there are no votes in the line that she is taking in the constituency of Dartford.

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend makes his point well.

We also heard a series of criticisms from the hon. Member for Peckham of the reduction in planned tax finance capital expenditure on the NHS in the plans published in the Budget for the financial year 1996-97. We did not, of course, hear that, even at that reduced level, capital spending on the NHS in the next financial year would still be some 50 per cent. higher than the level that the Conservative party inherited from the Labour party when we took office in 1979.

I listened very carefully to the hon. Lady's speech and I noticed that, once again, while she criticised the Government for alleged parsimony in the capital funding of public services, she was careful to make no commitment on the part of herself, her Front-Bench team or her party to increase by one penny, let alone by the billions of pounds which she claims are needed, the amount that a putative Labour Government would be prepared to spend on the NHS. The Opposition are prepared to talk in a way that encourages expectations, but again and again they refuse to spell out the cost and how it would be met.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Is that not exactly what the disabled persons thought when they went to Labour party headquarters? The Labour party does a lot of talking, but it does not give much commitment.

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend puts her points in as forceful and telling a manner as usual.

Nor would one guess from listening to the hon. Member for Peckham that capital projects under the traditional Treasury route have often been subject to prolonged delay and change stretching over many years. That applies to hospitals, roads and railway projects. It is inherent in capital spending, which is dependent on Treasury finance, that it becomes subject to the exigencies of overall Government priorities for public spending. The fate of individual projects can depend on the horse trading that takes place each year between spending Departments and the Treasury on which area of the Government's overall programme should get priority for that financial year.

I want to talk briefly about the project that I know best—the one approved for the South Buckinghamshire NHS trust Amersham and High Wycombe hospitals. Although they are located just outside my constituency, they serve a great many of my constituents as well as those of my hon. Friends the Members for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan).

As the hon. Member for Peckham pointed out, the South Buckinghamshire NHS trust was putting together proposals for a major capital building programme before the latest private finance initiative was launched. The project, approved in the Budget statement last year, will deliver new hospital facilities much more quickly than local people had dreamt was possible, had they had to take their turn in the queue at the Treasury door, via the traditional funding route. Moreover, the design of the new buildings, and their location, not to mention the way the various facilities will be distributed between the two sites at Amersham and Wycombe, will deliver higher-quality clinical services than would have been achieved under the plans originally drafted by local management using the traditional Treasury funding route. It is clear to me from my recent talks with local trust managers and clinicians that they unanimously welcome the PFI, as hastening the prospect of top-quality hospital facilities for local people.

We have heard Labour party criticism of the alleged laxity of financial controls in the NHS—the alleged risk of money matters going wrong. Having looked at the projects planned in Buckinghamshire, I find it difficult to understand how anyone could believe that. I have seen the proposals for new buildings crawled over, first by the trusts and their advisers, then by the regional health authority, then by the NHS executive, then by the Department of Health and Treasury officials—all to make sure that the right safeguards are in place and that the outcome will be good NHS provision to suit the needs of local people, at a price that will deliver value for money to the taxpayer.

As the PFI progresses, there are still some difficulties to be resolved. It is a new procedure, and I am sure that Ministers will want to learn from experience of the first projects so as to be able to improve procedures as the initiative takes hold and gathers pace.

I should like to direct the Under-Secretary's attention to two points in particular. First, I hope that Ministers will always be alert to the need to avoid detailed discussions getting bogged down in the sort of Treasury-Whitehall theology that has delayed projects in the past. As an example, I offer the distinction between a finance lease and an operating lease. A finance lease amounts to providing borrowing to pay for an asset, and that would count within the public sector borrowing requirement. An operating lease is defined as a payment for a service which may include the acquisition of a building and it does not count in the PSBR. I hope that we can avoid lengthy arguments between groups of accountants in various public bodies; such disputes can slow down the attainment of an objective on which everyone is fundamentally agreed.

Secondly, I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends will look closely at hospital trusts that may want to apply through the PFI for funding for construction—and perhaps maintenance—of buildings, but not necessarily for the management of facilities also. It will be precisely the hospital trusts that have made the greatest progress towards contracting out many of their ancillary services which may find it more difficult to let a single contract to a PFI partner for the management of those services in future.

I am certain that my right hon. and hon. Friends will try to learn from experience. I am also sure that this initiative bodes well for my constituents and for those of many other hon. Members. I wish the policy and the Bill well.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): When I heard the Secretary of State speaking, I was reminded of the questions that Tony Hancock asked himself shortly before he committed suicide: "What does it all mean? Why I am here? Where are we going?" He answered the questions as follows: "I don't know. I don't know. I don't know." The Secretary of State spoke for 50 minutes, telling us that this Bill changed nothing. I should hate to listen to him moving the Second Reading of a Bill that did change something.

Let us imagine the scene. It is Tuesday 27 February, late evening. The shadow Secretary of State for Health is at home after a hard day. She is lost in reverie; suddenly her whole world looks like crashing in—the telephone rings. There is a man on the other end of the line. His voice is cracking and he seems close to tears. It is the Secretary of State for Health. He says, "Harriet, I'm in trouble—you've got to help me. You're my friend, aren't you?"

The Secretary of State then pulls himself together and explains that he is being blackmailed by a bunch of bankers—three times tonight he used the term, a bunch of "shysters". They are, it seems, blackmailing him into passing the Bill as part of a wider negotiating package. They are telling him, "We are business men, not risk takers." There is panic in the right hon. Gentleman's voice. He says that the Bill is to be published tomorrow, and that Second Reading must be on 5 March—last Tuesday. The Bill must be through the House by Whitsun.

The shadow Secretary of State for Health stands firm, however, and is not seduced by the blandishments of a Secretary of State who is clearly trying to con her over the telephone in the middle of the night. Some people may think this story apocryphal; it tells the House what the Bill is all about.

Then, on 4 March, the Secretary of State for Health comes before the Treasury Select Committee to be questioned about the Bill and the private finance initiative. He is usually elegant and composed, but last week he look frazzled—he had obviously had a sleepless weekend. He told us that the bankers still would not sign the PFIs, and that they wanted the Bill, together with other negotiated settlements that present hurdles which he still cannot get around.

The questioning has scarcely begun when this suave, assured, sophisticated Secretary of State suddenly loses control. I know, because I was there asking him the questions. I have the transcript with me. My question, directly related to the Bill, was about the power of trusts to borrow and about how liabilities that the Secretary of State has to meet can be built up. I asked:

"Can you tell me, the trusts have the power to borrow, do they not?"

The Secretary of State replied:

"No, that is incorrect."

At that point, it was as though an electric charge had gone through the Select Committee. Everyone sat bolt upright in utter amazement. I was gobsmacked, to borrow a phrase usually used by the Governor of Hong Kong. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman had misheard the question. So, with incredulity tinged with sarcasm, I repeated it:

"The trusts do not have the power to borrow?"

The Secretary of State replied:

"The trusts do not have the power to borrow."

I am absolutely amazed by that double assertion on the part of the Secretary of State. I have in front of me a copy of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. Under the heading "Borrowing", paragraph 1 of schedule 3, on the financial provisions relating to NHS trusts, states:

"(1) Subject to the provisions of this paragraph and to any limit imposed under the following provisions of this Schedule, for the purpose of its functions an NHS trust may borrow (both temporarily, by way of overdraft, and longer term) from the Secretary of State or any other person."

The Secretary of State said twice in succession that NHS trusts had no powers to borrow. We have a Secretary of State who does not know what is in his own legislation, who does not understand how trusts operate, who does not understand how schemes are paid for and how liabilities, which he will guarantee in the Bill, are built up. That is astonishing. It is incredible. By any standards, it is extraordinary.

I have been a civil servant, a parliamentary private secretary—a bit of a dogsbody—and a Member of the House. I have seen Secretaries of State who are ignorant. I have seen Secretaries of State who are very ignorant, but never before have I seen a Secretary of State whose ignorance measures force 12 on the Richter scale. That is hurricane-level ignorance. The Secretary of State's behaviour seemed a bit like that of an A-level student about to take his English examination who does not know his ABC. It was a bit like a plumber walking into a house to mend a cistern and saying that he had forgotten his tools. These were basic facts that we would expect a Minister to know.

I wonder what the civil servants who were at that meeting thought about it. When I was in the civil service, we expected our Secretary of State to go to the Dispatch Box and put on a good performance. We expected our Secretary of State to go to a Committee upstairs properly briefed with all the answers. After all, there were hundreds of us providing the Secretary of State with every single bit of information. A triumph for the Secretary of State was a triumph for us, and a failure by the Secretary of State was a failure for us. As the Secretary of State displayed this astonishing ignorance, he debased and demeaned not only his civil servants and his office but the Department for which he worked.

It is worse than that. I asked how much trusts could borrow, and how great, by way of borrowing, were the liabilities that he was prepared to undertake under the Bill. Because he does not know that a trust can borrow, I imagine that his answer is "None." Paragraph 3 of schedule 3, on limits of indebtedness in relation to trusts, which the Secretary of State thinks cannot borrow anything, reads:

"(1) The aggregate of all sums borrowed by NHS trusts established to assume responsibility for the ownership and management of, or to provide and manage, hospitals or other establishments or facilities which are situated in England"—

only England—

"shall not exceed £5,000 million or such other sum not exceeding £10,000 million as may be specified by order made by the Secretary of State with the consent of the Treasury."

This Secretary of State, apparently, is prepared to allow trusts to borrow £10 billion under his own directions without knowing what it is about. That is why there are people like me—people who have fiduciary and fiscal probity—on the Treasury Select Committee. I have seen whole Governments collapse because they borrowed £10 billion more than they should have. Yet this whiz kid, who used to work for the Treasury, goes to the Department of Health and is prepared to see trusts borrow £10 billion and know absolutely nothing about it. What on earth is happening to our country? Is it any wonder that we are a backward, fractious island off the coast of north-west Europe, with a culture that is in irreversible decline?

[Mr. Brian Sedgemore]

Why is the Secretary of State so ignorant? My hon. Friend the Member for Peckham asked that question. One answer to that is that ignorance is quite often born of arrogance and laziness. That reminds me a ditty by Cole Porter:

"It's not 'cause I shouldn't
It's not 'cause I wouldn't
And you know it's not 'cause I couldn't
It's simply because I'm the laziest man in town."

To be fair, the Secretary of State may not be the laziest man in town, but everybody in the House now knows that he is the laziest Secretary of State in Whitehall. He has made indolence an art form. If Marlowe was right when he said,

"there is no sin but ignorance", one of the biggest sinners in the world would be the Secretary of State for Health.

The point that I want to make is that the Secretary of State continued to say that nothing could ever go wrong, that no trust would ever get to a situation where it might have many liabilities to meet, and in any case he would honour them however and wheresoever they had been caused. I shall give one example of the problems that we might face. It relates to the PFI of the Royal Hospitals NHS trust. The PFI is six, seven, eight, nine or 10 times bigger than anything that has been mentioned tonight; it is for £260 million to close St. Bartholomew's hospital and build a new 750-bed hospital in Whitechapel.

It is generally agreed that the private finance initiative is flawed, and therefore that there could be liabilities after this huge sum of money has been invested. How do I know that it is flawed? First, one of the senior figures at the East London and City health authority—the purchaser—told one of the members of the Treasury Select Committee, and I put this to one of our witnesses at the hearing, that the project was not financially viable. That is the kind of thing that my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham is saying. If someone puts in £260 million and the project is not financially available and the trust goes bust, who will pick up the tab? The Bill says that it will not be the contractors and the people who will build and manage the hospital.

We do not need simply to take the evidence of a senior figure who works for the purchaser. The financial viability was question by the York Economics Consortium, which consists of some of the most prestigious health experts in the country. It said, when expressing doubts about the capital and revenue estimates of the PFI, which will probably have to be bailed out by the Bill:

"The preferred option generates an additional saving of £9m at the cost of almost £100m in additional capital spending. For this additional capital cost to be justified, the revenue benefits of the incremental spend must be reasonably secure.

We believe that there is sufficient uncertainty around the estimates of net revenue savings . . . that the magnitude of the assumed difference in costs between the options is extremely sensitive. Since this difference is, in any case, relatively small in relation to the total revenue expenditure of the Trust . . . further evidence is needed before the additional capital expenditure of £100m required to move from a do minimum to a single site solution can be justified on a purely financial basis."

The purchaser is saying, "Here's a PFI that can build up liabilities which the Government may have to pick up from the private sector." The York Economics Consortium is saying exactly the same thing. There is also a third body, the King's Fund, which commissioned the CASPE Consulting report, which said:

"Business people are used to taking risks, but of a calculated sort. The Trust is expecting to start negotiations with Private Finance Consortia soon."

I break off there. One hundred people from the private finance world seeing £260 million coming into their hands have said that they are interested. Of course they are interested. They will be particularly interested if the Bill is passed and their liabilities are picked up if and when things go wrong.

"Even on the figures in the OBC"—

the outline business case—

"it would appear wise for any of the possible consortia to check whether the CASPE Consulting St. Bartholomew's Foundation option incorporating new partnerships would not produce better returns and do so much more quickly . . . even the preliminary work undertaken to date suggests that a complete reconsideration and development of a new Foundation option, incorporating the service proposals of both NHS and non NHS partners, would be wise and be likely to produce a better solution for the NHS."

Those three prestigious groups, the purchaser, the York Economics Consortium and the King's Fund, which produced the original documentation on which the private finance initiative was based, are all now saying that this is a major scheme—by the standards of everything that the Secretary of State has told us, a mega-scheme—which could go horribly wrong. If it goes horribly wrong, the private finance consortia will want the Bill. They are another group of bankers who will not sign unless they get the Bill.

The Government, in effect, are promising the private finance consortia two things. First, they are promising them the Bill and, secondly, they are saying behind our backs—I put it to the Secretary of State and he said that he knew about it, and I also put it to Gerry Green, the chief executive of the Royal Hospitals NHS trust—"We can get around this because, if we get the Bill and we have got them to sign the private finance initiative, we can increase the size of the hospital from 750 to 1,020 beds."

That requires a new outline business case. The public have been told nothing about that. If I had not raised it at a meeting of the Treasury Select Committee, no one would know it even now. It would require a new outline business case and new consultation. Therefore, this is a process to avoid the new outline business case and the new consultation. It is all predicated on first getting the Bill through and then getting the private finance consortia to sign.

The Secretary of State has said that he does not want any of the private finance initiatives to take place against—I am not sure that I have his exact words—a difficult political decision. Who does he think he is kidding? Those private finance consortia really should now think hard about exactly what they are signing and exactly what response they expect from a future Labour Government who could be in power before any of these schemes have been signed. The response that they will get is the responsible attitude of my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham. Therefore, they have a lot of worrying to do about the Bill, and so has the House.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I am delighted to support the Bill. It is a technical but none the less important measure. It is essential that contractors and suppliers to NHS trusts are secure in their credit arrangements for the work that they do for the national health service. It is absolutely important for the suppliers and for the private finance initiative.

The PFI represents building for the future of our NHS, and it is particularly relevant to the hospitals in north-west Kent. At present, hospital provision in north-west Kent is spread across three sites—the Joyce Green hospital, north of Dartford, an old fever hospital; the West Hill hospital in Dartford, an old poor law house; and the Gravesend and North Kent hospital in my constituency, a subscription hospital from the previous century.

Our in-patient hospital services are spread across those three sites and they are administered by the Dartford and Gravesham NHS trust. They are far from ideal. In fact, those hospitals have possibly the worst fabric of any in the former south-east Thames region. Nevertheless, they work for us very well because of the dedication of our doctors and nurses and everyone else who works there. But we desperately need our new district general hospital.

For years now, as in other cases mentioned in the debate, we have seen plans come and go and be put off. The reason for that is simple. If one goes to the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day and asks for a cheque for £100 million, either one gets a dusty answer and it is back to the drawing board, or one is asked, "Couldn't it be done in phases on one of the existing three sites?" A first phase would be allowed immediately; then, after some scratching of heads and playing with the capital programme, there might be a second phase a few years down the road; later still, there might be a third phase.

The new district general hospital for north-west Kent has been designed, redesigned and redesigned again. Round and round we have gone. That is not to say that the Government have not been building new hospitals. I wanted to make this point when I tried to intervene on the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), but her courage failed her and she did not feel able to give way as she had promised to do on a number of occasions. The Government have had a massive hospital capital programme. Since they came to office in 1979, there have been 800 major new hospital projects, each costing more than £1 million. I could have pointed out to the hon. Lady that that rate of investment is more than four times greater than that under the previous Labour Government. Nevertheless, our hospital in north-west Kent has not yet been built and nor have the others to which she referred. That is the crux of the issue.

We could wait in a long queue for the capital programme to come forward from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Of course, it is a better programme than Labour ever had, but it is not moving fast enough for us in north-west Kent or in those other places that have been mentioned. That is why the PFI is so valuable and why I and my constituents resent the ridiculous political posturing of the hon. Member for Peckham. It is not good enough. We want our hospital. The hon. Lady opposes the PFI yet makes no commitment on behalf of the Labour Government that she hopes might be elected. That leaves my constituents in the limbo with which they are all too familiar, but with the difference that they would be without hope.

The PFI has given my constituents hope. They have hope because the Government, through the NHS trust, have invited bids under the PFI to build that new general hospital in north-west Kent. Four major consortia have come forward keen to succeed in their bid to build and finance the hospital and, in the long term, to run its housekeeping—the servicing, the cleaning, the provision of groundsmen, the parking arrangements, the catering and a number of ancillary services. Under the PFI, they would provide the hospital, by means of a long lease for which they would be paid a substantial fee, and all the services. When I bear in mind the fact that the budget of our NHS trust is £56 million a year, there is obviously a certain amount of scope to do precisely that.

That is not privatisation. It is private provision under a contract, but the important point which is of concern to my constituents is that the NHS will put in the doctors, consultants, nurses, medical support, administration and booking arrangements so that we obtain the best possible health care from the facilities provided.

Thanks to the PFI, four consortia are bidding to build the brand new general hospital in north-west Kent. There are big names among them. Each consortium includes a major construction company—obviously so, as they are keen to secure the contract to build a major project—a catering and hotel servicing company, a financial company and a project administration company. They are likely to create an on-going, functioning hospital, with all the efficiency that the private sector can provide when its money is on the line.

As I told the House, we were always told to have a phase here and a phase there built on current locations, which would mean Joyce Green hospital near Dartford, a site immensely unpopular in Gravesend and not much more popular in Dartford. The old NHS financing system—still supported by the Labour party—would have led to a new hospital at Joyce Green. When we asked the four private sector bidders, through the bidding process, where they would build the new hospital for north-west Kent—surprise, surprise—the message from came back loud and clear: Joyce Green is unsuitable for a new hospital. That is most fascinating for my constituents.

The bidders would prefer the Darenth Park site between Dartford and Gravesend because that is the site preferred by my constituents and those of my hon. Friends the Members for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) and for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson). That is what happens when the private sector is used, rather than the old-fashioned, bureaucratic system that we had in the past and in which Labour has a great belief.

Where are we now? The four bids are being considered carefully and in detail. It is all very well for the hon. Member for Peckham to make great fun about assessment, but my constituents want arrangements for the hospital to be thorough so that it will deliver our hospital services over many decades. We are not playing games when it comes to the health care of people in north-west Kent. I hope that that assessment is thorough and quick. All the signs are that that is precisely what is happening. We shall soon have a shortlist of two. There will then be public consultation of my constituents, who will be the patients in those hospitals. The contractual negotiations will then take place with a view to contracts being signed this autumn. Under the new PFI system, my constituents have the best chance of progress that they have had under any Government.

[Mr. Jacques Arnold]

When the contracts are completed and the project has been constructed and is operating, Joyce Green and West Hill hospitals in Dartford will pass into history and the Gravesend and North Kent hospital facility will become free and available. For many years, my constituents have had a dream: to have their own community hospital providing basic health care in Gravesend. Gravesend and North Kent hospital will have the opportunity to pass to the Thameslink Healthcare Services NHS trust. It will serve a conurbation of 100,000 souls in Gravesham and Southfleet, and in Longfield and New Barn in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford. It will provide valuable services in our town: minor injuries, out-patients, acute active rehabilitation, elderly care, general practitioner beds, primary health, physiotherapy, dental and diagnostic services, all in a community hospital that my constituents dearly wish to have. Again, that will be financed through a private finance initiative currently costed to the tune of £8.5 million.

If the NHS were structured and financed under the old Labour system, to which the hon. Member for Peckham seems to wish to return, my constituents would have remained in a queue for many years. It is now clear that the Conservative Government, with their new and imaginative PFI system, are taking our hospital project forward. We are already seeing the benefits of the NHS reforms. Fundholding general practices in my constituency have been successful beyond our wildest dreams.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. I am always happy to have passing references to local matters, but he seems to be moving a long way from the subject of the Bill. The Bill concerns winding things up rather than starting them off, which appears to be the main subject of his speech.

Mr. Arnold: The concern is that, if either of the two trusts to which I have referred—which will develop our general hospital or our community hospital—faced the risk of being wound up and of leaving creditors with no one to pursue, the contracts for the PFI and for supply of hospitals could be in doubt. That is why the Bill is so relevant. I am outlining my constituents' hopes, which could not be fulfilled under the old structure of financing the NHS, to which the Labour party remains wedded. The fulfilment of those hopes must be guaranteed by the passage of the Bill, which would ensure that proper financial security exists for PFI contractors and for suppliers. That is vital.

That is the reason why I was distressed to hear the Opposition spokeswoman time and again attacking the PFI. Perhaps somewhat naively, my constituents and I took to heart the Leader of the Opposition's comment:

"The PFI is right in principle."—[Official Report, 28 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1077.]

I thought that this matter might have gone out of the party political arena, but the performance of the Labour spokeswoman for health threw all those hopes out of the window by seeming to bring sterile party political battles into it. We heard quoted her comment to the Birmingham Health conference on 13 January this year:

"I don't call it a Private Finance Initiative, I call it a privatisation initiative."

What is that supposed to mean? It appears to be hostile to the PFI, which is born out by the fact that the Labour party intends to vote against the Bill tonight.

We want the PFI. My constituents will understand and share my view that, apparently, we need a Conservative Government to take the PFI forward this and the other side of the next general election. Our hospital dreams depend on it. The PFI and all the legislation needed to make it a reality is vital to my constituents because, in respect of hospitals for north-west Kent, the PFI is turning dreams into reality.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The debate is prompted and motivated, and the Bill has been introduced, for two obvious reasons. There is the theoretical, academic reason, explained probably six times by the Secretary of State for Health in his speech. It is that the Secretary of State of the day might not pick up the tab if a trust were to be dissolved and left with debts. The real reason, however, is that the problem came to light once the Government started going at much greater speed than ever before down the private finance initiative road. That was the explanation. The Secretary of State was honest about it. The current law allows discretion for the Secretary of State to say, "No, sorry—I am not picking up the tab."

Clearly, dealing with the "not picking up the tab" point is important. In the part of the world from which I come, the South Thames training and enterprise council went to the wall a year and a quarter ago. The Secretary of State for Employment, as he then was—he is now Secretary of State for Defence—suddenly wound it up, and a number of people who had traded with it in the belief that it was an agent of Government were left whistling for their money: training providers, local colleges and local firms. Many never received their money.

The Government did the dirty. They claimed their entitlement, saying, "We are the preferred creditors, so we shall take our money first even if others must suffer." I know all about agents, or agencies, of Government that claim to be supported by the Treasury or other Departments, but are eventually shown to be other than what they claim. With members of the other main parties, I went to see the Secretary of State, and he told us that the same applied to local councils. If a council went to the wall, the Government could say, "Sorry, but we will not bail you out." A council could be declared bankrupt, but the Government would not be obliged to support it.

I believe that the Government should be responsible for Government agencies. Theoretically, therefore, I am happy for the law to be amended. But this is not just a theoretical issue—it is a practical issue. We are having this debate because the Government have clearly said that they cannot sign the PFI contracts—as emerged in the Select Committee on 4 March, none has yet been signed—unless assurances can be given that people will never be left whistling for their money. The reason is clear: the private sector partners will not play ball. I understand why they do not want to find themselves in bigger difficulties than they would otherwise.

That raises a general question that I have raised in the House before. When and where did Parliament decide that the national health service should become dependent on the private finance initiative in regard to capital projects?

Unless I missed it, or it was written in invisible ink, nothing to that effect was included in the manifesto on which the Conservatives fought the last general election and, under our funny electoral system, won the election despite the fact that most people voted against them.

Since then, there has never been a formal statement of Government policy telling us that, in future, the capital building programme of the NHS will be funded by the private sector. The Government have allowed the PFI to creep in. They have said that they intend to rely on it in more and more ways, but they have not been so straightforward with the House. It is clear—this, too, emerged in the Treasury Select Committee—that, according to the original proposal put to Parliament by different Departments, the PFI was a way of raising extra money: it was not intended to serve as an excuse for substituting private for public money.

As was clear from the public expenditure statements made to the House at the end of November, there will be a 12.7 per cent. reduction in next year's publicly funded NHS capital programme. The Secretary of State confirmed that fact to the Select Committee. Although he did not say so explicitly, he was honest enough to accept that in reality the PFI is unlocking private money to make up for the fact that the Government are not committing public money to the hospital building programme.

My colleagues and I have no theological objection to the use of the private sector to supply public services. That is done every day of the week by, for instance, education authorities buying books for schools. We do, however, object to discovering suddenly that the proposition on which we had relied—that the hospital building programme, and other NHS capital projects, would be publicly funded—has been replaced by a proposal to cut public funding and replace it with private finance. I shall not vote for that unless we have tested to our satisfaction the proposition that we are to get better value for money—a proposition which, as recently as a year ago, was not supported by the Treasury. A year ago, the Treasury was still advising the Department of Health that the PFI would probably prove more rather than less expensive.

Let us suppose that a private sector consortium was commissioned to build a hospital. Let us also suppose that it was assumed that the private sector would use the hospital for 50 years, and that a 50-year rental agreement was drawn up. According to previous Treasury advice, even if the hospital was transferred to the public sector at the end of those 50 years for no more than the rental payment, the payments spread over that period would amount to more than would be involved in borrowing to spend now. We all know why that is: it is cheaper for the Government to borrow money than for anyone else to do so, because they are the most secure of all borrowers. It had always been assumed that they were the best borrower, because they obtained the best rates. If the Government were going to borrow to fund an NHS capital building programme, that was the cheapest way of providing the service.

When I have seen the evidence that proves what the Secretary of State now asserts, which is contrary to Treasury advice given less than a year ago—that it is cheaper for the private sector to build hospitals in Amersham, Scotland, the east end of London, on the south bank of the Thames and in Carlisle, for instance—I shall find it difficult to argue that that is not in the interests of the taxpayer and the consumer. But it has not been proved, and yet again we are putting the cart before the horse. We are cutting NHS capital expenditure. There is no argument about that: the Secretary of State has admitted that there is to be a 12.7 per cent. cut next year, and according to the Chancellor's Red Book over the next few years we shall see the largest relative reduction in expenditure on the health service capital programme since 1948.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): No.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, we shall. Since 1948, public expenditure on the health service has grown regularly, year on year. It has gone up and down, but the overall graph has risen. Over the next few years, as projected by the Chancellor, we shall see the greatest slowdown ever in the commitment of public capital expenditure to the NHS, and in its expansion. I can show the Minister the figures, which are in the public domain.

I shall not vote for such action, because I believe that the case must be proved before we sign up to it—and I will not sign up to action for which the motivation is driven not by accountancy or a desire for value for money, but by the approach of a general election which must be preceded by the delivery of tax cuts. The Chancellor delivered tax cuts last November; we opposed them, Labour abstained and the Government voted for them. He wants to deliver tax cuts next November; I assume that we shall again vote against them, Labour will again abstain and the Government will again vote for them. The only way in which the Chancellor can do that is by keeping down public expenditure, which means that he must transfer not just the risk but the cost to the private sector. A year ago, the Treasury said that that was the more expensive option, and I do not believe that those advisers have suddenly changed their minds.

I would be very happy with a procedure whereby the Treasury and Health Select Committees and the House took evidence from everyone concerned and subsequently decided whether the PFI was cheaper for hospital building, the provision of clinical services or a mixture of the two. That is what good legislation and policy should mean. But I am certainly not happy to sign up to something that says, "Last year it was bad news; this year it is good news." We have seen no evidence to show that anything has changed. I am less happy because, while the national health service is supposed to be run democratically, trusts meet and take decisions in secret and are accountable to nobody in the public whom they serve. They are accountable only to civil servants and the Secretary of State for Health.

The decision-making process to select the consortium to which a hospital project will go is not out in the open. Nor will a privately financed project be demonstrably cheaper—over 50 years, it may be more expensive. No one has agreed to that process apart from people who meet in secret behind closed doors. The public have not agreed to it. The Secretary of State told the Select Committee that financial deals with the private sector would not be approved unless those involved on the clinical side agreed. Who is to say to how many people, and to whom, the Government will talk? I have had plenty of experience of the Secretary of State talking to people in the health service and saying that they have agreed when they have not or when some have agreed and others have disagreed. That is why there is a risk.

[Mr. Hughes]

I have a practical suggestion about how we should proceed. I do not want a system that tells me after the event whether a project is good value for money but one that tells me that before the event. I do not want a civil servant, the accounting officer, to report privately to the chief accounting officer, the chief executive of the NHS, through documents that the public cannot see and say whether a project is good value for money. I would be happy for an independent person such as the Comptroller and Auditor General to do that job. If his office said, "Right, go ahead, it is cheaper, and you can go ahead because it is better value for money," the project should go ahead. However, until and unless publicly accountable independent people, not employed by the Government of the day, give that advice so that the public can see and hear it, we are being asked to sign up to an unacceptable proposition.

The Minister will know of the example of the proposals before the Guy's and St. Thomas' NHS Trust because it serves many of his constituents. Surprise, surprise—the trust has got a bit of a private finance initiative idea. The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) made the point well that the PFI is being used an excuse for further delaying things that were about to go ahead. South of the river, we were about to go ahead with an outline business case that had been worked out by the trust. We were told that it was ready to be the final business case, but it never quite saw the light of day.

It was a bit like snakes and ladders. Just as we were about to move off the square, we were told, "Sorry, you've got to down the snake marked private finance initiative." We have to go back to the beginning to find whether the proposal that was worked up as part of trust's public sector plan could be done more cheaply in the private sector. It may be true, as was said earlier, that there had been no development for six years at Norwich hospital, but the PFI means having to go round an extra loop, which may take a year or two, before getting back to where one started. There is no guarantee that anything will have been achieved because it may prove that it would be more expensive to use the PFI than to use the original public route. The real issue about capital programmes and capital spend in the health service is ensuring that there is an accountable way of getting value for money irrespective of whether projects are in the public or private sectors.

I was delighted when the right hon. Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern), the Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission, told me last Monday that the Comptroller and Auditor General will investigate what has been happening south of the river, where a building project for Philip Harris house and associated works that were originally to have cost £56 million are now scheduled to cost £157 million. They were originally due to be finished in 1993; now, if we are lucky, they will be finished in 1997. That is the sort of question that I want answered.

The Government commissioned a building which, three years ago, they called the flagship building of the national health service. Why we are now told that we shall have to spend another £112 million on a new building on another site to do work for which the building on which we have just spent £150 million is specially built and equipped? Those are the questions that my constituents want answered. I am delighted that the Comptroller and Auditor General is to investigate them. I wish that he had been monitoring the system all through and made sure that projects, once money has been committed to them as being the best value for money, are seen through and that Government and officials behind closed doors do not suddenly change their minds about how to use buildings.

We will win the argument and prove that Philip Harris house should be used for its intended purpose. We will show that it will still be better value for money to use the building on which the money has been spent and not commit another £112 million somewhere else. I hope that the Government also realise that unless they agree, they will be throwing extra public money after that which they are already committed to spend.

Let us address the real questions, get the evidence out in the open and have an informed debate. We should not deceive ourselves that this is all about sharing risks. It is no more about sharing risks now, or in the future, than it has been in the past. Risks have always been shared. Whenever the health service commissions work from a private builder, there is a shared risk. If the private builder takes three years or goes bust, the project is covered by contracts and insurance. The health service was no worse off in that situation than it would be if a consortium and the health service, on behalf of the taxpayer, proposed to build or expand a hospital, clinic or other facility together.

I am happy to sign up to something which says that the NHS trusts should not suddenly leave people whistling for their money, but I am not prepared to do so without ever having been asked to approve the proposal that we replace public by private money and start moving the whole NHS capital building programme from the public sector to the private sector. Until and unless we are given some assurances about the way in which the health service is going and whether it is being openly and accountably managed so that we can see that we are getting the best value for money for everyone, we shall reserve our position on the Bill and vote for Labour's reasoned amendment. We shall not vote if there is a Division on Second Reading because we cannot approve a package deal that conceals more than it reveals.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Colchester, South and Maldon): Labour Members' speeches consisted mainly of a combination of synthetic outrage and scaremongering. I exclude the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) from that charge. His was a more reasoned critique of the private finance initiative, although I do not entirely agree with what he had to say.

The Bill is largely a technical measure but nevertheless one of some importance. It is necessary to ensure the continuing success of the PFI in the NHS. The PFI already greatly benefits the health service.

Before the autumn statement in 1992, hon. Members will recall that Treasury orthodoxy was implacably opposed to the use of private capital on public sector projects. Almost any suggestion immediately fell foul of the notorious Ryrie rules, which were almost designed to ensure that the conditions set for privately financed projects were impossible to meet. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health who, as Financial Secretary, had the imagination to ignore the mandarins and break free of the rigid Treasury constraints.

It was perhaps unsurprising that, to begin with, attention focused on opportunities to use private capital for transport projects because it is easier to create a stream of income from tolling which would give private investors their return on such projects. For services that are specifically free to the user, such as the NHS, it is more complicated to ensure the return on capital. However, the advantages of private sector involvement in the financing of capital projects are the same as in every other area of public sector provision. They include the opportunity to take advantage of additional skills and expertise, to gain access to new sources of capital and to transfer risk. Private sector involvement allows the NHS to share overheads and benefit from economies of scale.

There is no reason why publicly funded health care has to be supplied by publicly financed and managed hospitals. When the NHS takes on the design and construction of new facilities, it is exposed to risks that can impose costs and reduce efficiency. Anybody who has been involved in a construction project will know that there are 101 things that can push up the cost or throw out the timetable. The result is that more money has to be diverted away from patient care. The PFI allows those risks to be reduced and to be transferred to a private partner.

Since 1992, the PFI has taken root with the establishment of the PFI database in the health service and the requirement that all capital projects be tested to determine their potential for private sector input. The database significantly speeds up the process of matching NHS and private sector organisations with mutual interests, as well as providing a much wider range of potential partners from which a trust can choose. It also allows trusts to draw on the experiences of others in the NHS who have dealt with the private sector, to ensure that their knowledge and expertise are shared.

Already, considerable interest has been revealed and a number of projects are up and running. At its most exciting, the PFI allows the provision for NHS trusts of complete new hospitals, or significant parts of hospitals, funded by the private sector. But opportunities for private sector involvement in health care are by no means limited to the financing of capital-intensive hospital building projects. Indeed, a report commissioned last year by the London Implementation Group recommended that the only way to get privately financed primary health care centres built quickly in inner London would be to allow private health providers to both build and operate them.

In the first instance, trusts may concentrate on those assets and services that are not core functions, such as car parking, waste incineration, energy management, patient accommodation and hotel services, but other schemes may involve direct patient services that carry a risk of uncertain revenue streams, such as dialysis, day surgery and domiciliary services. The past three years have seen a gathering momentum so that, having started at the back of the field, the NHS is now out in front in making use of the PFI. So far, 45 PFI projects have been approved by the NHS executive, with a total capital value of more than £160 million. However, by the end of next year projects worth more than £1 billion will have come forward for assessment and approval.

Under this Government, an enormous amount is being spent on the health service—not just in current spending on patient care, but on capital projects as well. My own constituency is served by two general hospitals, each of which is seeing substantial investment in the expansion of facilities. My constituents in Maldon are served by Broomfield hospital in Chelmsford. I am pleased to see my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) in the Chamber. He, too, takes a close interest in the progress of that hospital. When he and I visited it recently, we saw that work had just started on a £25 million development. This will include six new theatres, a 20-bed burns unit with its own operating theatre, a 20-bed children's ward and six adult wards for plastic surgery, orthopaedic and rheumatology services, not to mention a new pharmacy, a new hydrotherapy pool and a new medical records library.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) referred to the Governments's hospital building programme as castles in the air. Those projects are no castles in the air—they are in train and will soon be available for patient care. When it is completed in two years' time, clinical space at Broomfield will be increased by more than 50 per cent.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I do not doubt what the hon. Gentleman says. My brother, who is his constituent, will no doubt be grateful for the hon. Gentleman's work. However, can he say with his hand on his heart that he has been shown evidence to prove that over the whole of the costing and the payback of the project—or any other project—it is unarguably considerably cheaper than any other route that might have been followed?

Mr. Whittingdale: I am interested to learn that the hon. Gentleman's brother is my constituent. I shall regard it as a specific challenge to persuade him to vote for me. I would be happy to have greater analysis. I believe that the private sector is capable of building and running hospitals more cheaply than the public sector. There is already some evidence to support that. However, it is early days with the PFI and I should be happy to see more work done to try to establish the precise facts. We are still in the early stages of private sector involvement in the building of hospitals for the NHS. I hope that there will be greater analysis in the coming months. I believe that it will show that the private sector is capable of building hospitals more cheaply and efficiently than the NHS.

It is not only my Maldon constituents who are benefiting from new capital facilities in the NHS. At Colchester general hospital, which covers the other end of my constituency—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman continues, I must reiterate a point that I made earlier: hon. Members' remarks must be related to the Bill and not be simply a general survey of the NHS in an hon. Member's constituency.

Mr. Whittingdale: I entirely take that point, Madam Deputy Speaker. However, at Colchester general hospital in particular, it is the PFI that allows the project to go ahead and therefore benefit my constituents in future. Without the provisions of the Bill, I believe that there would be a threat to the continued success of the PFI, which then might result in such projects not proceeding.

At Colchester general hospital, work is far advanced on a new obstetrics, gynaecology and orthopaedics unit. The next part of the £30 million development programme is the re-provision of acute care for the elderly and rehabilitation facilities. That is being undertaken under the PFI at a cost of about £9 million. It should be in place next year. In due course, we can also look forward to a brand new cancer unit in Colchester.

For years, my constituents have lost out because resources have been sucked away from north Essex and into London. As a result, we have suffered from some of the longest waiting lists in the country. At last, that problem is now being addressed and this year the North Essex health authority has been given a £11.5 million increase over and above inflation. However, the real proof of the Government's commitment to the NHS in north Essex is the creation of, in effect, two new hospitals in Colchester and Chelmsford.

Despite the enormous amounts that are being devoted to health care, demand for new facilities is growing continuously. Improvements in medical technology and increasing demand for health care from an aging population mean that resources will always be under pressure—and when budgets are squeezed, it is usually the capital programme that bears the brunt. The PFI can increasingly relieve the NHS of the burden of capital expenditure. This Bill, by clarifying the legal and constitutional status of NHS trusts, will remove one of the last inhibiting factors which may hold back private investors from taking advantage of the PFI.

What is extraordinary is the attitude of the Opposition to the Bill. In the past, they have said that they support the use of private finance for public sector projects. Indeed, as we have heard, they have even attempted to claim that they originally suggested it. The right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) is on record as saying that they have supported the PFI and, in many ways, have been advocating it. It therefore comes as something of a surprise to find that they are opposing the Bill.

The hon. Member for Peckham may not have caught up with the policy of her own party. Like the internal market, the purchaser-provider split, trust hospitals and, apparently, even general practitioner fundholding, she has not realised that it is another area where the Labour party is being forced to muzzle its previous opposition because of the obvious success of and support for those policies. It is certainly possible that she may not have understood the evolution in Labour party thinking, for on the very same day as her leader was expressing his support for the PFI, she was on the "Today" programme saying that the PFI was a new trick to privatise the NHS.

As is the case in so many other areas, the Labour party is in a state of total confusion: it knows that the public finance initiative is working, but it cannot bring itself to say so. The Labour party's ideology prevents it from admitting that the private sector is ever capable of doing things better than the public sector. We are entitled to know whether the Labour party would abandon the PFI, and stop the construction of the hospitals and the facilities that are being built by the PFI. Would the Labour party spend taxpayers' money to replace the investment which is now being financed by the private sector? What is the price tag on its ideological hostility? We have not received any answers to these questions during the debate.

The Bill is a sensible measure: it will ensure that the national health service continues to meet its debts, it will reinforce the confidence of private investors to participate in NHS capital projects and it will allow the PFI to continue to help us build an even better health service.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The hon. Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) obviously did not listen to my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) when she addressed the House and explained how the Labour party looks upon the public finance initiative programme, in this instance involving the national health service. My hon. Friend made it clear that the Labour party believes in a partnership arrangement between the public sector and the private sector.

The fact that there is no partnership arrangement with the PFI in the national health service makes us suspicious of what the Government plan. Conservative Members have said that they agree that the financiers should design, plan, build and run the hospitals. If that is not privatisation by the back door, what do Conservative Members require to prove to them that this is a privatisation of the national health service?

I draw hon. Members' attention to why I requested to speak in the debate. The Bill is of paramount interest to my constituents, in particular, and to the people of the Wakefield district, in general. Pinderfields general hospital, in Wakefield, is in my constituency. The doctors, the nurses and the support staff of the hospital are dedicated to the service that they provide and they deserve more help from the Department of Health.

I could have included the chief executive in the list of dedicated people at Pinderfields general hospital, but he left his post on Friday last week. I understand that the director of medical services is currently acting as the chief executive, in addition to performing his normal duties. The director was due to retire in July, but he has agreed to continue to work for a further 18 months, if required.

We are witnessing a further chapter in the Pinderfields scenario—a scenario that has continued for a considerable amount of time. Perhaps the Under-Secretary of State for Health, the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam), when he replies to the debate, can shed some light on what is taking place in Pinderfields general hospital trust.

I draw hon. Members' attention to some of the conditions under which the staff of Pinderfields must work and under which patients receive treatment. If there were a transfer of residual liabilities, a large area of Pinderfields general hospital would be worth very little. A number of the wards at Pinderfields general hospital were provided in 1940 for the wounded personnel of Her Majesty's forces. Approximately 30 temporary buildings were put into place as a provisional hospital—at that time, they were called the huts. The estimated life of the huts—with care, attention and maintenance—was 25 years. Many of the huts are still providing places for patients: 56 years after they were built and more than 30 years after what was estimated to be their useful life.

In 1949, I spent three months in H ward of the hospital because of an accident in the mining industry. At that time, the wards were well maintained, clean and well serviced. They fulfilled a useful purpose. Those wards are now residual liabilities. Over the past 20 years many promises have been made on the provision of a new hospital on the Pinderfields site to replace the 56-year-old temporary buildings.

A great deal of money has been spent trying to keep the huts at a standard fit for people to receive treatment and for people to work. They have had to make do and mend. On a number of occasions, we have been promised a new hospital, but, as yet, no provision has been made. The huts are built on a gradient and transferring patients on chairs and on trolleys can be a task. This is part of the legacy of the development that took place almost 60 years ago.

A new hospital is needed at Pinderfields. Additions have been made to the general hospital in the form of a new accident and emergency unit, and maternity facilities were transferred from Manygates health clinic in Wakefield. We have been told that there could be further transfers of that maternity service away from Wakefield. This issue is causing great concern to many of my constituents and to people in the Wakefield area in general. The accident and emergency unit and the maternity unit rely on some of the old premises to which I have referred.

Wakefield district is served by two general hospitals: Pinderfields and Pontefract. The latter is currently performing well, and it is fulfilling a most demanding and useful purpose. A few years ago there were eight to 10 hospitals in the Wakefield area, but now there are only two. Last year it was suggested that a new hospital could be built on a greenfield site to replace the existing two hospitals. That suggestion was dropped as a result of pressures from local people—the indigenous population—because they could see problems with closing the two hospitals and with the siting of a new hospital.

We have been advised that at Pinderfields general hospital there will be a £60 million replacement of the old huts and new buildings will supplement the existing and traditional buildings. We have also been advised that between £9 million and £12 million will be spent on Pontefract general hospital. Who will provide the capital? The Government say that it must come from the private finance initiative—and that is why we have this Bill.

We have been informed that the private sector will not sign contracts because of the existing laws. As has been pointed out by the Secretary of State and by my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham, under the law as it now stands, when a trust ceases to exist the Secretary of State need not accept the liabilities of the failed trust, including any liabilities under the PFI contracts. The Bill will resolve the problem of the private sector, but it will create impossible problems for the public sector—in this case, the national health service. It requires the Secretary of State to stand behind liabilities over which he has no control, which may total £5 billion, although we have heard that the figure might increase to £10 billion. That is the magnitude of the problem underlying the assurances that the Bill would give the private sector.

Pinderfields Hospital NHS trust wishes to enter into a PFI contract to build the new hospital. I ask the Secretary of State or the Minister, what is our chance of having a new hospital in the Wakefield area? Too many broken promises have been made, and there is little hope of new facilities.

What will the PFI partner demand from the hospital trust? Will the Secretary of State ensure that the PFI benefactor will not demand to be responsible for employing cleaners, for heating supplies and for the back-up services and responsibilities of the new hospital? We are informed that there might be demands in the PFI agreement for the PFI to engage people and run the hospital as an agent on behalf of the trust.

May we have clear, decisive answers to my questions and those asked by other Opposition Members? When can we have a new hospital, and will it be run and administered by the national health service with no strings attached to the PFI agreement?

The position in Pinderfields and in Wakefield is unusual because the Pinderfields site covers a substantial tract of land, owned by the trust, which could be developed for housing and commercial undertakings and is of value—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I have listened attentively to the hon. Gentleman. This is a Bill about the totality of the PFI and the covering of potential debts. It is not appropriate to go into the detail of the landholdings of a particular hospital.

Mr. O'Brien: I was arguing that the liabilities mentioned in the Bill include liabilities that are of value to the PFI developer. That aspect of PFI development worries many people, because there are assets that might influence an agreement.

On that site is the old Stanley Royd hospital, which would be included under the heading of liabilities in the Bill but is a valuable area of land and buildings. If that is included in the liabilities, it will be a substantial incentive to the PFI partner. I draw attention to that background because, if that area were of value and were valued, the PFI would make little effort to raise money because the money would be there in buildings and land, which are now available for disposal.

Why do we need a PFI in the Pontefract and Wakefield area when all those "liabilities" that are really assets are available to the NHS? Why do we need a private sector partner when the NHS has those valuable assets at its disposal? Who are the people in the NHS and the trusts, representing the people of Wakefield, who would offer our hospital services to private money-lenders when valuable public assets are available?

The PFI is privatisation in the form in which it has been presented tonight, and the Bill is intended to prop up the private sector. Why must we proceed down that road?

At present, we have two trusts and two hospitals. We are told that the two trusts will merge into one—each trust will cease to operate and a new one will be created. Problems are inherent in such an arrangement. There is much suspicion about the proposal. We are told that there will be a three-month consultation process before the new trust can be formed.

I draw the Minister's attention to a letter that was sent to the Secretary of State by the chairman of Wakefield community health council, in which he drew attention to the practices of previous Administrations. He said that members of Wakefield CHC are extremely concerned that promises that were made when previous Administrations were changed have not been fulfilled. The letter explains the anxieties of many people in my constituency—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Unless the CHC especially refers to the Bill, this sort of contribution is not in order in the debate. It is fair enough to use the example of the hospital in the hon. Gentleman's constituency to elucidate the main elements of the Bill, but not just to record what the CHC said on a previous occasion about that development.

Mr. O'Brien: Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am drawing attention to the lack of confidence in the consultation procedure that we are advised must be undertaken. If the Secretary of State and the Minister read carefully the letter of 6 March from the chairman of the CHC, they will understand why, in view of what happened previously, people in the Wakefield area are suspicious of the proposals to build a new hospital under the PFI and to change the hospital trusts.

Unless the Minister can give assurances tonight about the issues that I have mentioned on behalf of my constituents and the people who depend on the services of Pinderfields general hospital, and allay their suspicions, we shall not have the confidence that one would expect when debating such a Bill.

Because of the experiences mentioned by the chairman of the CHC and other people in the Wakefield area, I believe that the reasoned amendment tabled in the name of Labour Members should be supported.

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I apologise to you and to the House for not being in the Chamber for the opening speeches; my parliamentary duties elsewhere, including attendance at a Delegated Legislation Committee, meant that I could not be here.

I am very anxious to speak in the debate because I regard the passage of the Bill as crucial to the interests of my constituents, in bringing about the construction of a new hospital in Worcester. If the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien), whose speech was more reasonable than those of some of his colleagues, really wants a new hospital to be built in his constituency soon, as he says, he should reconsider his voting intentions, because a vote for the reasoned amendment and against Second Reading would further delay the hospital's construction. I am anxious to avoid that in my case, and the hon. Gentleman should be anxious to avoid it in his constituency.

It is a shame that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) marred a typically effective and detailed contribution by his extraordinary attack on my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. To accuse my right hon. Friend of indolence and ignorance—I believe that those were the words that the hon. Gentleman used—is like accusing the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) of being a member of new Labour, as it is just about as implausible. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman marred his contribution by such comments.

I was also sorry to hear the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) as, in his fine contribution, he said many of the things that I had been hoping to say in my speech. [Interruption.] I hear cries from the Opposition Benches that my hon. Friend was reading from a central office brief. I can let Opposition Members into a secret: I have seen that brief and I know that my hon. Friend was not reading from it; he was making his own speech—for which I pay tribute to him.

The Bill is genuinely technical. It is effectively a one-clause Bill for each hon. Member. Clause 1 is for hon. Members from England and Wales; clause 2 is for hon. Members from Scotland; and clause 3 is for hon. Members from Northern Ireland. Each hon. Member regards the Bill with his or her own constituency in mind and sees it as a one-clause Bill. It is almost a two-phrase Bill. Clause 1 states that the Secretary of State

"must exercise his statutory powers to transfer property, rights and liabilities of the body so as to secure that all of its liabilities are dealt with."

The last few words of that phrase,

"so as to secure that all of its liabilities are dealt with",

go to the heart of our consideration of the Bill; they also go to the heart of the future of the PFI in the national health service.

The notes to clauses, which were helpfully provided by the Department of Health, clearly state what the Bill is about. The notes state:

"The policy objective is to ensure that, if a NHS trust is dissolved or a health authority or special health authority abolished, its liabilities are transferred to another specified NHS body, or the Secretary of State. This is to ensure there are no residual liabilities left outstanding. The objective is to assure those who contract with such NHS bodies that liabilities will not be extinguished in the event of a NHS trust, health authority or special health authority ceasing to exist."

The next paragraph of the notes is important:

"To date all liabilities of trusts have been transferred elsewhere on dissolution, and even without this legislation it is most unlikely that the Secretary of State would not do so in future. This change, however, removes all doubt on the matter."

If I understand the Bill correctly, it simply makes it clear that the taxpayer stands, as he or she should, firmly behind all the liabilities of the national health service. To that extent, the Bill should not attract any controversy in the House this evening. What it means in practical terms is tremendously important. It provides the reassurance that is crucial to all those who trade with the NHS, from the smallest retailer—the provider of the odd bit of stationery or greengrocery—to the largest PFI contractor. There will always be someone who is prepared to honour the NHS's side of the contract.

Does it matter whether we pass the Bill? After all, the notes on clauses state that, in practice, all liabilities have so far been transferred elsewhere on dissolution and it is most unlikely that the Secretary of State will do anything different in future. But the Bill matters fundamentally to the future of the PFI, because those who stand behind the PFI contractors—those who will undertake the financing of projects—attach huge importance to the provision. Therefore, it must matter to every hon. Member who cares about the future of the NHS and who shares the vision, which I thought was common across the House, of the need to develop a more effective partnership between the public and private sectors.

What the PFI does—and will be able to do only if the Bill secures its passage—is to provide more capital than would otherwise have been available for the NHS. We can play word games about whether that money is additional to the overall levels of funding, but, ultimately, the Bill will enable an overall increase in the capital schemes in the NHS.

About 25 large-scale NHS/PFI schemes have recently been advertised in the Official Journal of the European Communities—all the schemes are worth more than £25 million. I am afraid that I have not done the arithmetic in my head, but the resulting sum of money is clearly large. I am glad to say that one of the schemes that has been advertised in the journal is for the new Worcester district general hospital.

If only half those 25 schemes were to succeed and come to fruition, that would still represent a huge increase in the capital programme of the NHS. That capital programme is significantly higher now than it was when the Government came to power. There has been a huge increase in the capital programme of the NHS, plus massive increases in current expenditure on it—there have been massive real terms increases. I think that I am right in saying that there has been an increase from about 4.7 per cent. of gross domestic product in 1979 to more than 6 per cent. now. The capital programme could be threatened if the Bill did not secure its passage.

The working of the PFI depends on the substantial transfer of risk to the private sector. What sort of risks? The obvious risks are in design and construction, and in the costs associated with the commissioning of any new facility. There are also risks involved in the costs of operating that facility; there is a risk that, during the facility's lifetime, technological obsolescence may occur. All those risks need to be transferred to the private sector as part of the PFI, but the Bill deals with one risk that need not be—and should not and could not be expected to be—transferred to the private sector. If I have understood it correctly, that risk is that the Secretary of State might rob a trust of its hospital and leave all the liabilities behind. That risk would clearly worry any reasonable-minded financier or lawyer.

The Bill is important; an article in today's edition of the Financial Times states:

"PFI hopes hinge on emergency bill".

I do not know to what extent it is an emergency Bill, but I agree with the first half of that: PFI hopes do hinge on the Bill. I shall be fair and even-handed; the article states that while some "analysts are not yet convinced of the long-term viability of PFI in the health sector, most seem to accept Mr. Dorrell's assurances on the bill. Mr. Kingsley Manning, managing director of Newchurch and Co, a consulting firm involved in several health PFI projects, said that the risk transfer in PFI was never meant to refer to trust liabilities."

The article quotes Mr. Manning as saying:

"The risks that the government is attempting to transfer through PFI are those that the private sector operators would be expected to have some control over, like volume, activity and performance . . . The new legislation just puts health in line with other government departments."

It is as simple as that: the Bill simply puts the Department of Health in line with the other Departments of State that use the PFI.

The PFI does not seek to privatise the health service. Opposition Members' attitude to the Bill and the PFI is confusing. I sometimes hear them claim that they invented the PFI and I sometimes hear them seek to undermine it—often on the same day, to different audiences. On 28 November last year, the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), said from the Dispatch Box:

"The PFI is right in principle. We have supported it, and in many ways we have been advocating it."—[Official Report, 28 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1077.]

The right hon. Gentleman should let his vote follow his voice and support the Bill this evening—it is crucial to the future of the PFI.

At a conference in London in May last year, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), the deputy leader of the Labour party, said:

"I have long been associated with arguing for public-private partnerships . . . I made the case for private sector involvement in public investment."

However, only four or five weeks later, the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) said from the Dispatch Box:

"there is growing alarm at the way . . . in which the Government openly use the private finance initiative to privatise core . . . services."—[Official Report, 3 July 1995; Vol. 263, c. 23.]

Labour Members must make up their minds—and, with respect, they should decide to support the Bill, which will genuinely enhance the future prospects of the PFI. On 18 January, the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) said:

"We do not disagree with the PFI, how could we? It was Labour who first thought of partnerships between the public and private sector".

Perhaps he should have listened to the remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) only five days earlier at a conference in Birmingham, when she said:

"I don't call it a Private Finance Initiative. I call it a privatisation initiative."

Labour Members seem to be saying two things but doing only one of them—that seems to sum up their position with regard to the Bill and the PFI.

The Bill is an essential underpinning of the PFI, which is the pragmatic way of introducing partnership into the national health service. The debate so far has focused too much on the issue of cost. Of course cost matters, but the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) seemed to believe that the issue is only about cost. It is not. The benefits include additional capital funding, which will mean more projects overall and better cost control—so there is an element of discipline related to cost. The PFI will reduce the risk for the taxpayer and make better use of existing assets, as the hon. Member for Normanton said. I am sure that some imaginative ideas will come forward as part of the PFI bidding process in the health sector, about how to use the residual assets of NHS trusts.

My constituency case involves three sites, and I believe that the involvement of the private sector will assist us to make good use of them. The private sector will bring a more constructive and entrepreneurial approach to the issue, rather than the old, staid public sector approach. The PFI will shorten construction times by introducing innovations in the way in which hospitals are built. That will bring real benefits. We have seen how, in the Prison Service, private contractors can build more quickly than builders were able to under the old public sector contracts.

There will be innovation in its fullest sense. I have hinted already at innovation in the construction process and at making better use of existing assets. There will be innovation also in service provision. Those benefits could be jeopardised if the Bill did not receive a Second Reading, because the flow of PFI finance to big projects would dry up immediately.

[Mr. Peter Luff]

Much of what I have heard in the debate leads me to believe that Labour Members have reverted to type—to old Labour—in opposing the Bill. The hon. Member for Normanton referred to "private moneylenders"—which is a particularly graphic and vengeful phrase. That old hostility has come through the debate with stark and startling clarity.

The fact that innovation will be put at risk if the Bill does not receive a Second Reading is best illustrated by what is occurring in South Worcestershire. The South Worcestershire community NHS trust has co-operated with a local fitness centre to provide a £250,000 scheme that will benefit the whole community and provide new services and revenue to the trust. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State visited the facility on Friday last week, and he was deeply impressed by what he saw. If we do not pass the Bill, that scheme—which it is hoped will be replicated throughout the trust area—will face unnecessary difficulties and uncertainty in the future.

The trust has teamed with a health and fitness company to build a new exercise and fitness studio on the hospital site. The company, One-on-One, is working in partnership with the Evesham community hospital to help meet "The Health of the Nation" fitness targets. A press release issued last year states:

"Seven-and-a-half thousand square feet of brand new exercise and fitness studios with the very latest equipment will be ready for use in the autumn . . . But it's the alliance with the hospital that makes the health-promoting difference. Hospital patients will have access to new facilities and the award-winning 'One-on-One' team—they've gained a coveted British Standards/ISO 9002 Award for Quality—will be working as part of a wider NHS team to help persuade people across the Vale"—

that is the Vale of Evesham—

"to become more physically active".

That imaginative partnership scheme is the result not just of a partnership between the public and private sectors—I do not wish to pretend that it is as simple as that. More than one public sector body is involved: the public health department, the district council and the trust have forged an alliance that will benefit my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for South Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer).

That PFI scheme will provide innovative facilities for hospital patients at no cost to the trust. Unless we pass the Bill, innovative schemes such as that—which share risks and benefits between the public and private sectors and which have proved in practice to bring enormous benefits to both parties—will be put at unnecessary risk. I shall not weary you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by listing the services that the scheme will provide.

Mr. Whittingdale: Go on.

Mr. Luff: No, I shall not as that might try your generosity, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Some of the schemes are clearly aimed primarily at the private sector aspects of the fitness centre: fitness testing, health and fitness for 50 years plus, sports injury rehabilitation and so on. However, there are some mainstream health facilities, including osteoporosis and arthritis care; respiratory, cardio pulmonary health and fitness and so on. That is the kind of innovation that can flow from the injection of private finance into the NHS, and it will be threatened if the Bill—which goes to the heart of the private finance initiative—does not secure a Second Reading.

The Bill is very important for all those who live in south Worcestershire. The people have campaigned for 30 years for a new hospital to replace the current three sites—one of which is the second oldest site in England where patients are still treated. The British Medical Association was founded on that site in Worcester many years ago. My predecessor, Lord Walker of Worcester, turned the first sod of the new hospital site in August 1993, but nothing has occurred since then. There has been a long battle to persuade the region about the business case for the hospital.

We now face the prospect of an excellent hospital with outstanding core medical facilities and a flexible number of beds. Everyone would benefit from the new facilities that the development would provide. The new Worcester hospital, for which my predecessor and I have campaigned so vigorously, must not falter because of a simple, technical issue that the House can resolve easily. That is why the Bill is important to me, to my constituents and to all those who live in south Worcestershire.

The private finance process is progressing well in Worcestershire: it is an example to other trusts round the country of how to achieve aims quickly and professionally. I am not prepared to let down the trust's hard-working managers and medical staff by allowing a problem at national level to thwart their attempts to advance the scheme quickly.

We face serious issues in creating the right commercial and organisational arrangements between the private sector and the NHS. However, the Bill clears away the main obstacle. There is an excellent team in Worcester, with a new chief executive, which is committed to making the private finance process work. It wants to pioneer a sensible deal that will combine the best of the national health service and the private sector, to bring the sorts of innovations that we have seen in Evesham in the past few months.

The trust has put out invitations to tender to three short-listed consortiums—Laser, Bovis and Bryants—and the bids are due to be received by 10 July this year. If all goes well—if there are no hiccups and the Bill secures its passage—the contracts should be signed this year.

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North-East): Notwithstanding what the article in the Financial Times said this morning, is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Secretary of State told the Treasury Select Committee that the Bill was not needed in order to complete those PFI deals?

Mr. Luff: I am at liberty to disagree with my Front Bench—that is one of the privileges that Back Benchers have. I think that the Bill is important, and that is also the view of those to whom I have spoken in the NHS. They think that their financiers will require the security afforded by the Bill, and I am very happy to take their advice. I shall listen to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but I believe that the Bill is important—and my local trust believes that also.

The contracts with the three consortia must be signed and every legal obstacle must be removed from their path. We must provide suitable health care to the people of my county into the next millennium. Years of waiting can be brought to an end. The medical and clinical staff at the hospital deserve the full support of the House this evening, to ensure that the PFI helps them to deliver the highest-quality treatment for the patients whom they serve.

I looked at the reasoned amendment before the House and I despaired. It rests its case on the suggestion that there will be some "abuse of the Private Finance Initiative to advance privatisation of the NHS".

That is not how any Conservative Member sees it. We are committed to a public national health service, largely free at the point of delivery. If I thought that the Bill were a back-door route to the privatisation of NHS hospitals, I could not support it this evening. Private finance makes little or no difference to the basis on which health care is provided, but it will improve the quality of care, the range of services that hospitals can offer and the physical condition of hospitals.

Obviously, I hope that the debate will change the minds of Liberal and Labour Members and that the Opposition will be persuaded to drop their reasoned amendment and support the Bill on Second Reading. I want the Bill and I want my hospital, and I believe that the two are closely related. For narrow partisan reasons, I am tempted to hope that the Opposition stick to their guns and vote for the amendment and against Second Reading. If they do, they will have given me a powerful weapon in my county, when I explain what they have done to frustrate the construction of our new hospital.

8.1 pm

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I was disappointed that the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff), who spoke for quite some time, did not speak before the hon. Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale). He could then have read out the Conservative central office brief and that would have stopped him using his usual tactics for prolonging the debate. They include repeating what others have said, reading out the Bill, its clauses and the notes to the clauses and then speaking at great length about his constituency.

Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman and other Conservative Members confirmed two of my worst fears about the private finance initiative. First, whatever anyone says, it is in part a substitute for Government funding. It is no longer additional funding. Secondly, it is yet another method of slowly but surely privatising the national health service.

I remain of the view that, as far as possible, the NHS should be provided and financed by Government. That is not always possible. The potatoes are not always provided. To use the same analogy as the Secretary of State, tonight's measure might turn out to be the potato Bill.

It is important that the Government provide as much as possible, otherwise, bit by bit, the national health service is gradually eroded. Every time they erode a little piece, it becomes easier to erode another piece and that leads to the slippery slope, the black-white shift of philosophy whereby what was unacceptable yesterday becomes acceptable today, not because the principle has changed, but because there has been a slow but sure philosophical shift.

Having stated my position, I realise that there are practicalities. We live in the real world, there are constraints on the public sector borrowing requirement and Governments have to take account of such influences as interest rates. Therefore, there may be a case for considering the private finance initiative, provided that it is used in the interests of the health service, the risk is shared and the investment is to the benefit of all.

The more I look at it, the more obvious it becomes that the PFI is biased against the national health service and protects the private sector. The Bill completely removes all substantial risk from the private financier and places the liability back in our hands. It makes it easy for the private sector to become involved because there is no risk. The Bill gives what is virtually a carte blanche guarantee to the private sector. Trusts will be able to borrow money from the private sector and the Government will pick up the liability. I cannot see how that will not be set against the PSBR.

I understand that parts of the private finance initiative will not be set against the public sector borrowing requirement, but given the contents of the Bill and the projects that have been mentioned, I cannot understand how the Secretary of State can accept completely free and open liability for money borrowed by trusts through the PFI without setting it against the public sector borrowing requirement. Therefore, the private sector would incur no risk.

The hon. Member for Worcester said that some risks would be incurred. Those risks have been set out before, but they are minimal. First, there is a delivery risk. Contractors would be responsible for every aspect of establishing the service on time. Any contractor who is worried about delivering on time should not be in business. Secondly, there is volume risk, whereby the contractor cannot expect a guaranteed income. That is part of business. Even potato producers do not expect a guaranteed volume and they also incur a delivery risk. Thirdly, there are obsolescence risks. There is even a potential obsolescence risk with potatoes. Finally, there are economic risks, as contractors are no longer protected by inflation indexed payments. Those risks are part of normal contractual arrangements. They are normal business risks that anyone would expect.

The Bill does not seek to protect risks that anyone in business would expect. It seeks to protect almost open-ended liabilities incurred by trusts. They are not payments out of the current account; they are capital risks that will have to be set against the public sector borrowing requirement.

The PFI has a long history. As the hon. Member for Colchester, South and Maldon, who read the Conservative central office brief, will know, it stems from the Ryrie rules that were established by the National Economic Development Council in 1981. They were designed to introduce private finance into nationalised industries, but they were very strictly drawn. They allowed public finance only if it was the cheapest option and the private sector carried the full risk. Those were two important criteria, and the Bill removes one of them. They were not viable because the private sector would not accept them on that basis, therefore they were amended over the years and eventually dropped.

[Mr. Sam Galbraith]

They were replaced by the private finance initiative that was introduced in 1992 by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont). He was quoted as saying that its purpose was "to remove the unnecessary obstacles to private sector investment in Britain's infrastructure."

He made sure that it was biased in favour of the private sector and that any risks would fall on the Government. That is what the Bill does.

The PFI comprises a number of features, including the possible involvement of leasing arrangements. As long as a project was shown to be profitable, it could go ahead without having to be compared with similar public sector activity, but there had to be a sensible transfer of risk. It was reiterated that the private sector must genuinely assume the risk. That proved to be unworkable, because the private sector would not accept the risk, so the Bill removes all risk from the private sector and places it once again with the Government and the taxpayer.

The private sector will fail to realise the potential. Conservative Members who made pleas for their constituencies and said that the PFI is the way forward have false hopes, as do the Government. The only way that they can succeed is if there is no risk to the private sector—I do not believe that the Treasury or any Government who believe in prudent finance could allow that to continue.

The PFI is more costly than the public sector. We all know that it costs the private sector more to raise finance than it does the Government, at 3 per cent. to 4 per cent. The only way in which that money can be recouped is by leasing charges or—as increasingly happens, and this is where the PFI produces problems—support services, leading eventually to medical services. In other words, that means the privatisation of the NHS, which is the Government's long-term aim.

Mr. Peter Puplett, a former economist with Tarmac, said about any charge:

"On the one hand, it could be set too low and the private sector would not find it viable to finance the project. On the other, it could prove too high and the project would become a licence to print money. The latter risk is something feared by Treasury officials and ministers alike. It is the hidden handicap of the PFI and explains why so little progress has been made."

In other words, the Government cannot win—particularly if the Bill is passed. Yes, there are short-term advantages from the PFI and yes, immediate capital outlay is avoided—but the cost over the years, because of the charges inherent in the initiative, mean that in the long term, the PFI will be much more expensive. We will spend the rest of our lives paying for that which we apparently get for nothing today.

The PFI has no ability to establish priorities as to where the money goes, and with that goes a locked-in lack of flexibility. The Minister of State, Scottish Office who is on the Treasury Bench is responsible for the health service in Scotland, so he knows that Greater Glasgow health board leased under an initiative a large central office for its administrative services. Subsequently, the board's structure changed and evolution came about, and it no longer needed that office. Nevertheless, the board is locked into a 99-year lease, at massive cost, and it cannot get rid of that liability. The contractor does not mind because it is getting the money. The liability has fallen back on us.

A company tamed Takare in Glasgow looks after the care of the elderly. That model is no longer appropriate and we want to change it, but we are locked into a 15-year agreement under a PFI. Flexibility has been lost, charges have been increased and we are heading slowly but inexorably towards privatisation.

The Secretary of State for Health has said that there will be no PFI in the clinical services. He tempered that today, saying that there will be no PFI where that is not wanted. We all remember the reassurance that hospitals would not be allowed to opt out to become trusts without clinical approval. That was all nonsense. The hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) knows that, despite the Secretary of State's remarks in this Parliament, the Scottish Office is seeking to involve private finance in not just building Stonehaven hospital and running the catering, portering and other services but in running every part of the clinical services. That is the reality in Scotland at present, and that is the PFI's hidden agenda.

The private finance initiative will not realise the hopes and dreams of Conservative Members in terms of new hospitals. It will produce long-term costs and lead slowly but inexorably towards privatisation of the NHS. For that reason, we are right to be wary of the PFI and to vote for the reasoned amendment.

Mr. David Ashby (North-West Leicestershire): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith), but his speech was typical of new Labour—full of sound and fury. The hon. Gentleman made all sorts of statements about the Bill being no good, but he gave no reasons and offered no sensible alternatives. That also is typical of the Labour party, which is always ready to oppose a measure but never seems able to offer anything constructive in its place.

Mr. Martlew: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ashby: No, I am going on for the moment. I have just started.

I am grateful to be called today because I want to show that I may be down but I am not out.

I am astounded that the Bill is being opposed because it is a simple measure to ensure only an organisation to honour the national health service side of contracts, be what may. It does not demand much more than that, in providing confidence in the public sector. The Opposition's arguments would be much better put in Committee than now, so why are they opposing the Second Reading of this simple Bill?

I am reminded of a constituent who came to my surgery three or four weeks ago, who had experienced some trouble with a double glazing company. I will not give its real name but will call it Parliamentary Double Glazing. My constituent had paid a deposit and then, horror of horrors, he discovered that the firm had gone into liquidation. He submitted a claim to the receiver, but was told, "Sorry, there's no money." Then my constituent found that Parliamentary Double Glazing remained in business, but was renamed Parliamentary Double Glazing Ltd. Mark 2. Then there will be mark 3 and mark 4. That experience gave my constituent no confidence in buying double glazing at all, let alone from Parliamentary Double Glazing. We have all heard of similar experiences in our surgeries.

What happens if trusts end and there are contracts to be fulfilled? Will there be nobody to honour those contracts and nobody to pay? Are we to have the National Health Service Parliamentary Double Glazing Ltd? Is that what we want? The Bill is highly technical and provides for the situation that I described. Why are the Opposition so keen to oppose it?

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) used a large number of quotations, starting with the Leader of the Opposition saying that the PFI is right in principle, then the great whopper from the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) that Labour had first thought of partnerships between the public and private sectors. There is no truth in that. There have been partnerships between those sectors from Conservative Governments for many a long day—but Labour likes, as always, to claim Conservative policies as its own. The Labour party loves to do that and it does it all the time, but the public will see through it.

The Labour party is like the emperor with his new clothes. But the problem is that the Labour party's background and credentials are completely different to ours. The Leader of the Opposition wears his new clothes. He came from Islington and was a member of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and a left-winger so he is wearing new clothes. What is underneath the new clothes? The same body is still underneath. That is transparent, and exactly the same applies to the Labour party and to the speech by the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith).

The hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) said that public assets would be used by private money lenders. We have also heard that the Bill would mean privatisation, but that does not square at all with the Labour party's argument that it is in favour of the PFI. It has said that it does not disagree with the PFI and has even claimed that it thought of partnerships between the public and private sectors.

There are two sides in the Labour party and that is why it opposes the Bill. There has been no change at all in the party. Behind new Labour, there is a whole army that would not, under any circumstances, want the private sector to help any public sector body, be it the health service or any other body. In the constituencies, there is a bigger army behind the wafer-thin new Labour. Underneath it all is old Labour.

I cannot help feeling—I think that many people agree—that the real truth about the Labour party is that it does not want the national health service to succeed. It wants to be able to say that the NHS failed under the Conservatives, when it has been a great success story. The Labour party wants to undermine absolutely everything that we are doing. Despite everything Opposition Members have said, they want to see the PFI fail. Tonight, the Labour party is pandering to its left wing, and that is why it is opposing the Bill.

New Labour is like my house in my constituency; it has an 1820 front, but behind the front it is 200 years old. Labour Members put up a front, but behind it the house that they live in is the house of Keir Hardie and the unions, which brought so much disaster and unhappiness to this country. Disaster was caused by the over-powerful unions, especially in the national health service. The Labour party wants to return to its old ways. It pays only lip service to the direction in which we have gone.

I am delighted to speak in this debate because I, like others who are middle aged or entering into old age, use the health service more and more. My use of the health service has been rather public, I fear, and most people have read about it in the gutter newspapers. I use the national health service although I have BUPA. The hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden knows more about the gynaecological side than the male side—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate his comments to the specific Bill before us or to the reasoned amendment.

Mr. Ashby: I hope that I have related my comments so far to the Bill.

I am proud of the NHS, because it is very good. I am proud about the direction in which the NHS has gone. I have always felt that private sector initiatives can be used by the NHS for the benefit of patients. That is the direction in which we should go, at our best and at our wisest. There is no demon in privatisation, although the Opposition would like to say that there is. What is good enough for the private sector is always good enough for the public sector and there is much to be gained from the private sector which would benefit the public sector.

The Labour party is anxious to build a wall between the public and private sectors. It pretends that they do not exist and fights any intrusion by the private sector, however good, into any of our institutions. The Labour party frightens the public about the national health service itself, but it also tries to frighten the public about private participation in the national health service.

The Bill is meant to give a morale boost to the private sector, yet it is opposed. We will not obtain private sector participation unless support is given to it. The private sector has to know that if it participates, it will not face bills that it should never have to face. The Bill would give the private sector a confidence that it should have.

It is a myth that the private finance initiative leads to delays. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health is a hard-working constituency Member in Leicestershire. I have known him for a long time and part of my constituency was in his constituency before the boundary changes in 1983. When I was selected, I consulted my right hon. Friend to find out what was happening and I asked him especially about the local national health service. We have done especially well. We have the new Glenfield hospital and various other hospitals in the centre of Leicester, but there were enormous delays in planning and financing those hospitals. It was a long time before we got the Glenfield hospital, even though I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State worked hard to try to push the new hospital through.

The situation would be very different today. The problems started in 1979 because so many hospitals were closed by the Labour party and there were long delays in building new hospitals. As soon as the Conservative Government came to power, many new hospitals were built and new initiatives took place. If the PFI had been in place, those schemes could have come on much more quickly and we would have had more hospitals which would have been more successful.

A private sector of a sort has been involved in hospital building for some time. I have a marvellous community hospital in Coalville. Before the war, the local people started to collect for their community hospital. After the war, they collected harder, and then the project died away a little. Then there was a tremendous burst of energy and a great collection took place for the community hospital in Coalville. The people were able to participate, by their charitable efforts, in the building of the hospital. Such participation by the private sector in financing a community hospital gives the people involved a sense of belonging. After all, the private sector possesses a great deal of expertise and can do a great deal to help the public sector with its building programmes.

Another charge levelled at the Government is that no new money is forthcoming. The Government also stand charged—without a shred of evidence—of having cut funding for the NHS. We all know that that is not true. Changes in the health service and in the sort of provision of which it is capable have led to greater expenditure. We should always remember that all capital expenditure has a revenue implication, however.

We must make use of the best in the private sector. This Bill fulfils all that I hope for. I look forward to the legislation supporting the private sector in this initiative, and to even greater future initiatives that will allow the health service to expand, to give of its best and to continue to be efficient. The NHS is the jewel in our crown, and I am extremely proud of it. [Interruption.] I cannot hear a word of what the hon. Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden is saying, so I shall take no notice of it.

The Conservative period in government has resulted in a vastly improved national health service. The Bill does everything possible to further that improvement.

8.32 pm

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I am glad to see the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (Mr. Ashby) in his place. It must have taken some courage for him to come to make a speech today, although I suspect it was not his best ever. When Conservatives read it in years to come, they may realise that they were wrong about the PFI. I am compelled to speak this evening because of the constituency problems created for my electors by the PFI and by measures such as this Bill.

There is no doubt that the Bill is about removing the risk from private companies, thereby allowing them to own our hospitals with no fear of being out of pocket. The original Treasury rules required schemes funded under the PFI to involve a genuine transfer of risk to the private sector so as to justify the rate of return that might be generated. The Bill gets rid of that risk, leaving just a higher rate of return.

The Bill has become necessary because the private finance initiative has fallen at the first hurdle. The banks have decided that they are not prepared to take the risk, while the Minister has decided that he cannot afford the political embarrassment of letting the PFI fall by the wayside.

The failure of the PFI is graphically illustrated in Carlisle. It is just one in a long list of broken Government promises about the development of our district general hospital, Cumberland infirmary. The redevelopment of that infirmary began in 1968 under a Labour Government, and the first phase was completed in 1974 under another Labour Government. Next, there were various false starts, but approval was finally given for phase 2 in 1988, under the old capital allocation rules. The scheme was worked up and a start date was sought, but in September 1992 the Carlisle hospitals, under pressure from the Government, decided to become a trust. When they looked at the figures, however, they decided that the trust would not be viable if it went ahead with the building scheme—so Government dogma got in the way and the scheme was abandoned.

The decision to abort the scheme was taken in the very week the tender was due to go out, so there was great anger in my constituency. The new trust promised to set about developing another scheme, and came up with one which, the trust claimed, would provide fewer beds but would achieve the same objective and bring in savings of nearly £2 million a year if the buildings went up on the same site. Much time and public money were expended; in fact, the chief executive has quoted a figure of £400,000 spent on fees to get the new scheme in place.

The trust's scheme was finalised in the summer of 1994. There followed another body blow: the Government stepped in and said that the scheme should be put through the PFI. The trust argued that it should go ahead under the old scheme, because that was ready. Alternatively, it should be fast-tracked. The Government, however, maintained that the PFI would not delay the scheme long—that it would take five or six months to get it through the system.

It took six months just to place the advertisement in the Official Journal of the European Communities, a necessary part of the legal preparations. So six months were lost to bureaucracy.

Next, hundreds of companies applied. They were sifted down to 16, and a great deal of work went into producing a short-list of three by 9 May 1995. This was heralded as a great victory for the PFI. On 5 September, a short press release was issued by the Carlisle Hospitals NHS trust, saying that two of the companies had pulled out. That left a short-list of one; logic dictates that there is not much competition in such circumstances. The PF initiative should have been aborted, and the public money that the Government had once promised should have been provided to build the hospital.

The Government insisted that the disciplines of the market place meant that a short-list of one was acceptable. I understand that one of the subsidiaries of the shortlisted company is being investigated by the Ministry of Defence and the police for fraud. I refer to AMEC. Fears are growing that, because AMEC is the only bidder, costs will escalate and the millions of pounds that were to be saved by putting the facilities on one site will not materialise. There could even be extra costs. I want to know from the Minister whether, if extra costs are involved, the Government will meet them—or will they have to come out of patient care? That would be wholly unacceptable.

I understand that, although there has been no official announcement, AMEC wants to run the portering, the catering, security, car parking and laundry services. It is also keenly interested—I bet it is—in running the medical records department. But the consultants in the hospital are opposed to that. There is a great deal of disquiet about the PFI among them, and they find themselves in a dilemma. They need the new hospital. They need the new facilities, but they do not want private sector involvement. One consultant said that it does not matter how good the surgeons are; if the laundry does not work and there are no sheets, one cannot do any operations. Another surgeon said:

"You can't expect a private company who has so much at stake in the hospital not to try to put profit before patient care".

Consultants are in that dilemma. To some extent, many of us who have been promised new hospitals are in a dilemma: we do not want PFI, but we do not want our hospital projects delayed.

During a recent takeover bid for AMEC by Kvaerner, a Norwegian company, I met, on 11 December last year, the managing directors of both companies. I was able to get a commitment from AMEC that if it did get the scheme and took over some of the services, it would recognise a trade union. I had great difficulty explaining PFI to the Norwegian managing director of Kvaerner. He said, "We have done some privatisation in Norway, but we haven't stooped to selling off the hospitals yet." As it happened, AMEC beat off Kvaerner, which, I understand, is trying to take over Trafalgar House, but that is a different story.

The plans under consideration are creating great concern, because one of the options is to reduce the number of beds in Carlisle to less than what many of us think is necessary to provide adequate cover, especially in times of emergency, of epidemics. In the winter, there are many cases of flu and of people going into hospital. This year, there are 556 beds in Carlisle at our three sites, but the demand was such that we had to open up another ward. I understand that the bed numbers for the single-site hospital—there will be no more beds—will be 100 fewer than that total. Although I appreciate the growth of day surgery—I recently benefited from day surgery, and I suspect that, with a hernia, I would not have been able to stand for as long—we are greatly afraid. We are worried that we will get the worst of both worlds—that we will get the finance for the new hospital but that it will be decided that we cannot close the old city general, which will mean that there will be two sites, and that one hospital will be the workshop. That would be most unsatisfactory and most uneconomic from all points of view.

One forgets that when we are talking about delays in hospital provision we are talking about patient care, and, sometimes, unnecessary deaths; unfortunately, that is what happens in Carlisle. I do not believe in shroud waving, as it has no effect in this place, but the reality is that we have a problem in Carlisle with our maternity service, which is on the other side of the city from where the paediatricians are based. A report investigated the high number of perinatal mortalities in east Cumbria. On a regional basis, between 1988 and 1992, we should have had 55 deaths; we had 75.

In the northern region, my area is not one of particular deprivation, so the number of deaths should have been below the regional average, but that did not happen. One of the reasons given for that is that the paediatricians could not get across the city in time to treat sick babies. It was estimated, not by me but by the director in charge of community services in east Cumbria, that every year there are one or two unnecessary deaths of babies in Carlisle because of that. It has not been mentioned often enough today, but the delay in the provision of facilities costs lives, and PFI in my constituency has delayed our scheme by at least two years.

I have been involved in the health service in Cumbria for many years. For a short time, until we had a Conservative Government in 1979, I was chairman of the health authority. We have been fighting for better provision. I have said all along that I will not believe that we will get a new hospital until I see them lay the first bricks. In my case and, I suspect, in many others in the rest of the country, PFI will delay. It will be a sham. It will raise people's expectations, and at the end of the day the money will not be there. The bankers will not be able to finance it and the Government will not be able to afford the long-term costs. That is why I shall be voting for the reasoned amendment.

8.45 pm

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew), who speaks with real experience, having been chairman of his local health authority in previous years. I understand the frustrations that he voiced about the future of the hospital in his constituency. At times, I have done the same in the House for my constituency of Dartford. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) made a speech earlier—I was not able to hear it—and gave an account of the progress that we intend to make, and will make, in the provision of a new district general hospital in Dartford in the early part of next year.

Unlike the hon. Member for Carlisle, I prefer to look down the telescope the other way round. Whereas he looks from the big end down to the small, I look from the small end down to the big. A pessimist says that the bottle is half empty. An optimist says that the bottle is half full. Although we might have cause to unite, in the context of the Bill, on some manifestations of health service provision in the past few years, we must differ, in that the hon. Gentleman came to bury his health trust, whereas I come here to praise mine.

In the context of PFI, my hon. Friend the Minister will remember an Adjournment debate of 11 January this year, which I inspired, applied for and successfully obtained, on hospital provision in north-west Kent. My hon. Friend was able to tell the House on that occasion that my local health trust treated about 164,000 patients in 1994-95 and that it is expected that it will treat a further 10 per cent. in the present year. In addition, it achieved an impressive 5-star ranking in 1994-95 in the context of NHS performance tables.

As to where we see the PFI going, I can give an account of the delays, tribulations and frustrations in Dartford and Gravesham over the years, but I see the PFI as a real way forward—not a delaying or blocking mechanism or an impediment to provision but, rather, opening up and clearing the way. The window of opportunity, which we hear so often as a cliché, is real in the sense that my constituents can now look forward—if the process continues at the speed, and with the rigour and robustness we have seen hitherto—to the new district hospital being started in the early part of 1997.

[Mr. Bob Dunn]

The hon. Member for Carlisle gave an historical and chronological account of events in Carlisle. I shall do the same for Dartford, but not at great length. In June 1995, my local trust was granted approval to test the scheme, to provide a new general hospital under the PFI process. It advertised the scheme quite quickly in the Official Journal of the European Communities. On 5 September, following a pre-qualification exercise, four consortia, representing some big household names, were selected, and, of course, the process goes on. An important element in the short Adjournment debate on 11 January was that my hon. Friend the Minister was able to say:

"The overall process is as short and efficient as it can be, consistent with ensuring that value for money and the requirements of public accountability are achieved. If all goes to plan, building work should begin during the first half of 1997—that is the present supposition."

My hon. Friend the Minister went on:

"I can assure my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford that the project has the full support of all concerned—at authority level, regional level, NHS executive level and Government level. I can assure him also that the evaluation will be carried out as speedily as possible in Whitehall, so there will be no delays at our end."—[Official Report, 11 January 1996; Vol. 269, c. 388-89.]

This important legislation rounds off the process for those from the private sector who wish to enter into partnership with the health trust in the construction of hospital facilities and the provision of care services so essential in modern society. It will show them that there is a guarantee, support, an attitude of mind within Government, so that when and if existing health boards and trusts are wound up, there will be a commitment to fund the liabilities from the NHS side. This is important in the concept of partnership.

We have heard something tonight, and we will need to hear a little more, about where the Opposition stand in their support for the PFI. The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) tried but failed. She told the House that the Labour party supported the PFI but then proceeded to give reasons why she did not.

We have on public record the statement made by the Leader of the official Opposition on 4 October 1994 in a speech to his party conference. He said:

"We would get public and private finance working together in transport, in housing, in capital projects, in health and education."

A little later, the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), a former deputy leader of the Labour party, disagreed and said:

"Market testing represents creeping privatisation. As does the Private Finance Initiative."

The present deputy leader of the Labour party, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), speaking at a London conference on 31 May 1995, said:

"I have long been associated with arguing for public-private partnerships".

That is true. As shadow transport spokesman, he made that point during many debates. At that speech in London, he went on to say:

"I made the case for private sector involvement in public investment."

Exactly so. The Opposition must decide what they stand for and give tonight an outright declaration of their support for the PFI as we have determined it in the context of the NHS.

The great benefit to the NHS of the PFI is that such private capital is additional to that which can be obtained from public funding sources. That is the most important point to be made in the debate. In the context of the PFI, we are talking about additional funds, not limiting but enhancing and improving public funding of the NHS.

I welcome the Bill. It is short compared with many that I have seen in my time. It is necessary. It gives undertakings, commitment and loyalty. I hope that Opposition Members will seriously think about how they vote tonight, and not make it a left-right, Opposition-Government matter, but join Conservative Members in the Lobby tonight. I give up on the hon. Member for Peckham, because she is wholly without commitment in everything that she says and does, but there are other Opposition Members who are much clearer in their philosophy and I invite them to join us in the Lobby this evening.

8.53 pm

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North-East): I begin by apologising to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the House for not being present at the beginning of the debate, but I was serving on Committees elsewhere in the House.

I support the Opposition amendment which sets out in crystal clear terms the problems with the Bill. The problem with the private finance initiative in the major hospital projects on which Conservative Members have concentrated today is that it does not really bring in any significant new money to those projects, but rather postpones payment of the bills.

In the case of a new toll bridge, for example, where a new source of revenue is created in the form of tolls, the PFI releases new capital from the private sector, which is additional and which can be used for constructing the bridge. But in the end, a hospital is all paid for out of taxation, and the rate of interest on the capital involved, because it comes from the private sector, is greater than it would be for a publicly financed project. Therefore, it is right for my hon. Friends to raise their concerns in the amendment about the use of the PFI in the health service.

That apart, if the only effect of the Bill was to reassure providers of private finance contributing to PFI projects there would be much less objection to it. In reality, however, it is a much wider Bill which appears to give a blank cheque to NHS trusts. It gives them unlimited security for borrowing, which they have never had before. NHS trusts have not been able to take out mortgages in the past, so they have done little borrowing. Under the Bill, the whole of the public sector would stand behind their borrowing but there is no mechanism in it to control the exercise of the immense new powers that it conveys upon them. That is the problem to which the amendment draws attention. As the amendment says, the Bill "gives an open-ended commitment on the part of the taxpayer to honour the liabilities of NHS Trusts irrespective of the manner in which they have accrued".

I have not yet heard any Conservative Member address that point.

NHS trusts cannot be dissolved through insolvency, only by order of the Secretary of State, and the Bill sets out what will then happen. In the few minutes that I have, I want to suggest some of the circumstances in which a trust might run into financial problems of a kind which could lead to the powers in the Bill being invoked, other than the circumstances for which we have been told that the Bill is intended—where a trust is dissolved for a non-financial reason and PFI liabilities are outstanding. But there are many other circumstances in which the powers in the Bill might be invoked. I shall illustrate that by describing the immense financial pressures being faced by health providers in my area of east London as the new financial year approaches. I want to concentrate on the possibility of trusts accruing liabilities in a manner other than through the PFI, as the reasoned amendment points out.

The work load borne by the health service in Newham is immense because the demand is immense. The Government's own figures show that Newham has the highest level of urban deprivation in the country with Tower Hamlets and Hackney, the other two areas covered by the East London and the City health authority, only just behind. I take no pleasure in saying it, but it is a fact that in east London there is an immense concentration of urban deprivation which is reflected in the area's health statistics. Whichever statistics one chooses, they all tell the same story: the health service in east London faces an immense task.

In 1988-92, the standardised mortality ratio in Newham was 109 compared with 100 in Britain. In 1992, it was 113. From 1988-92, the number of stillbirths and deaths in the first week of life per 1,000 total births was 9.8 in Newham compared with 8.2 in England and Wales. The percentage of total residents aged 16 and over who were prevented from working by permanent sickness was 3.9 per cent. in England and Wales but 4.9 per cent. in Newham. The percentage of limiting, long-standing illness among children aged up to four years was 2.7 per cent. in Newham compared with just 1.9 per cent. in England and Wales. Births per 1,000 women aged 15 to 44—this statistic is good news, but it creates considerable work for the health service—were 87.3 in Newham compared with 63.6 in England and Wales.

Alongside that picture of the health service's considerable work load, the resources available to the service in east London are plainly inadequate. According to the Government's 1993 figures, about three quarters of general practitioner premises in Newham are in poor condition. Since then, nothing has substantially—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This debate is about NHS trusts. It is certainly not about GPs' premises. It is not in order to relate detailed statistics on Newham, important though they are. They need to be related to the Bill or to the reasoned amendment.

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The possibility of a private finance initiative to raise the standard of GP premises has been considered by one of the trusts in the region, but I take your point. The community health service trust has considered that possibility, but I will endeavour to relate my remarks more closely to the Bill.

As the reasoned amendment sets out, trusts may accrue liabilities in other ways and not simply through the PFI. That is the anxiety to which I want to draw attention. I talked about GPs' premises. The number of dentists and health visitors employed by the community health service trust is small relative to the population.

That is the position today. What worries me is the stress and the despair that I see among some of the people working in those conditions for the health service trusts. This is where I come to the circumstances in which the Bill will apply. The East London and the City health authority faces a large deficit next year just to keep the existing service level going. Estimates of that deficit vary between £7 million and £20 million for the coming financial year. Whatever the figure is, it is certainly a large sum and no one to whom I have spoken in the trusts has the faintest idea how that gap can be bridged. The mood is dark in the trusts that will be on the receiving of the cuts required to bridge that deficit. I would not rule out the possibility of a trust not being able to meet its financial liabilities and running into the situation in which the Bill will apply.

The position is much worse even than that. This is where people start to become angry. The new capitation formula for district health authorities will remove another large sum—in excess of £11 million—from the East London and the City health authority budget. That will be done under the new formula based on work conducted by York university, but significantly changed from what it recommended. It has not yet been implemented, but I understand that it has been confirmed as a direction in which the Government intend to move.

York university was charged with providing a resource allocations formula that reflected need. It did so, but the Department of Health changed it for reasons that have still not been explained, so that the formula no longer reflects need. In the document entitled "The Resource Allocation Consequences of the New NHS Needs Formula", published in May 1995, York university states:

> "In implementing the work, the Department of Health had to make a judgment about which needs index to use for distributing funds not relating to inpatient use. In the event, they have chosen to allocate 64 per cent. of the total budget according to the acute index, 12 per cent. according to the psychiatric index, and 24 per cent. according to no needs index. The report notes that the use of no needs weighting for such a large block of services, which includes community and mental handicap services, can be challenged. It illustrates the importance of the issue by comparing the Department's preferred formula with an alternative, in which the 24 per cent. is allocated using the York acute index. It is found that this option would redirect amounts of up to 5 per cent. away from the home counties towards the inner cities."

I am extremely concerned about the fact that that element is not there. Its absence cause serious financial problems for the trusts in east London.

I have corresponded with the Minister about that subject, but, given the problems that are being created, I am still at a loss to understand why the Government are pursuing the use of that formula. I have repeatedly attempted to find out why a formula is being introduced that so dramatically shifts resources away from the trusts, where they are most needed, but I still have not obtained anything like a satisfactory explanation.

The resource allocation formula is wrong. It has the opposite effect to that advertised as the Government's intention. The only explanation for its adoption that I have found is one of partisan advantage, which is disgraceful. The formula needs to be changed radically in line with York university's original proposals, so that it has the effect that the Government claimed to want.

Given the way in which things are going now, it is entirely possible that a trust, or trusts, will find it extremely difficult to meet financial obligations in east London, Manchester, Sunderland and other areas that are particularly badly affected by the formula, and the powers in the Bill will then need to be invoked. If there is no change in the direction in which health service funding is going, we shall very soon find ourselves in the position described in the Bill. That will be to the immense disadvantage not just of people in east London and the other areas most affected, but of the Government.

9.5 pm

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Leeds, South): I can hardly be accused of hostility to the idea of public-private partnership. Let me declare an interest that, for the other purposes of the debate, need not be mentioned: I am chairman of Yorkshire Fund Managers, a joint venture company owned by Yorkshire Enterprise in the public sector and York Trust in the private sector. I have chaired the company for the past six years. The money from the public sector that goes into investments through Yorkshire Fund Managers is far more than matched by money from the private sector. My point is that I am very used to dealing with public-private partnership. As a Leeds Member, let me add that the Leeds initiative has gained a good reputation through its work with the private sector. Partnerships of this kind often make it possible for many things to be done that could not be done in the public sector alone.

The Secretary of State said that people had asked about the fact that those holding his office could still decide at the last minute whether to meet health bodies' liabilities. Why has that question just come to the fore? Why was it not asked of the last Secretary of State, or of the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke)? I think that it has arisen now for two reasons. First, there has been a considerable increase in the number of potential PFIs in the health service. That has always been a possibility, but, as the Secretary of State made clear at Question Time today, he has been signing go-ahead agreements more and more frequently. As the right hon. Gentleman accepted, however, those agreements did not have the signature that would enable the contracts to be let and things to move ahead. Before that could happen, an assurance had to be given to the providers of the money. Haste was therefore necessary. Nevertheless, I do not think that those signatures can be forthcoming until there is a clear understanding of the safeguards that exist on either side.

Secondly, there is the concentration on health finances. Many health service trusts are in the sort of difficulty referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms): they do not know how their ends will be met, and they find that they do not receive a very sympathetic hearing from the Secretary of State.

It would be apposite to illustrate that point from what is happening to health in Leeds. One of the three agreements that have been given the go-ahead by the Secretary of State since the Budget involves St. James's hospital in Leeds. The St. James's and Seacroft University Hospitals NHS Trust is currently in deficit. The Government's attitude to that deficit is not especially sympathetic. My questions arise naturally from that. The Minister may say that there is much difference between capital and revenue but the same considerations arise when the Government's decisions on finance seem to increase, rather than decrease, deficits.

With all the other Leeds Members, I was invited to meet Leeds community health council to discuss that issue last Friday. The hon. Member for Leeds, North-West (Dr. Hampson) attended, with three Labour Members. According to the CHC, the St. James's trust faces a £6 million deficit this year. Not only that, but United Leeds Teaching Hospitals NHS Trust, which covers Leeds general infirmary, faces a £6 million deficit this year. The health authority has a £2 million deficit. Leeds is £14 million in deficit, according to the CHC.

Naturally, after such a meeting, one tries to check the figures. I found that the health authority was talking about a large deficit. It expected a deficit at Jimmy's of more than £1 million and a larger figure of £7 million at the Leeds general infirmary. The total figure was not so different from that of the CHC. It went further in talking about the deficits expected next year. Knowing the sums allocated by the Government for health in Leeds for the next year, it expected a deficit of nearly £5 million for St. James's and about £10 million for the LGI. Those are serious deficits.

Everything comes back to the way in which the Government have allocated health resources. Their use of the formula, as was demonstrated by the York economists, has acted against cities. That decision has resulted in a massive transfer of funds from cities where there is real and pressing need to areas where the need is not so demonstrably large, though I believe that health service funds are needed everywhere.

The hospital trusts and the health service in Leeds are penalised by the way in which the Government have allocated funds. In response to that, the Conservative party and Ministers have not recognised that, for Leeds as a whole, an estimated £18 million shortfall has been caused by that decision. Instead, they say that Leeds is overspending by £3.1 million. There is a difference of some £21 million between the Government's thinking and that of people who work in the health service in Leeds about the funding that the city needs. Under those circumstances, it is not surprising that people would wish us to hesitate before underwriting the money that is to be allocated for such projects.

I am told that it is hoped that the St. James's project contract will be signed in April. In those circumstances, it would be the first scheme to go ahead. I recognise that some of the facilities will benefit some of my constituents, so I hope that the scheme goes ahead. I accept that it will benefit the public of Leeds as a whole, so I wish it well. One improvement that will help my constituents is that 166 of the 246 extra beds will be available in the public sector.

Let us consider some of the conditions that my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) says should apply to public-private partnerships. First, the health service must be run by the NHS; secondly, private finance must be in partnership with public finance; thirdly, the public sector must set the priorities in the public interest.

The St. James's scheme meets some of those conditions, but a number of important questions remain. What happened to the original scheme for the development at St. James's? I was a member of the Leeds health authority before coming to the House; I was also a member of the local council. The health authority asked me to approach the local authority because the city council owned a great deal of land around the St. James's site. I played a minor part in the negotiations that eventually led to the transfer of 13.5 acres of land to the hospital trust.

The PFI uses that very land. The press release that accompanied the announcement about the transfer made it clear that the local authority played a key role throughout. It was right that the local authority should make that land available. However, I remember that when I was first asked to approach the city council the primary uses for the land were intended to be for a car park and a nurses' home. The car park project still exists, but can the Minister tell me what happened to the nurses' home?

I want the Minister to give me an assurance about the development. When the general public go to St. James's, the worst aspect for them is that it is almost impossible to park. It is sometimes an advantage to be a Member of Parliament as it enables me to park at St. James's hospital. That gives me an advantage when I want to nip in and see my constituents. The public complain bitterly about the car parking problem.

I want to be sure that if the private sector is involved in providing the car park, the parking charges will not be such that my constituents will not be able to afford to park when they visit their relatives. I am, of course, referring to those of my constituents who can manage to get to the hospital by private transport; large numbers of them cannot do so. We do not expect the parking to be free, but the charge should not be greater than they would pay in a small city council car park outside the hospital.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am having enormous difficulty relating car parking charges to the Bill, but perhaps it will all become clear in a moment.

Mr. Gunnell: It is clear, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because the scheme will, rightly, go ahead—yet there are still questions to ask about the financing of it.

I shall rapidly move away from that subject and raise one or two other issues. I would like to be sure that safeguards are in place. I believe that the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) got it wrong. He said that this is a Bill in which the risk is borne by the private sector, not by the public sector. It is obvious from what the Secretary of State for Health said that the public sector carries the risk. What will happen if something goes wrong with the private sector partners who are involved in this project? If the private sector partners go bust, will the Secretary of State bail them out as well?

If there is a hospital and part of it is private and part of it is public, what conditions will apply to the staff? Morale is already at a low ebb among staff in the health service, and I would not like to think that there would be two sets of staff with different sets of conditions of service—so that some are seen to have a more privileged position.

I am disappointed that some facilities will not be available to most of my constituents. If the private sector is involved in the scheme, it will want to get something out of it. We have to be careful to keep that well under control, to ensure that any scheme that goes ahead has a strong net benefit to the public sector and to ensure that it is genuinely carried out at a lower cost than the public sector would be paying if it were getting that same benefit by going it alone.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Today's debate has exposed the shambles that the Government have made of their attempts to privatise parts of the national health service. Successive Secretaries of State have promised us newer, bigger and better hospitals; they have promised us faster and more efficient services; and they have assured us that the Conservatives have a gleaming vision for an invigorated, market-managed, private sector-controlled national health service. However, the words of the Tories—and of the Secretary of State today—have been shown for what they are: hollow, empty promises. An endless stream of broken promises has brought the Secretary of State to the House today with this Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) detailed those broken promises: Norwich, Carlisle, Swindon, Durham and others have been waiting years for new hospital buildings. They have been promised by the Government but have been continually delayed. The Secretary of State for Health spoke at the Royal College of Physicians on Tuesday 21 November 1995, and I shall quote from part of his speech:

"Every part of the country has its own story of a new facility that has been promised and planned and then delayed, mangled and often cancelled. Too many NHS hospitals bear the scars of this haphazard process".

Perhaps the Secretary of State would like to reflect on his words at that conference—they describe exactly the shambles that he has created with the private finance initiative in the health service. When he used those words, he claimed that he was painting a picture of public sector capital planning, but he must see that they apply fully to the situation that he has brought before the House today.

The Secretary of State for Health and the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) quoted what I said at a conference of the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry earlier this year. I shall give hon. Members the benefit of the doubt because it is quite clear that the Central Office brief used only a small part of my speech in relation to what I said about PFI. I should like to put what I said at the conference in context. I said:

"We do not disagree with PFI—how could we? It was Labour who first thought of partnerships between the public and private sector. We argued that it would enhance investment because of the long-term inability of governments to maintain capital investment".

I then said—this is the section that was missed out in the Smith square brief:

"But what the Conservatives are attempting is to replace capital investment with PFI. The Budget produced a 17 per cent. cut in the NHS capital programme. The Secretary of State believes that private finance will fill this gap. But, to do so, there needs to be—in one year—a massive 242 per cent. increase in private money poured into the NHS. Given the history of PFI in the Health Service, can we really expect that to happen?"

The answer to that question is no, we cannot expect that to happen. That is what is behind it. The Government have forgotten that the private sector is not as unconnected from reality as they are. The private sector has realised what the Department has failed to acknowledge since the very first day that it set the internal market in train: that the so-called NHS reforms, and specifically the internal market, are incoherent, ill thought out, ineffectively planned and incompetently implemented.

Today, the Secretary of State has placed before the House a Bill to revise those reforms, rewrite the past and reinterpret his role. That has been the most striking feature of the Secretary of State's tenure at the Department. He has attempted to retell the story of the Conservative Government's fragmentation of our national health service, with himself as its saviour, although he fails to mention that he is trying to save the NHS from the Tory Government of whom he is a member.

The Bill is not about trying to make this discredited Government look good on health by claiming to care; it is about patching up another hole in the NHS framework that the Government have created. Because there is no guarantee within the national health service framework that it will be paid, the private sector will not bail out the Government in their failed PFI policy so, in a classic piece of double-think, the Government are bailing themselves out by guaranteeing the payments that it needs to survive. It is like someone jumping out of a crashing aeroplane to keep the plane aloft and save themselves from death.

At least the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff) had the courage to say what the Bill was about; the Secretary of State avoided doing so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Peckham rightly said that the Bill had not been thought out. The fundamental purpose is not, as the Secretary of State claimed, a minor revision of already followed practices. It is not a Bill to clear up an anomaly in law. Patching up another hole in the NHS framework means undermining many principles that the Government claim to be sacred. The Bill would fundamentally alter the basis on which the Department and the public purse take on liabilities. It would expose the public sector to as much as £5 billion of liabilities, which the Secretary of State would have no way of controlling.

The House has been asked to pass a Bill giving the private sector the right to charge the national health service as much as £5 billion for its services, safe in the knowledge that it could bankrupt NHS trusts and still get its money back.

Mr. Horam indicated dissent.

Mr. Barron: I am willing to give way on that point, because the Secretary of State said earlier that trusts can borrow without his consent. It is my contention that that is at the back of this.

The Secretary of State is asking the House to underwrite £5 billion of private sector contracts without any Minister having a say in what the contracts are for or what they contain. The Bill spends public money without public accountability. No Minister would have a right to control the mounting liabilities that the Bill might create. Ministers get no say in writing the contracts; they write the cheques only if those contracts go wrong.

That is not what the private finance initiative in the national health service was designed for. That is not what Ministers told the House and the country that the PFI would do. When the national health service executive wrote last year to pass on the ministerial diktats on PFI, it did not say to the trusts, "Spend as much money as you like; enter any crazy contract you wish; the Government do not need to know. We shall just bail you out if you make that decision." Instead, on 20 March 1995, the NHS executive said:

"A fundamental principle of the PFI is transfer of risk to the private sector."

This Bill does exactly the opposite. It makes contracting in the NHS under the PFI totally gilt-edged and absolutely risk free.

The NHS guideline notes on the PFI were specific. They detailed, in a headline style, 20 ways in which to transfer risks. The notes said:

"In many cases, the private sector should be able cost-effectively to assume the entire responsibility for the first ten risks, while taking a substantial share of the rest."

Some of the risks identified were:

"construction cost overruns; losses caused by late completion; costs of correcting defects; maintenance and repair costs; failed income generation schemes; failure to meet targets; losses through inefficiency and competition; higher than expected running costs; losses from unexpectedly low resale values."

The list goes on. If this Bill is passed, that list of possible risks will be transferred not to the private sector but to the Secretary of State.

How does the Minister who will make the winding up speech hope to reconcile the Bill's purpose with the Secretary of State's comments to the Royal College of Physicians in November last year, when he said:

"We seek a risk-bearing partnership with the private sector which allows a proper return to the successful partner, but expects the unsuccessful partner to carry his proper share of responsibility."

Where is the responsibility if we say that the British taxpayer, without taking a part in the decision, can write off any liabilities that are entered into? There is none.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) said that there is no risk, and he is absolutely right. In Carlisle, a hospital that was promised years ago has been slowed down by the PFI, and any risk that was to be taken by the private sector will now be written off. I must commend his speech. I also looked at the soccer results before I came back into the Chamber, and Rotherham United have beaten Carlisle 2-0 tonight. We will be going to Wembley on 14 April. Their team made it last year, so we are sharing in the success.

This Bill ends risk-bearing by private contractors. Their bills are guaranteed to be paid, no matter how badly they have designed, built, financed or operated the contracted duties. Trusts could be falling over people offering to contract with them. Conceivably, a contract could be presented to build a new facility for free, a few cost overruns could be dropped in and then the contract could be laid on the Secretary of State, who would pick up the tab.

Mr. Dorrell: That is not true.

Mr. Barron: That is true; the right hon. Gentleman did not explain any of that when he opened the debate. This Bill is nothing more than a charter for cowboys, who could use it to milk the British taxpayer through the NHS.

The Bill is a cynical measure. It has been designed so that, in the run-up to the general election, the Secretary of State and, perhaps, the Prime Minister can be seen walking around building sites, promising new hospitals for all. In this debate we have heard about the six years that people in Norwich have had to wait, and they still do not know if there is an agreement. Ministers know full well, as does the House, that they will be exposing us—

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Barron: The hon. Gentleman has just dropped down out of the Gallery.

Ministers will be exposing us to a possible £5 billion worth of debt, over which the Secretary of State will have no control at all.

Mr. Thompson: I am conscious of the fact that I have not been present through all the debate, but references to Norwich should be accurate. The long delays in the Norwich hospital have been due to changes of mind on the siting of the hospital and have nothing to do with the PFI. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will persuade members of the Labour party to stop campaigning for alternative sites, because that will cause further delay. He should concentrate on matters that he knows something about.

Mr. Barron: I am pleased that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, because he is using the same logic as that used by the hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff), who argued that the Worcester hospital has been delayed for the past two years because of our amendment.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) should have been here earlier to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham read out a press release that was produced by the Department of Health in 1990. The then Secretary of State read out the press release and spoke of the great things that were to happen involving the new hospital in Norwich. It is a pity that the hon. Gentleman was not here to hear that.

Many people are concerned that the PFI is nothing more than a ramp for privatisation, and those concerns are heightened by the overarching secrecy that surrounds the PFI. The Secretary of State smiles, but many clinicians inside the NHS fear that the decisions that they take now will not be taken if other people, who put the concrete in the hospitals, also run and manage the services. The Secretary of State knows that that is the case because it is well documented. That is why the right hon. Gentleman says that the Government will never do anything unless clinicians say that it is all right to do so. He knows that he ignored those same clinicians when they wrote to him to say that he should not reorganise the National Blood Authority.

The Bill commits the House to supporting debt resulting from contractual obligations about which we can discover nothing. Secrecy and mystery surround every turn of the PFI process. When I recently received some information from one hospital trust about the PFI, the paper came in marked "confidential" and its recipients were sworn to secrecy about its contents. The document contained nothing more exciting than a budget for running the PFI process. That budget is commonly acknowledged to be in the region of £1 million a time.

The greatest secrecy surrounding PFI is that nobody knows where the boundaries are. At last month's health questions I asked the Secretary of State to tell the House which services were clinical services—and therefore need not go out to PFI—and which were clinical support services. He said that the clinical and clinical support services were "both well-known terms of art within the health service. The scope of those terms is well defined."—[Official Report, 13 February 1996; Vol. 271, c. 794.]

He should remember that occasion as I wrote to him two days later and asked him to define the terms. I thought that the House would appreciate a list stating which services were clinical and which were not. In view of what he had said, I thought that my request was reasonable, but one month has passed and my postbag remains singularly empty of correspondence on that matter from the Secretary of State. Perhaps he will answer the letter and tell me exactly what he means when he talks about PFI in the health service.

Is it true that nothing is outside the scope of the PFI and literally everything is up for grabs? If so, I believe that the House will take a dim view of the privatisation of clinical services with a cast-iron guarantee of return from the Government. Clinicians are already worried that their service will be privatised and the Bill will not ease their concerns.

Contractors are worried that they will not get paid if the Secretary of State does not change more NHS regulations. The Bill is designed to make them feel better. Contractors and private sector consortiums fear that they are being asked to sign agreements with weak and insubstantial NHS trusts.

The Government's health service reforms have created organisations that the Secretary of State can dissolve almost at will; they lack accountability to their communities and to Parliament. The reforms have created trusts that operate without effective forms of control; they are able to borrow without the statutory approval of the Secretary of State. The private sector fears that the agreements entered into with the trusts will not be safe. Banks fear losses and the insecurity caused by the continual upheaval in the NHS brought about by the internal market.

There are also Government fears: Ministers fear that their reforms have created a monster that they cannot control. They fear that they have built a system that stands permanently on the point of collapse, which is exactly what they have done. The Government fear the electoral annihilation that awaits them and Ministers fear voters far more than any concerns about the massive increase in public borrowing that the Bill could bring about.

The Labour party cares about the public purse and public borrowing, which is why we shall vote for our reasoned amendment. As my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham said earlier, we cannot support the Second Reading of the Bill because it commits the taxpayer to signing a blank cheque for as much as £5 billion over which the Secretary of State has no control. It is a badly thought-out Bill that is being rushed through the House by a scared Government who are unable to cope with the chaos that they have created in the national health service.

It is inconceivable that the so-called anomaly has only now come to the Department's attention. Newchurch and Co.—the official guardians of the PFI in the health service—recognised in autumn 1994 the problems created by the Government's haphazard and incoherent trust system. It questioned the implications of the dissolution of a trust and said:

"The rights of contractors in the event of default by an NHS trust is an issue of concern to many."

It is quite clear that the Government have resisted changing the law at least since 1994. One might think that the issue was not keeping the Secretary of State awake at night until two weeks ago when he telephoned my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham. The Government have known about the anomaly for a long time and their best effort ignores their own logic. Newchurch consultants have long recognised—as they say in their "Guide to the PFI"—that > "In all but the most exceptional circumstances, capital sourced from the private sector is going to be more expensive than money provided by Her Majesty's Treasury".

The Secretary of State has admitted that it is perfectly true that capital always costs more in the private sector than it does in the public sector. In his speech to the Royal College of Physicians, he said:

> "I am strongly in favour of testing public and private sector solutions and adopting the approach which offers best value".

We agree entirely with best value, but we remain unconvinced that worst value can be underwritten by the Bill and that the Department of Health does not have to take a decision about it.

We tabled the amendment because we are concerned about the state of the national health service. We do not believe that the PFI is any substitute for the public investment that was cut by 17 per cent. in the last Budget. If the PFI is to apply to the health service, it should be on the basis that it is additional and that it will do what it is supposed to do. Dozens of hospitals that should have been built—some of them years ago—remain on the architects' drawings boards because of the Government's belief that the private sector is always the way to go. We do not believe that that is correct in all circumstances. [Interruption.]

The Secretary of State sits there heckling with his feet up. He should start doing his job: he should come to the Dispatch Box and, instead of being flip, tell us the real consequences of the legalisation that he introduces in this place. I ask my hon. Friends to join me in the Division Lobby tonight in order to begin to sort out the mess that the Government have made.

9.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): I am somewhat disappointed by the efforts of Opposition Front-Bench Members in the debate. I am aware that the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), following the rumpus surrounding her decision to send her son to an excellent school in my constituency—I have not had the opportunity to congratulate her on her excellent choice; Bromley is renowned for its hospitals as well as its education facilities—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The Bill is about the Health Service and not schools.

Mr. Horam: I congratulate the hon. Lady, and I know that she will accept it in good heart. Following the rumpus surrounding her decision, she no doubt wanted to show her mettle and prove that she is not a liability to the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. McLeish: It was an excellent speech.

Mr. Horam: The hon. Gentleman may have thought so, but I am not sure that that is the consensus in the House. The hon. Lady was rather unwise to take such a strident line with regard to the Bill. It is clearly a responsible measure—any objective observer would regard it as the ultimate in responsibility. It is a Bill of probity. The Bill will save the taxpayer far more money than the largesse to which the hon. Lady referred. I know that the Opposition are rather more casual in their regard to money than we are, but the Bill will save the taxpayer a great deal of money.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I appreciate the Minister giving way. I understand the point that he is making, which relates to the national health service. Just a few weeks ago, we were informed by the Minister responsible for health in Northern Ireland that, because of its confidential nature, he could not give us advance notice of a similar measure relating to Northern Ireland. He went on to say that it would be dealt with by negative resolution. Yet there is doubt as to whether it could meet the Privy Council calendar and take effect at the same time as the Bill.

Would it be possible, even at this late stage, for the legislation to cover the national health service in Scotland and Northern Ireland, bearing it in mind that there is a wry expression on the faces of people in Dungannon, where a private finance initiative that was prepared to invest in a magnetic resonance imaging scanner was turned down?

Mr. Horam: The commencement of the Bill is a separate matter, but I have heard what the hon. Gentleman said, and no doubt my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will ensure that the matter is dealt with sensibly and properly at the appropriate time.

I wonder whether the hon. Member for Peckham really understands the line that she has taken. Once again, she said that the PFI is about privatisation and that she is opposed to it, unlike many of her hon. Friends, including the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron), until his rather dutiful retraction during his closing remarks. I was rather sorry that he had to explain away his words.

The Opposition are not clear where they stand. We are uniformly and unilaterally united in favour of PFI, while they cannot make up their mind. They use weasel words about private and public partnerships. At least the hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell), in an excellent speech, made it perfectly clear that he understands what the Bill is about, and I hope that he will join us in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Horam: No. The Opposition are unclear as to whether they are opposed to the PFI, half-heartedly in favour of it or wholly in favour of it.

Unusually, the Opposition's health spokesmen wish to put the Department of Health in a worse position than other Departments. As was pointed out in the Financial Times this morning, the Bill seeks to create a level playing field. The Health Department is currently in a worse position than other Departments in regard to raising private money, precisely because of existing legislation.

Ms Harman: Whose legislation?

Mr. Horam: The legislation goes back to 1977 and 1948, so we cannot make it a party political matter.

The Bill creates a level playing field. The hon. Lady, as Opposition health spokesman, is prepared to place the Health Department in a worse position. She has not understood that—perhaps she did not read the Financial Times this morning—but she is prepared to accept it. I understand that she does not want to build more hospitals through the use of private finance in the same way as we do, but it is extraordinary that she wishes to disadvantage health in relation to other areas of spending such as education. The hon. Lady has got herself into an extraordinary position in opposing the Bill.

Finally, the hon. Lady said that a threat hangs over the hospitals as a result of the PFI, yet she plans to vote against the Bill. If there is a threat hanging over hospitals, the Bill provides exactly the way to remove it. Again, the Opposition are in a total muddle.

Mr. Bradley: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Horam: No. I have very little time.

The Opposition take a contradictory position. Members of Labour's Front-Bench team hold about three different positions, as between their leader and senior and junior health spokespersons. The Opposition accuse us of being in a shambles, but their position is a total mess.

Mr. Bradley: Will the Minister give way now?

Mr. Horam: No, because the hon. Gentleman did not take part in the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister has made it clear that he will not give way.

Mr. Horam: I am sorry if I cannot deal with all the points made in the debate, but there were several speeches, and a number of them were in similar vein. My hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) made an excellent speech.

Mr. Galbraith: No, it was not.

Mr. Horam: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman did not hear my hon. Friend, but I thought that his speech was excellent. He pointed out again that the Opposition have not committed themselves to an increase in resources. This Government committed themselves to increasing resources in real terms and fulfilled that commitment. The Opposition have yet to make any kind of commitment. The hon. Member for Peckham cannot wriggle out of her remarks about resources. It is particularly ironic, after all the fuss that Labour made after the previous general election, that the Opposition will not budge on resources. That is most telling.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury thought that there was a difference between finance leasing and an operating lease, which he wanted me to explore, and I shall do so. He conceded that much would depend on whether accountants could be made to agree. That is a rather different matter. I do not know about making lawyers or economists agree, but making accountants agree would certainly be extremely difficult.

The speech of the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) had all the hallmarks of Victorian melodrama. I am fond of the hon. Gentleman—he certainly adds colour and life to the House.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Bowis): Or to the Hackney Empire.

Mr. Horam: My hon. Friend took the words out of my mouth. The hon. Gentleman's speech would have been good for the Hackney Empire. It was a Grand Guignol speech.

The hon. Gentleman was rightly concerned about fiscal probity. As a former member of the Public Accounts Committee, so am I, and certainly I do not run second to the hon. Gentleman in that matter. He can be assured that the Bill enhances the fiscal probity of the PFI and the NHS.

Ms Harman: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Horam: No, because I have not had a chance to get into my speech. I have 10 minutes left. No, nine minutes. Good heavens—that is ridiculous.

Ms Harman rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has made it clear that he will not give way.

Mr. Horam: There is also a convention that a Minister who is winding up after a seven-hour debate comprising as many speeches as we have heard today is allowed some time to reply to points made from all parts of the House. It is absurd of the hon. Lady, having made a 40-minute speech, to expect to intervene again.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold), who could not remain for the end of the debate, and my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), made points about hospitals in their constituencies. They understand my position and know that we are making good progress.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) made a telling and thoughtful intervention. He suggested as an alternative to the Bill an insurance premium, providing for payment in the case of default. I believe that the hon. Gentleman understands that money taken as insurance premiums from solvent trusts would reduce the money available for health care. He said that he supported the principle of the Bill, in the sense that the Government should be responsible for the way in which they conduct their business. Curiously, he went on to say that he could not support this particular Bill because he did not feel that we would test value for money in a suitable way. He is wrong. The whole point of the PFI is that it tests value for money against the public alternatives.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Horam: No, I am not giving way because I have only six minutes left.

Public will be tested against private, and if private finance does not win, public finance will be used. That is the exact test that the hon. Member for Southwark and

Bermondsey wanted. He made an important point about how far the Bill would fill in the hole created by the withdrawal of capital funding from the public sector. He is right to point out, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State agreed, that there is some withdrawal, for the year starting in April, from the capital fund for hospital provision. But there will be a huge increase of £1.3 billion in current spending, and even the hon. Gentleman must admit that all that money comes from the public sector.

We have been able to increase spending by so much—for nurses, doctors and health care—simply because we have made a much smaller reduction in capital funding. That small reduction has been partly covered by receipts from land sales, as well as by PFI investment, and there will be a huge overall increase in spending next year and a tiny decrease in public funding for the capital sector. The hon. Gentleman's point is, therefore, not really relevant.

I return to the speeches of Opposition Front Benchers. [Interruption.] Good heavens, I have only five minutes left. The hon. Member for Peckham claimed to make five points in her speech. I counted only four, so five was an exaggeration. She said that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had broken all the promises on hospitals. I know of no major delays in projects currently being implemented since the PFI arrangements were put in hand.

Mr. Martlew: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Horam: No. Carlisle hospital is a good example of a hospital that has been built in stages. Stage 1 was completed in 1975, and nothing has been done since then. That is the reality of hospital building before the PFI—delay after delay, and stage 1, stage 2 and stage 3. Under the PFI, there will be no delay and we can build a hospital in one go. Nor should there be any delay, because the PFI exercise can be done in the same time and in the same way as going through a full business case. There would be no reason for any delay, and there has been no serious delay as a result of the PFI.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) made it clear in his intervention that Norwich hospital had suffered no delay as a result of the PFI. The hon. Member for Rother Valley mentioned North Durham hospital. The PFI has caused no delay for North Durham hospital.

Mr. John Garrett (Norwich, South): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Horam: No, I have only three minutes left.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I repeat that the Minister has made it clear that he is not giving way.

Mr. Horam: The hon. Member for Peckham also made the tired claim that the PFI was a Trojan horse for privatisation. She had to go as far as Stonehaven in Scotland to produce one example that looks remotely like privatisation. Even that example is not privatisation of the clinical sector, but a perfectly sensible arrangement that the clinicians support.

The hon. Lady went on to try to link privatisation with market testing. Again, the Opposition are entirely wrong. Market testing has saved the taxpayer hundreds of thousands of pounds. A billion pounds in total has been saved by the health service by contracting out services, and that is a good example of the private sector bringing its skills to bear to improve the performance of health care.

The hon. Lady's final point—her coup de grâce—amounted to a ludicrous claim that this all means a blank cheque for £5 billion—as if there were no external financing limit, no quarterly reporting, no balance between receipt and revenue. The fact is that the Opposition's reasoned amendment is a nonsensical sham. It is wholly without substance, and it should be defeated.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Bill read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE (RESIDUAL LIABILITIES) BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 50A(1)(a),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the National Health Service (Residual Liabilities) Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to that Act in the sums payable out of money so provided under any other enactment.—[Mr. Bates.]

DEREGULATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): With permission, I shall put together the motions relating to delegated legislation.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14A (Consideration of draft deregulation orders),

That the draft Deregulation (Special Hours Certificates) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 19th February, be approved.

That the draft Deregulation (Friendly Societies Act 1992) Order, which was laid before this House on 12th February, be approved.—[Mr. Bates.]

Electricity Pricing

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

10.16 pm

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): At this time of night, matters of interest and concern in relation to the privatised utilities are familiar territory to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the House. The regulators of those utilities often feature largely in such discussions. They include Offer, the Office of Electricity Regulation, Ofgas, the Office of Gas Supply and Ofwat, the Office of Water Services. We have not yet had Offrail or Offmilk, which were threatened at one stage. If the weekend recommendation that the monarchy might be privatised were accepted, we might find ourselves discussing Offcrown or, indeed, Offhead.

Despite the time of night, it is important to recognise that there is an issue of national significance here, although I shall also consider it in relation to the part of the south-west that I represent. There is consumer representation, which is extremely important, but the committees that represent the consumer increasingly find that their concerns are not being fully reflected in the way in which the industry is regulated. That applies to all the privatised utilities.

To a large extent, that is due to the buck-passing between the Minister and regulator in each of the respective sectors. The powers that each has and their inter-relationship is as important as the regulators' statutory responsibility. My colleagues in the south-west and I had a meeting today with professor Stephen Littlechild, regulator of the electricity industry. That clarified the borders of his responsibilities vis à vis the Minister.

Clearly, unbridled competition between regional electricity companies, the so-called RECs, is pre-supposed because that is what privatisation is all about. Equally, that competition pre-supposes elimination of the cross subsidies that were a feature of those utilities.

The National Grid, however, is a different matter: it is a national monopoly. It would indeed be a political decision to insist on full distance-related charges, especially if such charges now arise disproportionately. At the time of privatisation, assurances were given that the grid would remain a national service. Compare this privatisation with, for instance, the privatisation of British Telecom. What if, in those circumstances, that entire national service had been subjected to a straight distance-related charge? There would have been uproar by now, especially in the more peripheral parts of the United Kingdom.

The chairman of the South West electricity consumers committee has drawn the attention of hon. Members representing my region to a new development. He writes:

"The Office of Electricity Regulation has recently unveiled proposals to increase the electricity transmission charges imposed by the National Grid Company on electricity supplied to the South West. As you will know, customers in the South West are already penalised by a charging structure which takes account of the distance that power has to be transmitted from the generating stations, predominantly in the North of England, to the consumer. It is now proposed that the costs of losses on the transmission system be recouped in the same manner.

The existing charging structure already means that electricity customers in the South West pay more than almost anywhere else in the country. These latest proposals could mean further increases of up to 2 per cent., with Devon and Cornwall being particularly badly affected."

I emphasise that, although the chairman referred to the south-west, the principle will apply throughout the country, and the more peripheral areas furthest away from the centres of generating capacity will suffer similarly.

An excellent overview by the Centre for the Study of Regulated Industries shows that the typical South Western Electricity domestic bill for 1994-95, after rebates, was £303.66—the highest in England. I know that Conservative Members representing my region will share my fear that, having already reached the highest point, we are likely to be pushed even further away from the norm.

There are, of course, many factors at work, and the future is very unclear. The CRI brief shows that a number of influences may affect future prices: National Grid rebates, distribution price controls and the sale of the nuclear elements of the generating industry—and, indeed, the extent to which that may or may not be postponed, and its effect on the nuclear levy. There are also the reductions in overall generating prices as a result of new contracts; and who knows what competition will do?

I do not want to overestimate the extent to which the latest development to which our attention has been drawn will alter the overall level of electricity costs in the south-west, or, indeed, other areas that are similarly affected. One thing is certain, however: the cumulative disadvantage is likely to increase rather than decrease. That was recognised today—by complete coincidence, as far as I am aware. In Northern Ireland, it has now been acknowledged that the discrepancy requires the award of a £60 million grant. Some of us in other parts of the United Kingdom may feel that our case is almost as strong. All areas of this kind—the south-west, Wales and Northern Ireland being the most obvious—tend to contain more small industrial firms, so they cannot even benefit from the high-volume tariffs that are comparatively common elsewhere.

Along with my south-west Liberal Democrat colleagues who are here this evening, and who attended our meeting with the regulator this afternoon, I have some special concerns. If the differential is allowed to increase, even discriminating within the South Western Electricity area—more specifically, for each National Grid zone within that area—regions such as Cornwall and Devon will be hit particularly hard. That will add to the existing calamitous water and other household costs in an area where, after the initial experiment with gas competition, we are bound to face higher prices than other parts of the country.

I need hardly remind the House that the south-west has high unemployment and low household incomes. Cornwall is especially badly affected by both. The cumulative effect of that series of differentials is disastrous.

There are wider implications for similar parts of the country. Professor Littlechild agrees with that but has also said:

[Mr. Paul Tyler]

"there are important advantages in more cost-reflective transmission charges. Better pricing signals will encourage investment in new generation plant in areas where it is needed, like the south-west. This would also increase energy efficiency, reduce the need for new transmission lines and benefit the local economy."

The House will immediately realise that those signals will be effective only if they are aimed at the appropriate decision makers. That is a sine qua non. Secondly, they must be sufficiently powerful to offset other economic factors pulling in the opposite direction. No one will decide on the basis of the so-called signals to invest in new generating capacity in an area such as Cornwall without other factors being brought into play. There is evidence that the signals will, in the present circumstances, fail on both counts.

If the signals are imposed on the consumer, they will have no impact on the decision makers. The generators take investment decisions, not the consumers. In the past, consumers have had little or no impact on generating capacity. It should be remembered that in the far south-west, the Central Electricity Generating Board closed down power stations at Hayle, Plymouth and Yelland against local opposition. Many of us felt that employment, economic potential and spreading energy capacity around the country were important objectives that those decisions went against.

The decision makers ignored the effect on local people then, so why should they listen to local consumers now? It is ironic that the CEGB took those decisions on the specific ground that transmission charges from elsewhere in the United Kingdom were likely to be so low that the closures would be cheaper than continuing local generation, which they argued would be too expensive. Some hon. Members here tonight will recall those decisions being made against local opposition.

Offer and the RECs cannot have it both ways. If they argue, as they appear to, that the costs will be only marginal, clearly they will have only a marginal impact.

Our discussions with the regulator this afternoon appeared to move towards a possible solution. That is why at the outset of my speech, I emphasised the difference between the responsibilities of the regulator and those of Ministers. It appears that the only way to achieve the possible remedy is by ministerial direction. If we could find a mechanism to ensure that the decision makers—the generators—have to bear the extra cost of inefficient transmission over long distances in a way that safeguards the position of consumers in vulnerable areas such as the south-west, there is clearly some prospect for success. That would apply perhaps to Wales, and for all I know, to Northern Ireland.

Professor Littlechild acknowledged the force of that argument in respect of both tests—its effect on decision makers and its economic impact—and that that course would be preferable. It was clear from our discussions with him this afternoon that if extra burdens on south-west consumers were imposed, they would be damaging. However, it was equally clear that those burdens are by no means automatic. They do not have to follow from the decision to try to cut out all cross-subsidies but it will need Government intervention to prevent them doing so.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Perhaps I can help to persuade the Minister of the case. He represents the Department of Trade and Industry, which spends considerable sums trying to support business in the south-west. There is little point in that money being spent if it is cancelled out by the extra costs on business from electricity charges. Therefore, our suggestion could be a net saving to the Department as it would not have to spend money overcoming problems that it is itself creating.

Mr. Tyler: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. I am sure that the Minister will acknowledge that the disincentive to incoming investment and, perhaps, to the natural growth of companies already resident in the region is extremely important to avoid if we are to achieve a more economically successful region and, indeed, save the hon. Gentleman and his Department money in the long run. It is precisely this sort of signal, as the regulator calls it, that can discourage people from bringing their investment in new businesses and jobs to a region such as ours, which so desperately needs them.

That is why we lay such emphasis on what is otherwise seen as a comparatively marginal difference between our region and other regions. For example, if a business is contemplating moving either to Scotland, where electricity costs are comparatively low, or to the south-west, which may be comparable in other ways, it is yet another disincentive to come west and an incentive to go north. As Conservative Members as well as my Liberal Democrat colleagues have been able to establish in recent weeks, there have been huge incentives to take people north of the border. This could be yet another factor.

Left to themselves, in the present regime the National Grid Company, the regional electricity companies and Professor Littlechild seem almost bound to end all cross-subsidy. In those circumstances, the consumers in those areas furthest from the power stations will pay full distance-related charges. It need not be so. If Ministers so choose, they could instruct that the differentials were borne by the generators, not the end consumer—be it business, commercial, industrial or domestic. Not only would that obviously benefit all those consumers—and, as I have just said, in the wider economic sense be a huge benefit to the south-west and similar areas—it would also encourage a revival of generating capacity in those areas.

I fear that without that ministerial intervention the far south-west will be destined to suffer the worst penalties of privatisation in every direction. I therefore plead with the Minister at least to take seriously the suggestion made today, as a result of our discussions with the regulator, and to look at a different mechanism that could avoid this disaster.

10.32 pm

The Minister for Small Business, Industry and Energy (Mr. Richard Page): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) on raising this subject for tonight's debate and on giving me this opportunity to say a few words in response. I hope that he will understand if I do not follow him down the side track of saying what an excellent record the Government have on producing inward investment in the south-west.

I want to say a few words about the background to electricity privatisation and the way in which electricity prices are determined under the regulatory regime that the Government put in place at the time of privatisation. I shall then come to the issue that the hon. Gentleman raised of regional variations in electricity prices.

A key point about the Government's policy for the restructuring and privatisation of the electricity industry was that "Decisions about the supply of electricity should be driven by the needs of customers."

The privatisation framework was also guided by a number of further principles: for example, that competition is the best guarantee of the customer's interests; that regulation should be designed to promote competition, oversee prices and protect the customer's interests in areas where natural monopoly will remain; that security and safety of supply must be maintained; and that customers should be given new rights, not safeguards.

The Government's reorganisation of the electricity industry before privatisation provided the framework for giving effect to those principles. The old Central Electricity Generating Board was divided into three competing generators—National Power, PowerGen and Nuclear Electric. The National Grid was transferred to the ownership of the 12 regional electricity companies, and it was responsible for electricity transmission and the independent central dispatch of electricity generating plant. Regional electricity companies are facing increasing competition in their authorised areas as their franchise markets are progressively reduced.

An important part of the electricity privatisation framework has been the creation of an independent regulator. The hon. Gentleman referred to the Director General of Electricity Supply and to the conversations and the meetings that he has had with him. That man is the head of the Office of Electricity Regulation and his job is to promote competition and to constrain the activities of the remaining monopolies and dominant suppliers.

This framework has brought significant benefits to the electricity consumer. For example, since privatisation prices have fallen, domestic prices have fallen by 7 per cent. in real terms—excluding VAT—and industrial prices have fallen by 10 per cent. in real terms. There have been some genuine new rights for customers, in the form of the ability of customers outside the RECs' franchise markets—which are being progressively reduced, and which will be ended completely by 1998—to shop around and select a supplier of their choice. There are guaranteed standards of performance of supply for tariff customers, set by the DGES, covering aspects such as the need to keep appointments on the date specified and fixed amounts of compensation for customers in the event that the guaranteed standards are not met.

There are overall performance standards that the RECs are to meet, such as the minimum percentage of supplies to be reconnected following faults within three hours and within 24 hours. There are new codes of practice to cover matters such as how to handle customer complaints, the efficient use of electricity, services for the elderly and disabled, and arrangements for paying bills. Customers have the opportunity to complain to an independent regulator, the DGES, and for those complaints to be investigated by the Office of Electricity Regulation.

In 1990, the RECs' transitional franchise market—the market within which the RECs were the monopoly suppliers—comprised sites taking 1 MW or less, and in April 1994 it was reduced to sites taking 100 kW or less. In April 1998—in just over two years' time—the franchise will be ended, and all customers, including domestic customers, will have a choice of supplier. Within the franchise market, electricity prices are controlled by the DGES.

The price of electricity is made up of four elements: first, the wholesale purchase cost of the electricity to the REC, which the REC may pass through to the retail price; secondly, the cost of transmitting the electricity from the generating station, through the National Grid's transmission system, to the REC's system of wires; thirdly, the cost of distributing the electricity over the REC's system, which accounts for some 25 per cent. of the electricity price, and has been subject to price controls that have required real price decreases in this component of the final electricity price; and, fourthly, the fossil fuel levy and value added tax.

The final cost of the electricity used by the hon. Gentleman's constituents reflects all four of these elements. Even taking VAT into account, real domestic electricity prices are no higher than they were before privatisation—since privatisation, they have fallen by about 7 per cent., excluding VAT.

There are further decreases to come. As we all know, domestic customers of the RECs have received a one-off discount of £50 on their electricity bills under the terms of the flotation of the National Grid in December. The tightening of the distribution price control, announced by the Director General of Electricity Supply in July 1995, will bring a 3 per cent. reduction in real electricity prices as from 1 April. The reduction in the rate of the fossil fuel levy at the time of privatisation of the nuclear generating stations will bring another further significant reduction in electricity prices later this year.

The main point raised by the hon. Member for North Cornwall concerned regional variations in electricity prices. In the context of the elements that I have just enumerated, that means the distribution and transmission price controls; and there is a link with transmission losses, so I shall say a few words about that.

There is nothing too surprising about the existence of regional variations in prices; indeed, regional price variations are to be found in commodities separate from electricity. They can be found in such things as tea and houses, and they are a natural and unsurprising consequence of underlying regional differences in market conditions. There is not too much that anyone can do about the geographical and demographic conditions that push up supply costs to the more remote and sparsely populated regions of the isles. Against the background set by the differences, however, it is important that the severity of regulation should take into account, case by case, the extent of the scope for cost reduction in different areas.

Consequently, the director general sets the distribution price control separately for each of the 12 RECs. The revised controls that he announced last summer mean that the aggregate required reduction in the distribution charges by South Western Electricity over the period 1994-95 to 1999-2000 will be nearly one third in real terms—to be precise, 30 per cent. Some other RECs have had more severe reductions while others have had smaller ones.

At present, electricity transmission losses are charged on a uniform basis throughout the country. However, annual rates for transmission losses have increased by about £30 million in the past few years and the director general has said that customers would get a better deal if charges for transmission were more cost-reflective—that is, if they related more closely to the typical distances that electricity must travel from generator to customer. That is part of the point that the hon. Member for North Cornwall made.

A more cost-reflective basis of charging would bring reductions in charges to some, but the reverse side of the coin, fairly obviously, is that Professor Littlechild has acknowledged that it would mean increases to others. He said, however, that any such increases in transmission charges should not exceed 12 per cent. of the electricity price in any region and would be more than offset by the reduction in charges to those customers resulting from the implementation of the new distribution price controls.

Professor Littlechild has commented—this returns to one of the points that the hon. Member for North Cornwall made—that customers alone should not bear those charges. He said:

"Generators should also share the charge for transmission losses, since the most important single need is to inform decisions on the location of new generation".

Within government, that is a matter for the director general. He has called on the electricity pool to make proposals by the end of the month. The director general has suggested that if the pool considers that it cannot deal adequately with transmission losses by that time, it should transfer responsibility to the National Grid so that necessary arrangements can be put into effect in good time. That brings me, as night follows day, to the subject of transmission price control.

The original transmission price control covered the period from 1990 to 1993, and restrained the National Grid's average regulated revenue per kilowatt to increase by no more than the rate of inflation. In 1992, the Director General of Electricity Supply reviewed that control, and tightened it to "RPI minus 3" for three years as from April 1993. That means that the National Grid's average regulated revenue per kilowatt has had to reduce in real terms by 3 per cent. a year for three years. Those effects are all reflected in the present electricity price level, and they will bring a further decrease in transmission charges as from this April.

Mr. Nick Harvey (North Devon): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Page: I do not mind briefly giving way, but if I cannot finish my speech it will be on the hon. Gentleman's head.

Mr. Harvey: The Minister is referring to overall reductions in transmissions. He said that other commodities show a price differential between regions, as though that were an act of God over which there was no control. Does he accept that, because the transmission part of the electricity industry remains a monopoly, it is a matter of policy whether there is economic costing, differentiating by region, or whether the costs are shared equally, as they have been until now? That is a matter of policy that might be controlled.

Mr. Page: I understand what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but as I said at the outset, the director general has been given specific tasks to achieve and—in being given those tasks—he has also been given a certain independence. If someone is given independence, he or she is expected to exercise it. Therefore the arguments to the director general have to be advanced; much of what I have said tonight shows that so much of the decision making will be in the director general's hands.

In November, the DGES began to consider the revised transmission price control to apply from 1 April 1997. He issued a consultation paper and asked for comments by the end of January. I understand that the DGES hopes to announce the revised control later this year and that it will take effect from 1 April 1997. That is a matter for the DGES. An important aspect of the regulatory system—introduced at the time of privatisation—is that the DGES is independent. His statutory duties include protecting the interests of the customer and promoting efficiency and economy on the part of the electricity licensees.

The hon. Gentleman has already expressed his concerns fairly forcefully, and I am sure that he will state them in writing to the DGES. I shall draw the contents of the debate to the attention of the DGES and flag up the hon. Gentleman's concerns. My hon. Friend the Member for South-East Cornwall (Mr. Hicks) has also made his views known to me. I advise the hon. Member for North Cornwall to lobby the director general enthusiastically so that he may take into account those views when he conducts the review of electricity transmission charges.

Question put and agreed to. Adjourned accordingly at fourteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Intergovernmental Conference

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

9.34 am

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I am grateful to you, Madam Speaker, for granting this important debate this morning. I feel enormously privileged to open the first of two debates on the White Paper on the intergovernmental conference. As we all know, the IGC is scheduled to start its deliberations on 29 March and, in the intervening period, right hon. and hon. Members will have the opportunity to form opinions about whether the negotiating position set out in the White Paper reflects their aspirations for the future of the European Community and, more to the point, their aspirations for the future of the country to which we all belong and to whose sovereign we have all sworn an oath of allegiance.

It is a sad commentary on our times that, at this defining moment in our nation's history, the White Paper makes but a passing reference to the single currency, which is pivotal to the debate about the future of the Community.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): That has nothing to do with the IGC.

Mr. Gill: Doubtless that is because the Government believe, or have been pressured into believing, that economic and monetary union do not lead to political union. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, when he replies to the debate, will confirm or deny that the statement made to me by the Economic Secretary in her letter of 15 February—that "any move to monetary union . . . does not necessitate political union"— is an accurate representation of Government thinking.

Mr. Harris rose—

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North) rose—

Mr. Gill: I intend to give way to hon. Members, and I notice that two of my colleagues wish to intervene. I wish to reach the end of my first section and then I will give way. I have a long speech to make and I do not wish to prolong the debate unduly.

Notwithstanding the answer to my question that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will give the House, let me remind him that there is a strong and growing body of opinion in Parliament and in the country that will not accept the abolition of the pound sterling and the consequences that must inevitably stem from that decision. So the second question my hon. Friend must answer, assuming that the Economic Secretary's statement is correct, is how the Government will persuade the people of this country that they have genuinely set their faces against political union.

Mr. Marlow: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way to me because I may be able to answer the question that my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) tried to put. From a sedentary position, he suggested that monetary union was nothing to do with the IGC. The IGC is about any reform of or changes required to the Maastricht treaty, and half of the treaty is to do with monetary union. Therefore, monetary union is a proper subject to discuss at the IGC.

Mr. Gill: I agree with my hon. Friend and I hope that he has satisfactorily dealt with the point that my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) made from a sedentary position.

I remind my hon. Friend the Minister that I asked whether the advice that I have been given by the Economic Secretary is correct and, if it is correct, how we will persuade the great British public that economic and monetary union does not lead on to political union. When he answers that second question, may I urge my hon. Friend to recognise the fact that we are long past the point at which mere rhetoric will satisfy the voters, because for 25 years or more they have been duped and deceived by politicians whose hidden agenda is only now revealed? My hon. Friend must explain how, in logic, it is possible for a nation to surrender its currency without at the same time surrendering its sovereignty. Without a satisfactory answer to those questions, the House is entitled to conclude that the end game—as many of us have long suspected—is not a Europe of nation states, but a totally integrated United States of Europe. Why else is it that Governments have signed not one but three significant treaties, all of which have imposed ever-increasing hegemony on Europe? I trust that the Minister will answer that question too.

I turn next to the submissions that Ministers have received in advance of yesterday's publication of the White Paper. Quite apart from representations from individual Members of Parliament, my hon. Friend will also be aware of the papers submitted by the Conservative 2000 group, the British committee of the European Research Group—comprising 12 right hon. and hon. Members—and the group of eight Conservative Members from whom the party Whip was withdrawn on 28 November 1994, because of their refusal to support a Government motion to send an additional £75 million to Brussels. I trust that the Minister will not be dismissive of the views expressed in those submissions, and that he will not underestimate the huge body of public opinion that supports them—a body of opinion that will be profoundly disappointed by the Government's failure to produce proposals for treaty amendments.

Although I welcome the modest objectives that Ministers have set themselves, I will not be alone in expressing the view that failure to identify treaty changes will come to be regarded as a missed opportunity to recover competences that should never have been given away in the first place. While I am grateful that Her Majesty's Government have acceded to the request from the so-called Euro-rebels for a White Paper, I hope against hope that the statement in the conclusions of the White Paper—that the Government are still considering their detailed approach—is a sign that Ministers, even at this late stage, are prepared to modify their negotiating stance in the light of today's debate and in the light of the debate that will take place on Thursday week. Perhaps when he sums up the Minister will be kind enough to give me that assurance.

I should like now to draw the House's attention to the submission of the European Commission—

Mr. Marlow rose—

Mr. Gill: I will give way to my hon. Friend provided that he is not going to be a complete nuisance.

Mr. Marlow: I am afraid I am. We dislike party splits, but I am afraid that there is a split between my hon. Friend and me. He says that the Government are not asking for treaty amendments, but in yesterday's statement the Foreign Secretary said:

"The Government do not believe that directives, once enacted, are irreversible, and will press for treaty amendment if that proves to be the best way".—[Official Report, 12 March 1996; Vol. 273, c. 786.]

Mr. Gill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for pointing out that error in my speech.

The submission by the European Commission is entitled "Reinforcing Political Union and Preparing for Enlargement". On the very first page of the document it is unequivocally stated in paragraph 2 that since 1993 the member states have adopted and given effect to the treaty on European union, which derives from "a broad, twofold aspiration: a determination to extract all the positive effects of the internal market by adding to it a single currency . . . and . . . to give the union a genuine political dimension".

Later, in paragraph 6, it is stated that

"the deepening and widening of the Union are intertwined."

Barring the odd detail here and there, the Commission's opinion probably reflects the views of a majority of the member states. It is instructive, therefore, to compare it point by point with our Government's White Paper. The Commission says, for example, that there should be a stronger role for the European Court of Justice. If there is one special disappointment in the White Paper, it is that Her Majesty's Government's stated position on the ECJ is far less robust than we had expected. My hon. Friend, the Minister will not be surprised to hear me say that the House will want to examine the Government's proposals for reform of the European Court in some considerable detail when the promised memorandum is eventually published.

The Commission states:

"The social dimension should be one of the central themes at the Conference".

On the other hand, Her Majesty's Government make it clear beyond all reasonable doubt that they will not accept the social chapter, when they state that "the United Kingdom will not give up its opt-out and cannot be forced to do so".

The Commission says that "it should have the power of initiative in all fields."

Our Government say that

"the EU is not a state and should take care not to develop ideas that feed people's fears"— they are real fears—

"that it has a vocation to become one."

In this connection I welcome the statement that the Government are considering ideas for limiting the scope for Community action in certain areas—in particular, to prevent the health and safety article being used for social policy by the back door. What a hollow ring that statement has in the light of yesterday's recommendation by the Advocate General concerning the working time directive; and what a vindication for all of us who have been warning the Government that Britain's opt-out from the social chapter would be circumvented in precisely this way.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and I am sure that my he, like me, will welcome the fact that after a number of outrageous and deeply offensive decisions by the European Court of Justice and the—entirely separate—European Court of Human Rights, Her Majesty's Government are at last facing up to these matters. I hope, however, that my hon. Friend will spell out what further practical measures he would like HMG to adopt in this respect, because I foresee difficulties.

Mr. Gill: I am grateful for that important point. There is increasing resentment among the people whom we represent at the ever-increasing number of decisions taken by this people's Parliament which have been overturned by the European Court of Justice. Many of us, like my hon. Friend, feel very strongly about that—as I am sure the Government know.

The Commission believes that "there should be a transfer of justice and home affairs to the Community framework."

That stands in complete contrast—to answer my hon. Friend's point—with what is advocated by the Government, who seek

"a greater role for national Parliaments in the justice and home affairs pillar."

Similarly, the Commission says that the contents of the Schengen agreement should be incorporated in the treaty; but Her Majesty's Government have refused to accept that agreement. The whole House will welcome the renewed commitment to the third pillar given in paragraph 49, and the pledge in paragraph 51 to "take whatever steps are needed to maintain our frontier controls".

On foreign policy, the Commission says that

"the Union must be able to present a united front."

Her Majesty's Government say, quite rightly, that

"the common foreign and security policy can never become an exclusive policy that would replace national foreign policy. The Commission takes the view that qualified majority voting should be the norm for the CFSP. The British Government do not accept that the unanimity provisions for the CFSP constitute a restriction on its development, or that it would be strengthened by the introduction of voting models that overrode the key concerns of member states."

Still on the subject of external relations, the Commission believes that a proper common foreign and security policy should also extend to common defence, and that this requires the better integration of the armaments industry in the general treaty rules. The Government's oft repeated view is that "decisions on defence policy should remain where they belong—with sovereign nation states".

I am quite sure that the House welcomes that adamant statement in the White Paper.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): While I agree that we should welcome the Government's commitment to maintaining our border controls, will my hon. Friend make it clear to the House and the country that if the European Court of Justice tells us that we cannot maintain those controls any longer, there will be nothing the Government can do about it?

Mr. Gill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for adding to the burden of my submission.

Still on the question of defence, all the lessons of history demonstrate that it is quite right and proper for Britain to take the view that she does—that decisions on defence policy should remain with nation states. It must be made clear to our European partners that anything which takes away from or undermines NATO is simply not acceptable. The White Paper commitment that any review of article J4

"should aim to reinforce NATO as the bedrock of European security" is most welcome; as is the statement that it would be inappropriate for the Commission, the European Parliament or the European Court of Justice to have any role in defence decision making.

On voting procedure,

"the Commission . . . proposes that qualified majority voting becomes the general rule".

Her Majesty's Government are opposed to further extension of qualified majority voting.

Finally, the Commission concludes by advocating

"the shift to a more genuinely Political Union"—

a determination powerfully articulated only yesterday by Messrs Maartens and Santer, who make no secret of the fact that the pre-eminent objective in Europe remains, as it always has been, political union.

Throughout the 20 pages of the Commission's opinion, I can find only three phrases with which I can agree: first, its conclusion that "this debate must be opened up at once, in order to give the negotiators their bearings"; secondly, its opinion that

"Europe must do less, so as to do it better"; and, thirdly, its statement that

"only a competitive economy can create lasting jobs"—

platitudes that are practically meaningless in the circumstances in which the voice of the people has either been ignored, as in the case of the first Danish referendum on Maastricht, or not even sought, as in our own case; circumstances in which all the indications are that far from doing less the Commission continually seeks to do more, as evidenced by the opinion to the IGC from which I have quoted; and circumstances in which whole industries face an uncertain future due to the overweening interference of a bureaucracy in Brussels that has an interventionist approach to economic affairs which is totally at odds with the policies of our Conservative Government.

The prospects of the United Kingdom getting satisfaction in almost any subject area are, on any rational analysis of the evidence available, remote. Our objectives, as I have demonstrated, are in many instances totally opposed to those of the Commission. We are poles apart. It is unlikely that other member states will take our part, and on the basis of past performance I am sad to say that it is highly probable that we shall seek to appease and compromise rather than challenge and confront.

But there are those of us who believe that some good could come out of the IGC if instead of playing on our weaknesses we played to our strengths. Having already given so much away—our fishing rights are a good example of this—we have little to barter with, but in that context I should remind Ministers that although I welcomed the commitment to end the abuse of quota hoppers, nothing short of the restoration of full national control over our exclusive fishing zone will satisfy the fishing industry and those of our constituents who are equally incensed by the common fisheries policy.

The time has come for us forcefully to remind our European partners that we in the United Kingdom contribute 60 per cent. of the EU fish stocks, that we are a net importer of goods from other countries in Europe, and that with Germany we effectively bankroll the rest of the Community. At the end of the day, we have a veto and we must not be afraid to use it.

I conclude by saying what I have said on so many occasions. In the final analysis, if we cannot get a deal that protects British interests and is acceptable to the majority of the British people, Her Majesty's Government must be prepared to get up from the conference table and walk away. Taking the lead in Europe is not about rushing to the head of a queue that is going up a cul-de-sac. It is about persuading Europe's political elite that the whole concept of European Union is doomed to failure unless they can carry the people with them.

Once again, it is Britain's historic destiny to champion the cause of freedom and guide our European partners away from the totalitarianism that threatens to engulf them. I urge the whole House, in giving our negotiators their bearings for the forthcoming IGC, to make clear its opposition to political union and, indeed, to any other proposal that would lead to that same conclusion.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West) rose—

Mr. Gill: It is most unfair of the hon. Gentleman to interrupt my peroration, but as I have not given way to the Opposition, I gladly do so now.

Mr. Randall: Did I hear the hon. Gentleman clearly? Did he say that the British Government should walk out of the IGC?

Mr. Gill: Yes, indeed he did. I very much take the view that the British Government must approach the IGC as hard-nosed business men. They have to strike a bargain there, not to please the Foreign Office or the Front Bench but to please this Parliament and the people. It will not work if they do not. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, as it gave me the opportunity to make that very important point. Sadly, the House lacks people with experience of having to strike bargains. It seems to me that the history of our overseas negotiations in the post-war period is to approach negotiations in a spirit of compromise. "We have to get a deal" is the attitude that seems to pervade the Foreign Office. I do not share that attitude. I feel most strongly, as do many of my constituents, that unless we can get a deal that is good for Britain, good for British industry, good for Britain's farmers, and good for Britain's fishermen, we cannot afford to sign up any further.

I trust that my hon. Friend the Minister will recognise that, in not going far enough with the White Paper—either in the direction of our European partners on the one hand; or, on the other, in the direction of British public opinion—the Government risk falling between two stools. At the end of the day, I trust that Ministers will recognise the inescapable reality that in all these matters it is British voters who will have the final say. I am quite sure that my hon. Friend the Minister, who is an astute politician, will recognise that fact.

9.55 am

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I congratulate the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on persuading you, Madam Speaker, to allow us to have this debate. It is timely—

Madam Speaker: The debate was won by ballot. It has nothing whatever to do with me.

Mr. Mackinlay: I am sorry about that. That is why I have always been polite to you, Madam Speaker. I was always living in hope that I might succeed.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on this timely debate. I am pleased to take part, as a large number of us will be squeezed out of the main debate on the IGC White Paper to be held a little later. It should be a two-day debate, not a one-day debate, but I guess that the powers that be on the two Front Benches will concoct that it will be a one-day debate. We shall see.

I approach the debate as someone who describes himself as a European. I believe in the concept of the European Union. I was keen to contest European elections long before it was fashionable in the Labour party to do so. I make that declaration. I have spoken before in the House about the need for the whole-hearted consent of Parliament and the people to any further integration or treaty arrangements. Therefore, if there was to be any significant constitutional change following the IGC, it should be put to the people by referendum.

I do not argue for a referendum as a political expedient, which is why the Prime Minister is now contemplating one in order to get himself off a dangerous hook, or indeed which was the motive of Harold Wilson. I believe that referendums are a good practice in our democratic processes. We should have referendums more often where there are constitutional changes. I would like to see legislation that would allow Madam Speaker to decide that matters that were of paramount importance relating to the constitution were subject to ratification by the people. I believe that that is what should happen with regard to this and other important matters.

I believe that the IGC will soon discover that there is limited scope for deepening the Community. That may be a good thing. Public opinion, not just in this country but elsewhere in western Europe, needs a few years—perhaps a decade or more—to digest what has been a rapid change in the European Union. There needs to be consolidation, a bedding down, before people, Parliaments or Governments contemplate any major changes.

I shall deal with an issue that is often thrown across the Chamber, that somehow my party is federalist whereas the Conservative party is not. That is absolute rubbish. I have never heard or known of a Labour Member who is a federalist. I have noticed, however, that there are always at least two or three federalists on the Conservative Benches—I notice that they are not in their place this morning, but hon. Members will know precisely who I mean—those who are prepared to contemplate a formal European Union on a federal basis. The federalists are on the Conservative Benches. That needs to be made quite clear.

For me, a priority is not the deepening but the widening of the Community. A historic window of political opportunity is open to us—the opportunity to entrench, preserve and promote the emerging and, in some cases, delicate democracies of central Europe. I see membership of the European Union as part of that. I would give a great deal to bring Poland in particular, Hungary, the Czech Republic—the Visegrad countries—and some other states into the Union—and, for that matter, NATO—as soon as possible.

I was somewhat irritated by the Government's failure officially to mark the 50th anniversary of Winston Churchill's speech at Fulton, Missouri. It was wrong on a number of counts to abdicate that to Lady Thatcher. I mentioned the speech in the Chamber some months ago, and also asked the Foreign Office to mark the anniversary officially. Let us remind ourselves of what was said in 1945: "From Stettin in the Baltic to Trieste in the Adriatic an iron curtain has descended across Europe behind which we must refer to it as, the Soviet sphere."

For half a century we have been saying to the countries of central Europe, "Look over the wall. See how wonderful things are in the west." Anyone who believed our propaganda would think that the sun always shone and the rain never fell in western Europe. What happened then? Communism collapsed, the wall came down and those countries asked, not unreasonably, "Can we join the club?" We said, "Hang on a moment. There are a good many things to decide."

I do not want to minimise the hurdles that stand in the way of facilitating the entry of Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic and other states into the European Union, but our moral obligation is not being recognised by our Government and, perhaps, others. There is an urgent need for us to fulfil duties of which we spoke for over 50 years, and which constituted the raison d'être for the cold war. Now we are trying to find excuses to keep those countries out, which is entirely wrong. I stand by the commitment made at Fulton: we should not now concede, instead of a Soviet, a Russian sphere of influence. There should be no Russian veto on the legitimate aspirations of free democratic countries.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mackinlay: No, I will not. Time is limited. Moreover, the hon. Lady speaks about Europe a great deal, whereas I do not speak about it very often.

Page 9 of the White Paper states that Parliament must approve any new treaty that emerges from the IGC. May I ask the Minister whether that constitutes a change of policy on the part of Her Majesty's Government? One point on which I agree with some Conservative Members is that our Parliament is always denied the right to approve treaties. We approved legislation subsequent to the Maastricht treaty rather than approving the treaty itself. Is it true that our Parliament will approve our treaty accession if a new one emerges from the IGC? If so, I welcome that, but, if not, the Minister should clearly state that we will not have such an opportunity, and that approval will be given by means of the royal prerogative. That would be entirely wrong: treaties should be approved by the legislature, as they are in other countries.

On page 15 of the White Paper, a great deal of humbug is spoken about the role of national Parliaments in relation to the business of the European Union. Having been in the House for nearly four years, I must say that I think that the way in which we scrutinise European legislation is a sham. This lovely Parliament, of which I am proud to be a Member, needs to crank up its machinery so that we can probe and criticise European legislation much more effectively. It is interesting to note that European Standing Committees A and B sit in Committee Rooms where there are no television cameras. I think that television is an important part of scrutiny. Everything is loaded against the possibility of holding a full debate and public understanding of what is going on. Parliament should be much more proactive, and should be able to initiate developments in Europe; but there is no real scope for that here.

Paragraph 30 of the White Paper, on page 15, refers to new competences, and mentions areas of competence that the Government do not think it appropriate to cede to the European Union. I shall not comment on what is said there, but I note what has been omitted. I am interested to note that there is no reference to aviation policy, airports and air traffic control. Do Her Majesty's Government concede that such matters are to be a European competence? As it happens, I think that that is inevitable and might even be a good thing, but I should like to know the position. If it is not the case, however, the Government clearly needed my assistance when preparing the White Paper, because they overlooked these matters.

The White Paper makes great play of the size of the Commission. I do not understand why that is a big issue. As I have said, I look forward to enlargement. I suspect that some small states will join the Union in the not too distant future; I accept that not every state should necessarily be able to nominate a Commissioner, but certain portfolios such as transport and foreign affairs can clearly be broken down, in the case of transport, into various forms of transport, and in the case of foreign affairs, into geographical areas. All Parliaments have junior Ministers. I know that Commissioners are not the equivalent of Ministers, but surely enough portfolios are available for each country to be able to nominate a Commissioner or an assistant Commissioner.

The White Paper makes various suggestions about how progress should be made as enlargement continues, and they are worthy of consideration. As I have said, I do not think that there is much scope for change. Existing arrangements should be allowed to bed down; by and large, qualified majority voting should remain as it is now.

Euro-sceptics have repeatedly referred to the decisions of the European Court, but the White Paper reveals that its judgments have gone against the United Kingdom on relatively few occasions. I do not say that; the Government do. We must see the position in perspective. On occasion the United Kingdom errs in its interpretation of European Union treaties, and it is in the nature of court cases that we are sometimes disappointed. You win some, you lose some.

It should be said that some recent judgments are very welcome, because they will protect workers. It should also be said that Ministers who go on about resisting the social chapter are talking absolute rot. In this regard, I probably agree with some Conservative Members. As sure as night follows day, much of what is in the social chapter will be conceded by the Government. They will huff and puff, and pretend that it is all the doing of a load of judges in Europe, but they will concede it. I welcome that; I part company with my Essex colleagues who disapprove of it. We can agree, however, that the Government's protestations of innocence are cosmetic rubbish. Inexorably changes will come about that will improve the lives of working people, increasing their capacity to shape, influence and have access to developments that affect their working lives.

The White Paper is silent on two issues. One is the size of the European Parliament. I believe that there should be a European Parliament, although I do not think that its powers should be significantly increased. It has an important role and function, but, if enlargement takes place in the Community, it is absurd that it should continue to grow. It already has 670-odd Members; I think that it is already too large. The IGC should decide to "downsize" it.

I realise that there is a problem in relation to Luxembourg, but exceptions can be made. Luxembourg was in at the beginning: it is a foundation member, and its number of Members of the European Parliament should therefore be protected. However, the size of the European Parliament should be capped. Its membership should certainly not be enlarged, and I think it should be gradually reduced. That might also push us, and other countries, into thinking in terms of an alternative voting system for Ministers of the European Parliament that reflects views in this country. I welcomed and played a full part in the Labour party's great win in the last European elections, but clearly Labour's representation in the European Parliament is disproportionate to its electoral vote. Conversely, in 1979, when my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin) was first elected to the European Parliament, Labour was substantially disadvantaged because of the crackpot electoral voting procedures for the European Parliament. That should be changed and the number of Members of the European Parliament should be reduced. The Parliament is also extremely costly.

There is a danger of the European Parliament becoming an absurd assembly moving between Brussels and Strasbourg. The Government should tackle the nonsense of there being sessions in Strasbourg. The only logical place for it to meet is Brussels, to which Members of this Parliament should have access. I know why the Government do this—

Mr. Marlow: The hon. Gentleman has been speaking for 15 minutes.

Mr. Mackinlay: The hon. Gentleman says that I have been speaking for a quarter of an hour, but he speaks time after time on Europe and I know what he is going to say—he is like a long-playing gramophone record. Now it is the turn of the hon. Member for Thurrock to have his say on Europe. I want to give a balanced view on the way in which we should proceed. Nevertheless, I take the hon. Gentleman's point, and I promise that, if he does not interrupt me again, I will conclude my speech more quickly.

If the European Parliament was in Brussels, we could go there more and understand more of what is going on. More facilities to travel to Brussels should be available to hon. Members than the one absurd concession a year, which is no good. I want to understand what is going on to be able to probe, examine and check up what is being discussed.

If there is enlargement, we must stop additional languages being made official European Community languages each time a new country joins. It is crazy. In many cases, applicant members that join the European Union will be prepared to use English or other existing official languages. There is considerable language competence elsewhere. Many people in applicant countries can speak other principal languages of the European Union. The cost and the bureaucracy is so absurd that we must say, "Enough." That should be one of the prices of new countries acceding to the European Union.

If those countries find that uncomfortable, we must say to them that, if, after they become members, they want their language to be an official language, they must pay the total cost involved, in addition to their normal contributions to European Union costs. I think they would consider that to be an absurd and unnecessary additional cost, and that is why the number of official languages should now be capped.

The real decisions will have to be taken by my hon. Friends when they are in government. The conclusion of the IGC will mean that a Labour Government will be at the helm. I hope that they will realise that Europe is universally popular in this country, provided that there are no great concessions or that further tranches of sovereignty and this Parliament's capacity to control things are not lost. I hope that they will accept that treaties should be ratified by the House and that they should make institutional arrangements whereby this Parliament can improve its capacity to probe, examine and be proactive on European matters.

Above all, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East will acknowledge the overwhelming and legitimate case for central European countries to join the European Union and NATO, which is referred to in the White Paper. That case is compelling. We should recognise it as a moral issue, an obligation and a matter of our own self-interest.

Sir John Cope (Northavon): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on his foresight and on his fortune in instituting this timely debate, which gives not only the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) but me an opportunity to get in a word on Europe. Like him, that is not something that I do frequently, in contrast with some of my hon. Friends.

I agree with the hon. Member for Thurrock about widening rather than deepening the European Union, although I would not go along with all that he said. As to whether the Labour party is federalist or more federalist than the Conservative party or some individuals in it, I draw attention not only to the social chapter but to several other items on the European Commission's wish list, which my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow set out in detail, and which the Labour party supports.

Those items include the size of the European Commission. Unlike the Government, the hon. Member for Thurrock wants a larger Commission. That should not surprise us. The shadow Government is a good deal larger than the actual Government. There are more appointments in the shadow Government.

Mr. Mackinlay: I am not in it.

Sir John Cope: I know, but more people are appointed to the shadow Government than to the actual Government. That will cause a bit of pain if the Labour party ever forms a Government, but never mind—that is the position.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow quoted extensively from the Commission's wish list at the start of the great process of the intergovernmental conference. I recall the start of the last IGC and the atmosphere then. Many continental politicians thought that Europe would take great leaps towards federalism. They confidently expected that foreign affairs, defence, home affairs and justice would become Community matters in the full sense. The Germans were not just paying by far the biggest share of the Community's costs but happy to do so and to pay more. In effect, no one else except the United Kingdom was making a substantial financial contribution to the Community's costs.

The British Government were therefore faced with considerable difficulties at the start of last IGC, but, as we know, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and his colleagues blocked all the worst federalist proposals. They were extremely successful in the negotiations and all the alarmist talk at the beginning was not justified. My right hon. Friend won or reserved the UK's position on all the important points by quietly and firmly saying no and by arguing the case in detail. He did not have a great showdown or walk out; he argued his case in his own effective manner. That is what he will do again with his colleagues.

The White Paper puts the issues and the British position with great clarity and firmness, which is the right thing to do as we approach the IGC. I welcome the fact that it has been published. I am sure that it will be studied carefully throughout Europe in all the Foreign Ministries and that it will be a useful basic document to refer back to as events proceed.

The atmosphere this time is different from that at the beginning of the last IGC. The political atmosphere, the economic background and the financial position have changed. In many respects, the Commission's wish list is not too dissimilar from the wish list of those people at the beginning of the last IGC, but the background is different.

On the political position, obviously, some of the principal characters have left the scene, notably President Mitterrand and Jacques Delors. Chancellor Kohl is still in power, although he escaped defeat by a small margin at the last elections. He has, however, begun to shift his position.

That is evidenced by the speech that is quoted on page 4 of the White Paper and to which reference was made yesterday—one of several speeches in which he has placed a slightly different emphasis.

Recently, the socialists have been defeated in Spain. Since the last IGC, everyone has lived with the problems of ratification—not only hon. Members, who dealt with them at some length, but some of the other countries in the Community, notably France and Denmark. The political background, therefore, is different in relation to Governments and public opinion in Europe.

Economically, the position is also different. Problems of recession have arisen across the Community and are still much more obvious in countries on the continent than in the UK, which is further forward in coming out of the recession and building its prosperity.

It is already becoming absolutely clear that economic and monetary union cannot be achieved in the way envisaged in the Maastricht treaty. Of course, in view of the currency markets, Finance Ministers are bound to keep talking about sticking to the timetable and the criteria—such phrases are still used throughout Europe. The truth is that we cannot do both: we can have a timetable for some sort of union or co-operation if we wish or we can stick to the Maastricht criteria.

Mr. Randall rose—

Sir John Cope: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I shall not give way as a number of hon. Members wish to speak and time is limited.

We cannot have both the timetable and the criteria, so renegotiation is inevitable. The ultimate proof of that is Belgium, which can never fulfil the criteria within the timetable; it will need decades more. That puts the whole of Benelux in doubt. I accept that, if the criteria were to be waived or altered, it might be possible to proceed on a different basis—but it would be a basis different from that envisaged at Maastricht. Renegotiation will become essential.

The financial position of the Community has changed completely. Germany is the biggest single financier of the Community, but its finances have come under strain since the last IGC and it is extremely conscious of that. Germans are still paying an additional 10 per cent. tax to cover the costs of the reunification of eastern and western Germany. They also have to pay a premium on their bond rates for three or more years because of the possibility that those loans will be repaid in a different currency from the mark. Those considerations will bear harder and harder on, first, the Bundesbank and then on German financial thinking. Germany has become much more reluctant to continue to finance the Community with a more or less blank cheque.

The Dutch are now having to pay heavily into European Union coffers—more heavily per head of population than Britain, I believe. No one is more conscious of that than their Prime Minister, Wim Kok, a former Finance Minister with whom I had to deal during the former British presidency when I was President of the Budget Council.

At that time, the French were beginning to be on our side because their bills were getting bigger. Since then, they have had tremendous difficulties with their economic policy and a change of Government. The socialists were defeated in the presidential elections—and, indeed, looked like being defeated so far in advance that Mr. Delors withdrew from standing, as he had been expected to do and had appeared to be making moves towards doing. The Italians are having to pay more and are worried about that—and who would not be, given their financial position?

The result is that the whole discussion of EU finances takes place against a background very different from a few years ago. That puts the squeeze on the common agricultural policy.

Sir Teddy Taylor: It is going up.

Sir John Cope: My hon. Friend is right to say that the CAP has gone up; it will do so again. Nevertheless, the different background to Community finances is a lever that will help to reform the CAP. In order to work, any lever needs a fulcrum, which in this case is expansion to include the countries of eastern Europe. We all recognise that it is impossible to widen the Community without reform of the CAP. That is also recognised on the continent and it will lead to reform in due course.

Another aspect is the home affairs pillar. It was and remains important to keep that as an intergovernmental matter. We must build on operational and intelligence co-operation between the police, the customs services and other agencies across the borders—not just within the EU, but much more widely. European terrorism is one matter; European organised crime is another within Europe, but it has a much wider base than that so co-operation needs to be very wide.

The home affairs pillar cannot be put within the framework of the treaty of Rome. No country would entrust the operational control of its police force to that sort of framework, not least those countries with close land borders. Britain is primarily an island, but we have a border between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. I have some experience of that border and I know how difficult co-operation across it can be. The considerations for the Royal Ulster Constabulary and Ministers dealing with policing matters north of the border are different from those of the Garda and Irish Ministers who must deal with those matters south of the border.

I am not for one moment criticising the co-operation we received from the Irish; on the contrary, we had some very good co-operation for much of the time. However, their operational considerations were different from ours—and, sadly, still are. That is one, admittedly acute, example of the differences in policing either side of a land border. A sea border makes it easier, but there are land borders across most of the continent. As part of the changed atmosphere, countries have had to face the increasing problem of immigration and asylum seekers, and nowhere more so than Germany.

I want to say a few words about referendums. Sir James Goldsmith, a French Member of the European Parliament, has written to many of us calling for a referendum in Britain on the Maastricht treaty. It is far too late for that. Whatever the arguments were for such a referendum, they were made some time ago. Much of the outcome of the Maastricht negotiations was, in any case, favourable. If there were a referendum, the voters would have to consider all sorts of matters, both favourable and otherwise. It would be difficult to frame a question on the Maastricht treaty as a whole.

[Sir John Cope]

It is quite different to talk about a future referendum on a single currency, but that is not what Sir James is calling for in his letter. If ever a single currency became reality—I have already expressed doubt about that—it would be a long way off. It will be the result of many complex considerations at that time. It may be desirable to hold a referendum before clinching the matter because undoubtedly, as my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made clear, it will have political and constitutional implications. Given that we do not know how negotiations will go, except that they will not follow the pattern set out at Maastricht, I see very little point in a more firm opinion being given at the present time.

All in all, the White Paper is very positive. It sets out a practical approach to the IGC, which I welcome. The tide of opinion is running in the same direction on the continent as it has been in this country, to a much greater extent than before. We are therefore well placed to get a good result from the IGC.

10.30 am

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): From where I stand, the approach of the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) is wholly negative, and compares, as the European Commission said, predictably with the Government's largely negative White Paper. I am getting rather tired of all this rubbish about hidden agendas. I have fought nine elections and never concealed my belief in a federal Europe. It is simply not true that we engage in all sorts of fancy scheming. I say positively and clearly that I do not fear a federal Europe; it is an ideal to which I aspire.

The hon. Member for Ludlow opened his speech with a few remarks on the single currency, which will not, as we know, be dealt with at the intergovernmental conference. I agree with him that it is, however, behind the whole argument. Perhaps he has not noticed the most recent information about business attitudes to a single currency. A report published earlier in the year by Coopers and Lybrand found that 57 per cent. of British businesses favoured a single currency. The hon. Gentleman might take that into account. A single currency and a single market are no more than common sense, and business men, many of whom support his Government, clearly recognise that. I doubt very much that business men in Ludlow think differently from those anywhere else. They may simply like the hon. Gentleman and thole his eccentricities, but he should not assume that they all agree with him. I am sure that they do not agree with the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow).

Mr. Gill: Does the hon. Gentleman think that there is any significance in the pronouncements of Professor Otmar Issing, who, as he knows, is a director of the Bundesbank? He is apparently on record as saying that monetary union could destroy the European Union.

Sir Russell Johnston: I have just visited the Federal Republic of Germany. That view, if it is quoted accurately—I have a feeling that it is somewhat out of context—was not held by any part of the German political establishment, including the Social Democratic party.

One passage of the speech of the hon. Member for Ludlow reflected the weakness and the negative nature of the Euro-sceptic attitude. I do not think that there is a Euro-sceptic case at all. The hon. Gentleman—I do not think that I am quoting him accurately, but he is present and can correct me if I am wrong—said that the Government should challenge and confront rather than compromise and reconcile at the IGC. If it is necessary, he said—there was an intervention at that point—they should walk out. Such rigid, confrontational politics is bad and one of the major weaknesses of the British political system. It is reflected in the House and maintained by an unfair and undemocratic electoral system. I am therefore afraid that I do not think that that is a good way in which to approach anything.

The right hon. Member for Northavon (Sir J. Cope) quoted Chancellor Kohl and said that he thought that his attitude was changing. I had an hour with Chancellor Kohl on Monday night and saw absolutely no evidence of such a change. He was still very much convinced that the only sensible thing for the European countries to do was to come closer together. He could not understand the arguments for pulling the countries apart, creating difficulties and erecting barriers. He wanted barriers to be broken down.

I also had the opportunity to speak with others in the Federal Republic's political establishment and one thing that struck me forcefully was their desire to adhere to the economic and monetary union timetable. Personally, I share the views of some that it will not be possible to adhere to such a timetable for a variety of reasons, mainly because the criteria will probably not be met by a number of countries. Nevertheless, I was rebuked quite properly by the chairman of the Christian Democratic Union, who said that if I began by thinking that the timetable could not be met, it never would be met. I had to admit that that was perfectly good logic.

Sir John Cope: I apologise for interrupting the hon. Gentleman. A quotation of Chancellor Kohl—he has said similar things on other occasions—is repeated on page 4 of the White Paper, in which he says to the Bundestag:

> "We do not want a centralised European state that subsumes regional, national and cultural traditions or dismisses historical experience."

I do not think that he would have said such things a few years ago and that led me to make my remarks.

Sir Russell Johnston: With great respect, that is completely untrue. Kohl has been saying such things all along; that is his view of federalism. I remember him making a speech at Edinburgh university when he was given an honorary doctorate about six or seven years ago, in which he said that we would have unity in diversity, a federal, decentralised Europe—not a centralised Europe. Kohl has always believed that. It is strange—almost self-inflicted and blind—how many people consider federalism as if it were centralisation; it is not. We gave Germany a federal system because we wanted it to be decentralised. That is why it happened.

I shall conclude because I gather that there is some kind of pact between the two Front-Bench teams that they should deliver of their wisdom shortly. I would not want to prevent that. I shall make four quick points. We believe that qualified majority voting should be extended and that there will not be effective reform of the common agricultural policy, the environment and other matters unless it is. QMV will become even more important if there is enlargement.

Sir Teddy Taylor: Agriculture has majority voting already—now, today.

Sir Russell Johnston: Not in all cases.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Davis): I have checked it out and discovered that 98 per cent. of decisions on the CAP are taken by majority voting.

Sir Russell Johnston: I accept—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order.

Sir Russell Johnston: I accept that the majority of decisions are taken by QMV, but, still, some are not.

The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) said that he wanted the Visegrad countries to join the European Union as quickly as possible. That will be hellishly difficult. Poland, for example, with its textiles, steel and agriculture, could not be taken in before the common agriculture system was reformed. I do not see any great advantage in extending NATO at the moment if its consequence is to alarm Russia. That would not necessarily be a good thing.

Finally, one of the things that we shall have to do very soon is to reform the method of financing the Community. The Germans all said the same. Simply going on with the present system, including the British rebate, is unsatisfactory. We must develop a system that relates capacity to pay more directly to the contribution made. The Government would do us all a great service if they bent their mind in that direction.

Ms Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): I can assure the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) that, rather than there being some sinister pact, I expect to have the same amount of speaking time as he had. I congratulate the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on his good fortune in winning the ballot and on being able to introduce this subject—but I am not sure whether all his right hon. and hon. Friends will congratulate him in the same way. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) said, the debate is a curtain-raiser for our debate on the White Paper next week.

I was intrigued to hear whether the hon. Member for Ludlow would be pleased with the White Paper that was presented to the House yesterday. The fact that it appeared at all is something of a victory for the hon. Gentleman and his fellow Euro-rebels, because the Government did not originally want to produce a White Paper. None the less, I am sure that much in the document is a disappointment to him. Indeed, at times he described it as "modest" and said that it did not go far enough.

Later in the hon. Gentleman's speech, he seemed to recommend that, if the Minister did not get his way, and did not manage to go even further than the White Paper, he should walk out of the intergovernmental conference. The hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber talked about hidden agendas. There may be one behind the words "walk out"—that is, withdraw.

Sir Teddy Taylor indicated assent.

Ms Quin: The hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) obviously agrees with that hidden agenda. It has been behind much of what we have heard this morning.

The White Paper is a strange document, in that it alternates between positive and negative sentences. It is clearly designed to try to appeal to two very different audiences. Its schizophrenic approach is evident in the section that deals with the European Court of Justice. In paragraph 36 we read:

"The Government is committed to a strong independent Court without which it would be impossible to ensure even application of Community law, and to prevent abuse of power by the Community institutions."

At the same time, the White Paper makes an attempt to respond to some of the objections to the recent court decisions about which the hon. Member for Ludlow and his colleagues feel so strongly.

Mr. Marlow: The position is very straightforward. There are some things that Europe has agreed to do, on which the court should adjudicate, and there are some things that Europe has not agreed to do, concerning which the court has acquired powers to itself to make political decisions that should be made in Parliaments within the Union, not by the court. What the Government seek to do, in which we wish them success, is to ensure that the court concentrates on the areas with which it has the proper authority to deal.

Ms Quin: We feel that, in many the cases, some of which were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock, the court has acted properly. What is straightforward is the split within the Conservative party on the issue. There are some court judgments, whether made by national or by European courts, with which people agree and others with which they do not agree. The Government should be careful about what they propose, because they might end up with a worse situation.

In the White Paper the Government suggest that "a Member State should only be liable for damages in cases of serious and manifest breach of its obligations".

That could prove a hostage to fortune, because we want many other countries to abide by the obligations that they have entered into. The Government must think the problem through more carefully than they seem to have done so far. We have much to gain if other countries fulfil their obligations, especially on internal market matters.

Finally on the European Court, will the Minister confirm that, when he raised the question in the reflection group, he got no support from any other country? In that case, how does he expect to deliver on the attempts outlined in the White Paper?

One reason why Conservative Members do not like judgments by the European Court is the fact that many of them relate to social matters. Although in his statement yesterday the Foreign Secretary said that he would maintain the Government's commitment to the opt-out from the social chapter, which would not end during their no doubt short-lived existence, it is clear from what has been said, both by the hon. Member for Ludlow and by others in interjections, that the so-called Euro-rebels do not believe in the value of the opt-out. They clearly think that there are other ways, via other parts of the treaties, in which various social measures can be applied across the European Union.

Mr. Marlow: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Quin: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman again. I have already given way to him once, and I have little time left.

Mr. John Sykes (Scarborough): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Quin: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes), but this will be the last time.

Mr. Sykes: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way and indulging me. Is she aware that, in my constituency, there is a large company that could not afford to build a factory in France because of the social chapter and the minimum wage and that, as a result, it doubled its production in Scarborough? How would she answer that?

Ms Quin: By referring the hon. Gentleman to the speech recently made by President Chirac, in which he said that, these days, France is taking the lion's share of United States investment in the European Union. France is now second to the United Kingdom in terms of inward investment. That change has happened in recent years and it shows that, whatever the reasons are for inward investment going to particular countries, they have nothing to do with the social chapter.

That fact was confirmed to me by some of the Japanese firms that have invested in the United Kingdom. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to read the evidence given to the Employment Committee by the personnel director of Nissan, who said that the social chapter had no influence in its decision to invest in the United Kingdom.

Yesterday, the Foreign Secretary made a rather strange claim about subsidiarity, which I would like the Minister to address in his reply. We all agree that subsidiarity is a good principle, but yesterday the Foreign Secretary claimed that the United Kingdom had introduced that vital concept into the Maastricht treaty. My understanding is that that is not the case.

Subsidiarity already existed, under article 130S of the Single European Act. Treaty buffs will know that that is in the section of the Act that relates to the environment, which talks about working out which decisions should be taken at EU level and which should be taken at other levels. The concept of subsidiarity is not unique to the British Government and their approach to the European Union. Perhaps the Minister will say something about that.

The hon. Member for Ludlow and his Euro-rebel friends said that they wanted the power of the European Union to be cut. I have a feeling that the White Paper does not offer them anything like enough in terms of cuts in EU power. Perhaps the Minister could also address that point.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock rightly stressed the importance of the enlargement issue—something about which I feel strongly and passionately. Having encouraged the changes in central and eastern Europe, we have a moral, political and economic responsibility to make our relationships with the countries there a success, and to bring them into as close an arrangement for membership of the European Union as we can, as quickly as we can. Continued enlargement should not be regarded only as a problem, which it is often presented as being, but as an exciting opportunity.

There is not much vision in the White Paper. The Government mention enlargement, but not its exciting possibilities. They mention common agricultural policy reform, but express no specific ideas about the reforms they want. If they had suggested that we should reform the common agricultural policy to improve its impact on the environment and to try to make it more helpful to developing countries outside the European Union, that would have been welcome. The Government have blocked a welcome move to tackle the problem of racism and xenophobia at European level. We feel strongly about that omission.

The White Paper is a desperate attempt to please two different audiences. It is a thin document. Is will not win the Government friends in their party, in the country, or among our European partners.

I should like, finally, to refer the Minister to an article in the press this week by the former Foreign Secretary, Lord Howe. He said that the Government's approach to the European Union

"has engendered the view in European capitals that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to do serious business with the UK this side of the general election."

10.50 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. David Davis): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) on obtaining this debate, and at such an appropriate time. It will fall neatly between yesterday's statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary on the White Paper on the intergovernmental conference and the full debate on 21 March 1996.

Mr. Mackinlay: Only one day?

Mr. Davis: Yes. I do not have to debate the business of the House with the hon. Gentleman. I shall come to one or two of his points later.

I shall try to concentrate on points that were not covered yesterday and those made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow, and if we do not cover them all today perhaps we shall pick some up later.

I wish to dismiss almost out of hand the comments of the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin). They were a mixture of three not very desirable things. The first was ignorance. The White Paper was written in response to a request from three Select Committees, and the hon. Lady should have known that, especially as I told her in European Standing Committee B only the day before it was announced. Secondly, Labour policy is partly a lame shadowing of our policy when the Labour party is too afraid to have a view of its own. Thirdly, it is a pathetic wriggling on hooks—

Ms Quin: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Davis: No, I shall not. The hon. Lady has already taken enough time.

It is a pathetic wriggling on hooks that the Labour leader has impaled the hon. Lady on in moments of Europhoria.

On the social chapter, the hon. Lady took an intervention from my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes). She admitted that France was second, not first—we are first—in terms of inward investment. She should read some of the French press of recent weeks, such as Le Monde recognising for the first time that perhaps France should learn from the British model in generating employment. Perhaps she should have seen "The Money Programme" earlier this week, in which several German business leaders spoke about the need for Germany to adopt the British model of deregulation and employment creation.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) rose—

Mr. Randall rose—

Mr. Davis: I shall not give way.

Modern Europe is based on the concept of nation states. The nation state attracts the allegiance, affection and pride of its people. People's sense of identity derives principally from their sense of nationhood. Any democratically elected Government must base their policies on that clear political imperative and act first and foremost in the people's interest.

Our membership of the Union has delivered important benefits. From within the Union we have been able to lead the drive for a European market that is open internally and which we intend to open to the rest of the world. European Union membership has been crucial to attracting inward investment to this country. The European Union is a major force for peace and stability in Europe.

Mr. Mackinlay: That is right.

Mr. Davis: The hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) made some good points about that. It is in the context of the Union that we shall be able to heal the divisions of the cold war on our continent. The enlargement of the EU is an historic responsibility for Europe and a long-term British interest.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow is right that the Union will remain a force for prosperity and security only if it is a Union that people feel comfortable with. That means remaining truly a partnership of nations based on consent, freely given, of its members.

Mr. Randall: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Davis: No, I shall not. If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I have very little time to answer most of the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow.

No change should be brought about by dogmatic beliefs or zealous pursuit of some remote, unjustified or unaccountable centralism. If the need for change is not clearly demonstrated, change should be avoided. That is the basis on which we approach the IGC. The European Union should concentrate single-mindedly on what needs to be done at a European level and doing it well, and not interfering where it is not needed.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Will my hon. Friend give way on an important point?

Mr. Davis: If my hon. Friend is very fast.

Mr. Wilkinson: The Foreign Secretary rightly referred to President Santer's observation that the European Union should do "less but better". Cannot the British Government hasten that process by seeking to recuperate powers to this country at present undertaken by the European Union so that it can indeed do less?

Mr. Davis: I recommend that my hon. Friend reads the items on page 12 of the White Paper on limitation of powers and some passages about common fisheries. I shall discuss some of those points specifically later.

Mr. Randall: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Davis: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, I have five minutes to make several points.

Mr. Sheerman: The Minister just gave way to someone who just walked into the debate.

Mr. Davis: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) was here at the beginning of the debate.

Mr. Sheerman: Oh no he was not.

Mr. Davis: Oh yes he was. I shall continue my point, if I may, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Of course, many member states are still attracted to elements of a federal vision for Europe. We have heard that the Liberal party is also attracted to it. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow outlined the views of the Commission in that respect, and they are not a bad proxy for several of those member states, as is demonstrated by the Benelux position taken last week, so we obviously have something quite difficult to deal with.

We still encounter the school of thought that says that the answer to popular disenchantment with Europe is more Europe. That is reminiscent of the Socialist party in the 1980s, when it was beaten in the elections, saying that the answer was more socialism. That view was as wrong then as this view is for Europe now.

Our approach to the IGC, set out in the White paper, will have to contend with the committed federalist positions of many of our partners, so there is a hard pounding ahead in the negotiations, but I am not as pessimistic as my hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow about our chances of success. We have force of will on our side. We have a constructive and coherent approach, backed up by solid and convincing arguments. In many ways, the flow of events is on our side; that point should not be ignored.

Another factor is on our side. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Sir J. Cope) said in his excellent speech, all over Europe, people are expressing unease about the direction in which the European Union is going. Support for the Union is falling. It is our duty to stand up for those people, articulate their anxieties and develop constructive solutions to promote their and our interests.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood said that Mr. Santer had espoused a view of "less but better". That is an accurate description of what we want to do first.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow mentioned monetary union. That issue will not, or is unlikely to, come up at the intergovernmental conference. That does not mean that we shall be inactive on it. My hon. Friend witnessed the actions of the Prime Minister with respect to the ins and outs and the real problems that monetary union already poses to the single market.

I do not intend to intervene in my hon. Friend's correspondence with the Economic Secretary—I am sure that she can put the Government's case pretty well—but I say more generally that many of our fellow Europeans regard monetary union as a stepping stone to political union, and for that reason alone we must be hawk-eyed about it. A wide variety of people—such as Otmar Issing, who was mentioned by my hon. Friend, Ralf Dahrendorf and Bernard Connolly, for that matter—have expressed the view that EMU could break up Europe. Those people represent a wide spectrum of opinion, and there are many points of view in between, but that spectrum reinforces the wisdom of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's position in maintaining the opt-out for Britain while maintaining influence over the outcome of events. The range of possibilities is exactly why that is the right position to take.

I have only a minute to answer my hon. Friend's other points. At the beginning of this week, I had the pleasure of seeing him on television, asking, "Where's the beef?" in the White Paper. It was appropriate that he should ask that question. Afterwards, I went through his document—his green paper, as he called it. We drew up the policies in the White Paper in the course of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Time is up.

Fire Services

11 am

Mr. John Austin-Walker (Woolwich): I make no apology for this being the fourth occasion in as many weeks on which I have raised my concerns about the fire service. On previous occasions, those concerns were related to the situation in London. Today I wish to widen the debate in view of the fears expressed by other hon. Members about the situation in their constituencies.

We now seem to be embroiled in an annual ritual fight over budgets for fire brigades: a fight to save fire stations, to save fire engines on the road, to save firefighters' jobs and, ultimately, to save lives. Implementation of the proposed fire service cuts will cost lives that the firefighters are there to protect and also the lives of firefighters themselves.

Earlier this year, hon. Members received a letter from Dennis Davies, president of the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association, in which he stated:

"The fire service is facing a serious financial situation which needs to be remedied if it is not to create major operational difficulties."

Mr. Davies, who is chief fire officer for Cheshire, said that current expenditure in real terms on the fire service exceeds formal allocations, as expressed in the revenue support grant, by about £80 million. He said in his letter:

"To date the service, locally managed through Fire Authorities although substantially centrally funded, has sought to keep its quality by internal changes and innovation."

He added, however, that a crisis had been averted in many cases because

"local government has consistently placed Fire higher in the list of local service priorities, often to the detriment of other services."

The Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope), agreed with that point when he said in a reply to the hon. Member for South Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer) that

"a shire county is not limited in its spending on its fire brigade by the fire service share of its SSA. What matters is the overall SSA for the county council. It is for the county council to decide its priorities for spending across all its services."—[Official Report, 29 November 1995; Vol. 267, c. 1175.]

So there we have it from the mouth of the Minister. Fire cover can be maintained in the shire counties, despite underfunding, by cuts in education or social services. The hon. Members for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) and for South Worcestershire were rightly concerned about the possible risks to their areas from the proposed closures of Beudley and Pebworth, the halving of staffing at Kidderminster, the reduction in the number of appliances and the removal of a hydraulic platform.

Principal fire officers have instituted countless reviews and embraced many new ideas. The Audit Commission has also conducted an in-depth review. It is now estimated that that review will result in only £7 million savings from improved performance, whereas the initial optimistic forecast was for £67 million. Either figure would leave the service with a substantial shortfall.

I share Mr. Davies's concern that, despite routine local reporting of fire service difficulties and the generally held belief that our communities should be safe, the fire service predicament has not yet reached the national consciousness and we have not yet had a national debate. I hope that today's debate will lead to a full national debate.

Fire services have a responsibility to comply with operational standards set by the Home Office. Increasingly, however, performance to minimum standards—measured, in the case of the fire service, by speed of attendance at the scene of a fire—has become the acceptable quality standard. Attendance times are important—they can mean the difference between life and death—but as the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association said,

"achieving a fast arrival is just the beginning of our task."

What real value is there in the fast arrival of an ill-equipped or ill-trained fire crew?

The current situation—and this trend is accelerating—is that the absolute need to ensure a fast response is taking money from training, vehicle replacements, equipment purchases and public education and prevention programmes. The association has warned that the fire service—which needs technical development to meet more complex hazards, with better information systems and personal protection—is short of basic capital investment, that new skills training is stagnating when it should be growing and that research into better options for public protection is slowing down.

Last month, firefighters from Tyne and Wear came to Parliament to spell out the consequences of the £2.3 million shortfall in their 1996-97 budget to hon. Members.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for mentioning Tyne and Wear. As I believe he knows, we are faced with losing, through natural wastage, 92 front-line firefighters. That is bound to have an impact on a service which has always received the auditors' approval for its cost-effectiveness.

Mr. Austin-Walker: I certainly take that point. The loss of 92 firefighters' jobs and the loss of five firefighting appliances in my hon. Friend's area will obviously affect public safety.

Mr. Mullin: It is seven appliances.

Mr. Austin-Walker: I stand corrected. Those losses are happening in an area in which three members of the public died in a fire after a fire station less than one minute from their home had been closed.

The problem does not exist only in urban and inner-city areas. In Scotland, many rural areas may be left to burn when stations in Balmoral, Gordonstoun, Rothes, Cullen, Banff and Kintore are closed. When a firefighter lost his foot, the fire authority concerned was criticised by the court for inadequate training; yet the current funding levels will mean further cuts in training for firefighters.

The Government's approach to the fire service has been typical of their approach to all public services: they want to know the cost of everything but recognise the value of nothing. The Fire Service college is a case in point. That former centre of excellence and one time world leader has been reduced to agency status, and profit rather than professionalism has become the priority. Throughout Britain, firefighter training has been restricted as a result of understaffing and underfunding, and many brigades can no longer afford to send staff to the Fire Service college.

The key issue is insufficient total funding of the fire service, and the situation is bound to worsen due to the effects of the pensions time bomb. Eighteen months ago, in the debate on the Queen's Speech, I drew the Minister's attention to the problem facing the London fire authority and warned that unless that problem was dealt with, there was a

"real prospect that we face dramatic cuts in the cover provided by fire and civil defence authorities in the next financial year."—[Official Report, 18 November 1994; Vol. 250, c. 293.]

In the debate on 9 February this year, I pointed out that in London the fire authority is already devoting 19 per cent. of its budget to pensions. I further stated:

"The estimate of the pension requirements in 1996-97 is £45 million. The calculation in the SSA is £41 million—a difference of £4 million".—[Official Report, 9 February 1996; Vol. 271, c. 630.]

Nationally, it is estimated that in 10 years' time employers' contributions to the pension fund will absorb 25 per cent. of total fire service revenue expenditure. In London, the 25 per cent. level will be reached by the year 2002 or 2003. Throughout the country, the result of the Government's financial settlement will be a loss of hundreds of operational posts and a virtual freeze on recruitment. That will inevitably exacerbate the pension problems as fewer firefighters will be contributing to the pensions of more retired firefighters.

The Minister tells us that authorities have reserves or that further savings can be made, but it has already been shown that the efficiency savings identified by the Audit Commission are more likely to yield only £7 million rather than the £67 million hoped for by the Government. Services have already been pared to the bone. The Government claim that that is political posturing by Ken Cameron and the Fire Brigades Union, or by Councillor Tony Ritchie of the London fire authority, but the truth is that anyone who knows anything about the fire services holds the same view.

Mr. Clarkson, the previous chief fire officer for London, is on record as having said that he had already cut the service to the bone and that there was no more room for cuts. He is not a member of the Fire Brigades Union, and he is certainly not a member of the Labour party. It was revealed by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) in a debate on 1 February that Mr. Clarkson is in fact a Conservative nominee for the police committee in Kent.

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): Does my hon. Friend agree that the loss of 15 fire appliances from the capital is particularly absurd at a time of threats of disruption from bombs and that it is particularly inappropriate that as we develop the site for the millennium festival in Greenwich the two stations next to that site are to lose fire appliances? Does he further agree that Londoners would prefer to pay 4p per week and feel secure in the knowledge that they have a good fire service rather than face the cuts imposed by the Government?

Mr. Austin-Walker: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am intimately concerned about Greenwich, which is in a neighbouring constituency. It is true that East Greenwich fire station, which is east of the millennium site, is to lose an appliance, as is Deptford fire station, to the west of the site, which is eventually scheduled for closure. That problem in London must be addressed.

The major difficulties faced by the fire authorities stem from the local government settlement for the current year and the next. Last year's settlement, which was generally accepted to be one of the most difficult on record, meant a planned overall increase of 3.3 per cent. in public expenditure, whereas most local authorities were required to manage budget increases limited to 0.5 per cent. No increase in provision was made for the fire service and the spending caps remained screwed down. The 1996-97 settlement shows little change, with an increase of just 1.5 per cent.

I accept that the SSA formula now includes a pensions element, but that is not the same as injecting additional money to cover costs. Nationally, the settlement for 1996-97 represents a cut in real terms of £70 million. That is the shortfall between actual budgets and the settlement. In London, that means a gap of £7 million. The 1995-96 budget of £258 million would need to be increased to £266 million to maintain current levels of service—a service already "cut to the bone", in the words of a former chief officer.

Some rather over-enthusiastic prospective Conservative parliamentary candidates in London, worried by the growing tide of public anger at threats to their fire stations, swallowed whole the propaganda from Tory central office. Those candidates were ready to rush into print in their local newspapers to say that it was all the fault of a wicked plan by a Labour-controlled authority which could not manage its finances. If only, instead of relying on the provenly unreliable central office machine, they had consulted their own Tory colleagues on the London fire authority. They should have read the letter, jointly signed by the leader of that authority, the leader of the Conservative group, Councillor Adrian Fitzgerald and the leader of the Liberals, Councillor Rowlands. If those candidates had consulted Tory councillors on that authority, they would have realised that the statements made by Baroness Blatch in her letter to hon. Members were at best misleading and that the document from Tory central office was a total distortion of the facts.

I regret that the SSA formula does not measure real fire cover needs. It is important to consider risk categorisation. Attendance times—and hence resources—are based on that categorisation. I welcome the comments of the Audit Commission in its report of last year, "In the Line of Fire". The categorisation of risk dates back to the days when insurance companies ran the fire service and graded their risks on the basis of property liability and not the saving of lives.

Many modern buildings incorporate sophisticated fire prevention and detection features, something which is absent from most inner-city and urban homes. It is in densely populated urban areas, however, that most deaths occur. Under the Government's categorisation of risk, most urban areas of terraced, detached and semi-detached housing and blocks of flats are categorised as C risk. That means that one fire engine should be sent to arrive at a fire within eight to 10 minutes. I believe that the current level of service in London is appropriate. The fire authority treats a domestic fire in a C risk area as one in a B risk area, where policy dictates that two appliances should be sent—one to arrive within five minutes and the second within eight minutes. There have been countless instances in London in which the lives of members of the public and of firefighters would have been lost if just one appliance had been sent to a house fire and arrived within 10 minutes. In some of the outer areas of London, including parts of my constituency, properties are categorised as D risk—which means that one fire appliance is sent, to arrive within 20 minutes. Thankfully, it is the policy of the London fire authority, supported by Conservative councillors on that authority, to send two appliances to any house fire.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for his comprehensive account. Can he tell me whether an arrival time of 20 minutes is sanctioned by the Home Office?

Mr. Austin-Walker: I regret to say that it is.

The Minister of State replied to my Adjournment debate on the fire service on 9 February and the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), replied to a debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East on 1 February. Both Ministers said that the London fire authority could make cuts and still meet the Home Office's recommended attendance times, and they were probably telling the truth. The Under-Secretary of State quoted the authority's report, which said that the reductions could be made "without affecting the Authority's ability to meet Home Office recommended times."

What Ministers did not admit, however, is that that guarantee represents a dramatic reduction in service. Following the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), I ask the Minister whether he thinks it reasonable that a fire in a flat on the Glyndon estate in Plumstead should be responded to by one fire engine, arriving in 10 minutes, without any further back-up. If he does, I must tell him that lives will be lost. The later an appliance reaches the scene of a fire, the greater the risk to the building and to any occupants, and the later a firefighter arrives, the greater the risk to him or her from flames, suffocation or falling debris—as in the case of Fleur Lombard.

Cheshire's chief fire officer makes the point that fast arrival is just the beginning; what then comes into play is the equipment, the back-up and the fact that the crews are well trained. A fire dealt with at its inception is much easier to extinguish than one that has taken hold. That makes sense financially, too, as resources are tied up for less time, allowing other incidents to be dealt with. If the fire gets worse before an engine arrives, the crew will be there much longer and will be unable to respond to other calls. If a crew turns up and there are people to be rescued, it can usually rely on the second crew to do resuscitation and first aid. The first few minutes are vital.

The health and safety of crews is also at risk when just one appliance is used and approved procedures have to be ignored. Imagine a fire on the 20th floor of one of the blocks on the Glyndon estate. The five firefighters have to take into the building two lengths of hose, two sets of breathing apparatus, one branch, one adaptor, one breathing apparatus control board, one dividing breach, one radio, breaking-in gear, a first aid kit, one or two axes and a resuscitator. The officer in charge must stay downstairs to implement command and control; the driver operates the pump to ensure that the water gets upstairs and another firefighter will set in the hydrant and dry riser to allow the passage of water. That leaves two firefighters to carry all that equipment. There is no breathing control officer and no one to carry out first aid.

Such is the result of a one-appliance response, with which the Minister seems quite content. Does he believe that a one-appliance response within 10 minutes is adequate in such a situation? That is, after all, the Home Office minimum standard. Minimum standards should be a safeguard for the public. Instead, those standards are being used as a lever to cut spending. As the screw tightens, either the service copes, but at a cost in terms of quality, reliability and morale—the lowering of any one of which puts lives at risk—or a major disaster occurs. It has not yet happened on a large scale, but any fire officer can cite one example after another of instances in which the outcome could have been disastrous. Every turn of the screw brings us closer to that disaster.

In the debate on 9 February, I compared two incidents in Woolwich. One took place when Shooters hill fire station had two appliances, and the other when it had one. In the first, four people in Rowton road were saved. In the second, in Llanover road, four people died; I do not claim that they would have survived if two appliances had been available, but it remains in the minds of everyone involved in that incident that a second appliance might have made all the difference.

As I have said, some parts of Woolwich are categorised as D risk. The Minister believes that it is reasonable for a fire in property there to be dealt with by one engine, arriving within 20 minutes. Thank goodness a Labour councillor and not the Minister is in charge of the London fire authority.

I speak with experience of London, but there is a nationwide crisis. In Greater Manchester, budget reductions have averaged £1 million a year over the past two years. Vacant fire safety officer posts have remained unfilled and repair and maintenance work has been reduced. Tyne and Wear has had to take off two front-line fire appliances and suspend its safety education programme. West Midlands has had a £4.6 million budget cut, with major cuts in training and no capital available for replacement fire stations. South Yorkshire has a shortfall of more than £1 million and the district auditor has warned that reserves are at the minimum acceptable level, so there is no possibility of their being available to help support the budget in future years.

The crisis is not only in London and the metropolitan areas; it is nationwide. I could give endless examples of cuts in services being made by brigades in county areas. In the home counties, there will be no minor works, no provision for information technology or for fire safety work as set out in the Audit Commission report, and 50 per cent. cuts in training at the Fire Service college. In the north-west, there are no resources for hazard management to deal with chemical spills and fires, and fire safety officer inspections have been reduced.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston): In my constituency in the north-west, there is a category A fire risk in close proximity to Victorian housing. Does my hon. Friend agree, given such situations, that the cuts—which are spread across the country as he has described—typify the way in which the Government are mismanaging the situation? If we do not do something about that as a matter of urgency, the "What happens if . . ." question that arose from the Associated Octel fire last year will hit us very seriously.

Mr. Austin-Walker: I share my hon. Friend's concerns. I know that the Cheshire area has several establishments which use hazardous industrial processes and chemicals. I agree about the potential danger, which I shall come to because there are some risks with which fire authorities have to deal for which there is no adequate recompense or any funding arrangement. They include dealing with spillages of hazardous chemicals. Fire brigades are effectively funded only to deal with fire operations.

In the south-west, there have been reductions in essential training and community fire safety units have been abolished. I mentioned earlier the cuts in Scotland. The list goes on and on, and it makes depressing reading.

Capital funds are an essential part of fire service development. I live in Thamesmead, a new town built on the Thames marshes. No additional fire cover has been provided for it, although a dedicated fire station was once promised. When I complained, Baroness Blatch replied that it was nothing to do with her but a matter for the authority—yet she controls the authority's capital expenditure.

For the London fire authority, the basic credit approval for 1996-97 has been set at £5.5 million—£3 million less than for the current year—nearly halving the authority's capital programme so that it is unable to sustain the level of investment needed in vehicles and equipment without reductions in appliances or crews. On Merseyside, the credit approval is £2.1 million against a requirement of £3.5 million. The money available for vehicles is less than a third of what is required.

If we take the figures for all fire and civil defence authorities, basic credit approvals have been cut from £23 million in the current year to £15 million in the coming year—a decrease of almost 35 per cent. for Greater Manchester, Merseyside, South Yorkshire, Tyne and Wear, West Midlands, West Yorkshire and London.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): What my hon. Friend describes is common in north Wales. We have had a major cut in the capital programme. On top of all that, local government reorganisation has reduced the number of fire services from eight to three and created additional difficulties that have not been recognised by the Government.

Mr. Austin-Walker: My hon. Friend points to the fact that several factors are not fully taken into account in calculating a fire authority's spending needs. They are certainly not adequately taken into account in the standard spending assessment.

I shall briefly describe the background to the cuts. In the 10 years from 1983 to 1993-94, the operational establishment in fire services in Great Britain went down from 40,000 to 39,438, while fire calls rose by 28 per cent. and false alarms rose by 116 per cent. Calls for special services went up by a staggering 82 per cent. Special services include attending road traffic accidents and releasing trapped people; releasing people trapped in lifts; dealing with spillages of hazardous chemicals; pumping flood water out of premises and similar services. However—wait for it—the Government do not take account of any of those services in deciding funding for fire authorities. In London, the number of such incidents, at more than 61,000 a year, exceeds the number of fire calls, excluding false alarms. No wonder Mr. Davies of the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association said:

[Mr. Austin-Walker]

"Fire service funding would be a farce if it wasn't so serious. The Standard Spending Assessment is worse than the National Lottery—at least there, somebody wins."

Most people would be surprised—I suspect that some hon. Members are surprised—to learn that the fire service receives no funding for turning out to road traffic accidents or rail crashes. There is no funding and no obligation to assist. Nevertheless, the fire brigades turn out, as we expect them to. That part of their work has grown by 82 per cent. since 1983. Is it not time that the Minister recognised that in the funding formula?

I hear that some brigades may be planning to charge victims of road accidents for cutting them out of vehicles. Will they ask to see our credit cards before rescuing us—"Yes, that'll do nicely sir"? I also hear that some brigades are contemplating setting up driving schools as a nice little earner to boost their inadequate budgets.

Recently, we mourned the deaths of three firefighters. On 6 February, the Prime Minister referred to "the selfless bravery of the fire service."—[Official Report, 6 February 1996; Vol. 271, c. 133.]

Why, then, do the Government refuse to fund this selfless service? It is intolerable that it should take the tragic deaths of courageous public servants to draw attention to the dire state to which the fire service is being reduced. As the Fire Brigades Union has said:

"how many firefighters and members of the public must continue to die as a result of fires and fire related incidents before the parliamentarians that represent the people of the UK will in fact listen to us. If such views are unpalatable to some, then that is a reality that they must come to terms with, the FBU only relates the experiences and concerns of firefighters.

Must we really, as a nation that has led the world in so many areas of excellence and endeavour, enter the next millennium and the 21st century on the basis that only disaster and significant casualty and fatality figures or losses arising from such occurrences are necessary to even spur the policy makers into considering what might be done to protect us all collectively from such circumstances?"

The answer must be no. The Government must think again and we must have this national debate now.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): It is obvious that a large number of hon. Members wish to speak. I make a plea for short speeches.

11.27 am

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) on winning this important debate, which I am pleased to be able to participate in, especially as a London Member. He is a London Member who has spoken before on the subject regarding London, but this morning he has given the House the opportunity to debate the fire services in the rest of the country. I shall concentrate on London.

Congratulating the hon. Gentleman on getting the debate and choosing this subject is about the last compliment that I shall have for him. The hon. Gentleman has given us a tour d'horizon of the fire services and the arguments that many of us have heard before from representatives of the Fire Brigades Union in our constituencies. I wonder, with all his hopes and wishes, whether his speech has been looked over by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). There were considerable cost implications in what he said. I imagine that the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope), will have something to say about that and that our colleagues in the Treasury will examine closely what Labour Members have said about the fire services. Costs are vital in every area of government and of public service, and the fire service must be subject to rules of efficiency. The hon. Member for Woolwich said that the Audit Commission's assessment of savings of £67 million in the fire service across the country is on the high side—a fact that he claims the Audit Commission now acknowledges. I have not seen any documentation to that effect, but, if about £67 million in efficiency savings can be achieved across the nation, presumably we are talking about possible efficiency savings of £12 million to £15 million in the London fire service. The Audit Commission suggested efficiency savings in a number of areas.

I turn now to the specific arguments regarding the London fire service. I praise the bravery of the fire service and the enormous skills of the front-line firefighters in our capital city. I am sure that everyone agrees that London has a fine fire service, which is well above the minimum standards laid down by the Home Office in terms of fire appliances and fire stations.

Therefore, I was amazed when I heard that the London fire authority was considering closing four fire stations and reducing the number of fire appliances in London. According to figures provided by the fire authority, it has substantial reserves totalling £27 million. Its standard spending assessment has increased this year and the level of the cap has also increased by £5 million.

Ms Hodge: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has managed to praise the London fire service. Does he agree that, if the fire service in London is funded by eating into reserves, those reserves will vanish by 1998-99? Does he agree also—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Only one point should be raised by way of intervention.

Ms Hodge: The two matters are linked.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should recognise that it is a tradition of the House that interventions deal with a single subject.

Mr. Tracey: As she also represents a London constituency, the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) may wish to catch your eye to speak in the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

We are talking about £27 million in reserves for the London fire authority. I understand that the Birmingham fire authority has only £2 million in reserve, so reserves of £27 million are far and away above the level required. The hon. Lady has led a local authority—we all have views about it—and she must recognise that £27 million is an enormous sum. At the beginning of the year, the director of finance for the London fire authority said that the reserves were too high and should be reduced. He revealed also that the fire authority underspent by £3.7 million last year. What possible reason could it have for threatening to close four fire stations and reduce the number of fire appliances—two of them in Twickenham and in Wimbledon close to my constituency? Naturally, I deplore such plans.

A remarkable thing then occurred. Hon. Members and the London local authorities complained about the plans previewed by the London fire authority. Quite mysteriously, about a week before it was to meet to decide on the budget cuts, we heard that a Labour party caucus meeting somewhere in London had decided that the four fire stations would not close and that several fire appliances would not be removed. Councillor Ritchie, the Labour leader of the predominantly Labour-controlled London fire authority, then announced to the nation what had been decided in the Labour party caucus meeting. That is a disgraceful way to run the fire service in the capital.

We have heard much about the level of protection needed for the millennium celebrations in Greenwich and the protection necessary for the great stores, Government buildings and our built heritage in central London. Fire safety has been undermined by the disgraceful actions of the fire authority which, after scaremongering and politicking, reached a decision in a Labour party caucus meeting and announced its decision via a press release.

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): Is my hon. Friend aware that 22 Labour councillors, six Conservatives and one independent serve on the London fire and civil defence authority? In addition to the funding that the authority has put aside and its underspend, the Audit Commission conducted an inquiry and found that the authority's training methods and its expenditure were above the level requested by the commission. As a consequence, is my hon. Friend aware—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have made it clear that interventions should comprise a short question and not a speech.

Mr. Tracey: I am well aware of the situation that my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) describes. He has been at the forefront of the campaign against the disgraceful cuts which would have reduced the number of appliances in his area.

I shall draw my remarks to a close as I have highlighted my anger upon hearing about the nonsensical actions of the predominantly Labour-controlled fire authority. Its behaviour has mirrored that of Labour local authorities around the country. There is no basis for the authority's assertions. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon) has tried for three weeks to get details from the fire authority about why it suddenly reversed its decision to close four fire stations and reduce the number of fire appliances. Perhaps he will catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and explain the situation.

I believe that the London fire authority has engaged in a particularly squalid exercise. The final straw was Councillor Ritchie's announcement that the London fire authority intends to increase overseas travel allowances—heaven knows why—by £5,800 and to increase members' expenses by £43,200. That shows what the London fire authority is made of.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Shortly after I became a Member of Parliament, I was holidaying in the former Yugoslavia when a charter plane crashed. Many British people died in the accident and those who survived suffered appalling burns. I spent four days with my doctor husband in the hospitals that were treating the victims, and the sights, sounds and smells of what fire can do to human beings will remain with me for the rest of my life.

Therefore, when I learnt that the Cheshire chief fire officer was saying, in an extremely responsible way, that the fire service was now at a considerable risk of not being able to provide adequate and proper fire cover, I took it seriously. I took this issue seriously—not like some hon. Members who seem to think that it is a suitable subject for squalid party political arguments—because there are men and women in the fire service who daily risk their lives and considerable injury. They have a strong belief that our constituents are entitled to high-quality fire services and protection.

It is important to take seriously what the Cheshire chief fire officer is saying. He has looked at the cuts—not one set of cuts but a series of cuts across the budgets over a number of years—and has concluded on behalf of the Cheshire fire service, and many fire services across the country, that one can no longer seriously talk about providing the level of cover that is essential. He has not said that the fire services cannot respond to an external audit that says that there should be some efficiency savings and a rearrangement in the way in which they work.

The chief fire officer has said something more fundamental: that we have now undergone a series of changes, we are still undergoing a series of changes and we are no longer able to provide the level of care that the general public are entitled to assume we will provide. That is the issue—it is an argument about not the political views of individual fire committees, but whether the House of Commons will face up to the fact that we are not allowing sufficient money for the fire service to do the job for which it is retained. That seems to me to be so essential and simple, and I cannot see why it is difficult for hon. Members to understand it.

The Cheshire chief fire officer said—I am talking about Cheshire, but what I am saying applies to many brigades:

"Our study indicates that the Brigade is very efficient. The Brigade has been required to make significant savings in each of the last three years, in 1994/95 these amounted to £195,000".

He continued:

"One of the best indicators of the overall cost effectiveness of a brigade is its gross cost per pump. Other statistics may provide an indication of the efficiency . . . but the gross cost per pump, when compared to benchmark figures, gives an indication of the likely savings".

He then details the figures, which prove time and time again that the fire service is doing a good job. The Cheshire chief fire officer has also given me the effects of the underfunding over these years, including capital costs. It has meant a cut in operational officer cover, a reduction in managerial posts, changes to staffing practices at shift changeover and bank holidays, a reduction in rescue tender provision, a rationalisation of special appliance provision—I could go on. In capital costs, it means that equipment is not being replaced, that modern equipment that is available to save lives is not being supplied and that there are real problems in finding the money for core training for officers.

I shall briefly say what I think of a Government who allow an important service like the Fire Service college to be treated in that shabby way. The Government have seen fit to write off the debts of innumerable companies when they want to sell them on the private market. The Government have no difficulty whatsoever in writing off billions of pounds of taxpayers' money, but when the fire college was set up as an independent agency, it was lumbered with considerable debts and was told to recover them from the fees that it charges.

The result is terribly simple and plain: throughout the United Kingdom, fire services are not sending the same number of fire officers for core training, which their chief fire officers believe to be essential, because of the cost. Such training is down by 25 per cent. Fire officers in need of proper training are not receiving it, not because no one accepts the need for it but because they cannot pay for it. That is a simple formula. What will it lead to? It will lead to death, to injury and to lifetimes of unhappiness for our constituents who are caught in major fires. It is unacceptable for a so-called civilised country to have got its priorities so badly wrong.

I have listened with care to the various debates as to whether the money is available. Is it not astonishing that when the Government want to spend a great deal of money on arms, they can find however much money they want? However, when we want to find money to provide a high-quality fire service—to protect our constituents, to carry out the training programmes that fire services are increasingly doing and to teach small children what to do if a fire breaks out—it is not available. That is despicable and unacceptable.

If this debate awakens in the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Leeds, North-East (Mr. Kirkhope), even a tiny voice of conscience, it will have achieved more than what my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker), who introduced the debate, set out to achieve.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I am delighted to have the opportunity to take part in the debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) on securing the debate and I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). She has given me an ideal introduction to the debate, because I want to say a few brief words about the Fire Service college at Moreton-in-Marsh, which is in the heart of my constituency. The college employs 250 of my constituents in a rural area. It is a national asset.

I shall briefly describe the college to hon. Members. It comprises 500 acres of an old airfield. It has magnificent facilities: a mock motorway, so that it can stage mock pile-ups; an office block, so that it can stage fires in a three-storey office block; and an entire mock ship, so that it can stage fires on it. The college teaches British firemen with the best facilities and training in the world. The college has excellent information technology laboratories and it has the national fire service chapel. It is an absolute gem—it is a national asset. We should be able to train British firemen to the highest standards at the college, and market its services to the rest of the world because there is nothing else like it, except in the United States.

I have had discussions with Baroness Blatch about the future of the college. It was set up as an independent trading fund in 1992 and it has consistently been making a loss. In case any hon. Member jumps to the conclusion that it is being run inefficiently, I emphasise that that could not be further from the truth. The college was set up as an independent trading fund on 1 April 1992, and it was the first such independent trading fund to be set up by the Government. Unfortunately, the Treasury had eyes on a milch cow that was non-existent and it set it up with several severe disadvantages, which I shall outline to hon. Members.

When the Treasury set up the Fire Service college, it made it honour its commitment to prices of courses before it was set up as a trading fund. That reduced the college's profit in its first year of trading by £1.2 million. Much more importantly, a valuation of the college was carried out by a well-known firm of chartered surveyors at £33 million. Being a chartered surveyor, I hesitate to criticise a fellow firm of surveyors. However, I am reliably informed that that was a gross overestimate of the valuation of the college at that time and that it should have been less than £10 million. The problem is that, because of that trading fund status, the college is obliged to pay notional interest on half the loan because half of it is deemed public interest capital, and the notional loan in the accounts this year amounts to £1.7 million.

The college is thirdly disadvantaged by a further £1.25 million as a result of a decision last year by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise that the college has to pay VAT but cannot reclaim it. The notional interest, and the fact that it cannot reclaim VAT, amounts to about £2.5 million. Last year, it made a loss of £2.75 million. The chief executive, Nigel Finlayson, and the commandant, Mr. David, do an excellent job, but it is tremendously dispiriting to be saddled with such on-costs about which nothing can be done.

I have had discussions with Baroness Blatch to see what can be done to secure the college's future. I have been trying to encourage other Government organisations to place their training at the college, most notably the Ministry of Defence. However, I have received a reply from the MOD saying that it is not prepared to commit its training requirements to the national Fire Service college while there is a question mark over its future.

The chief executive goes all over the world. I pay tremendous tribute to him because he increased the non-UK training budget last year by more than 10 per cent. He is doing a magnificent job, but he has one hand tied behind his back when the accounts for the past three years show that the college has been making a loss of more than £2 million.

I do not want to take up too much of the debate, but I suggest three courses of action to the noble Baroness in order to secure the college's future. First, as has already been mentioned by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich, the Government should, having set up the college as a trading fund on the wrong basis, now write off all past debts and notional interest rates, allowing it to start with a clean sheet so that we can see whether it is run efficiently.

If the Government are not prepared to do that, they should consider—I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will take these concerns back to Baroness Blatch—allowing the college to revert to the former Home Office vote. The college should be run directly from the Home Office and everybody should accept that the college will make a loss of about £2.5 million a year.

If neither of those two alternatives is acceptable, the college should be sold off to an entrepreneur, with appropriate safeguards for training the UK fire service, with a remit to go out into the world and obtain as much non-UK fire service business as possible. It should then be required to make a profit. The Government would benefit from the sale of the college and the people running it would not have the burdens around their necks.

As has already been mentioned this morning, there is considerable concern about the adequacy of the training of UK firemen. At the moment, the college provides just over 16,000 man days of fire training. But there is great concern that, with the squeeze on the SSAs of each fire authority, that figure may drop to 14,000. If that happens, the college will make a substantially bigger loss next year, and that will not be caused by the college's inefficiency in organising itself.

It would be a tragedy if this national asset were to be let go. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to take those concerns back to Baroness Blatch. I have written her a detailed letter, to which I have yet to receive a reply. However, I reassure the Government that I shall continue to battle for the future of the college because it is a national asset.

Mr. Chris Davies (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I do not agree with everything that the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) said; none the less, his speech was like a breath of fresh air coming through the smoke compared with some earlier contributions. I feared that the debate would deteriorate into a Conservative and Labour battleground over the particular problems in London. I hope that that will not happen, because the problems affecting the fire service concern hon. Members on both sides of the House and are of great concern to our constituents.

We know from the remarks addressed to us all by Mr. Davies, the president of the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association, of his concern that, across the country, the fire service is, in effect, facing death by a thousand cuts—the gradual erosion of standards which is taking place year by year, yet is going largely unnoticed in the communities in the areas served by local fire brigades.

As has been said before, in Greater Manchester cuts of £1 million a year have been the fate of the local fire service during the past couple of years. Towards the end of last summer, I had the opportunity to visit firefighters in Oldham and Littleborough, serving my constituency, and to learn at first hand just how our firefighters spend their time. They had just finished a period which had seen some of the most intensive use of fire tenders and fire crews for many years, with a spate of moorland and heath fires in other parts of the country which had stretched their resources to the limit and beyond. Retired firefighters had to be called in to eke out the resources at that time.

General concern was expressed at both those fire stations that the squeeze on finance was likely to reduce the number of tenders available in their stations if a major incident took place across a wide area. There was also concern that access to the most modern equipment being developed by the fire brigade would be denied to them and they would have to make do with equipment which, while good in its day, would not meet the most modern requirements, placing the lives of firefighters at risk.

It is obvious that the vast majority of a firefighter's time is not spent fighting fires. It is spent in training, in maintaining equipment and in dealing with false alarms. Some 40 per cent. of incidents are cited as false alarms and, in practice, I suspect that that number is growing rapidly. The introduction of smoke alarms has been a major asset in saving lives in the home, but they have led to many additional call-outs for fire crews.

The fact that firefighting crews are not fighting fires does not mean that their time is not being spent usefully or that it is being wasted. They have to be equipped to deal with emergencies as and when they occur. They do not occur neatly, as a Government accountant might require them so to do.

When the bell rings in a fire station, the officer taking the call cannot know whether it will be a false alarm or will lead to tenders being sent out to deal with a life-threatening major fire or a major incident on a motorway in which a driver has to be cut out of the wreckage of a crashed vehicle. He cannot know whether it will prove to be a major city centre incident, perhaps the result of a terrorist outrage, something to which we have been alerted recently, requiring fire crews from across the county to meet the needs that arise. The service must be equipped to deal with those worst case scenarios.

Sadly, I fear that that is not the approach being taken by the Government. They seem to require brigade officers to use their equipment and resources as efficiently and effectively as possible. That, of course, is right, but the mechanism that they are using is the crude one of spending cuts requiring officers to face up to a crisis and to adjust to it accordingly.

The basic assumption for planning purposes is not the need to meet the worst case scenarios, but the need to deal with the average demands being placed on the service. That approach, which might be admirable if applied to an efficient quality manufacturing industry, is not appropriate to a fire service which has to meet the needs of people in situations which cannot be predicted. When the call comes, our firefighters need to be equipped and ready. The Government must address their concerns and ensure that they have the resources to meet the requirements placed on them and to maintain the confidence that the public rightly feel in the fire service.

I apologise to the House for the fact that I will not be able to stay to hear the end of the debate. I shall finish my remarks and allow other hon. Members to speak, but I wish to remind the House of the remarks made by Mr. Davies in the letter that was circulated to all hon. Members. He said that "delay is not acceptable" because it is "dangerous to firefighters". The House should accept that the cuts in expenditure are threatening a quality public service of which we can be proud, and they must be halted.

11.59 am

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I wish to take only two minutes of the time of the House. Although the debate has given a general impression of the fire service, it has centred almost entirely on the London scene and I was quite surprised to learn that there was a deposit account for the London fire service of £27 million. That may have made the authority change its mind when it considered closing down four stations, but in Hampshire it is a totally different story.

[Mr. James Hill]

The fire service in Hampshire is very efficient and modern in its approach. All the observations that my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) made about the training college in his area are duplicated in Hampshire.

There can be no doubt that cost is the issue. People in all grades of society are worried about cost and maximum efficiency. The way to get the message over is to ask the fire service to do the tasks and, if it cannot, exceptions can be made. The plan of Baroness Blatch and her colleague is to meet groups of Members of Parliament. All the Hampshire Members of Parliament have been given the opportunity to meet Baroness Blatch, and instead of all the argy-bargy and semi-political chitchat that some hon. Members have raised in the debate, we can have a balanced debate about the pros and cons. I am sure that, after meeting the Ministers, the Hampshire Members will put forward a formula that could carry the day.

Thank you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that the debate has been extremely useful in highlighting another problem in modern society.

Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe (Leigh): I shall speak as rapidly as possible because I wish to deal exclusively with the Greater Manchester fire service, its resources and its role.

In 1986, the Audit Commission reported that the fire services generally were "notably well managed", great value for money and, in efficiency and effectiveness, were second to none in the United Kingdom and the world. That is a glowing tribute to our fire services. The problem is the inability of the fire services to fulfil the statutory functions that are placed on them, because of the cuts imposed on them and their ever-increasing work load. The work load is rising at the same time as a static amount of money is available to the fire services to cope with the explosion in the number of incidents.

The incidence of fires in Manchester has constantly increased at a rate that is not commensurate with the amount of money available to increase the facilities to cope. In 1985, 48,000 incidents were recorded in Manchester, and in the past decade there has been a 70 per cent. increase, to 81,000 in 1995. Operational resources remained virtually unchanged in the same period. In 1994, the fire service in Manchester had just 68 appliances available to deal with that work load, and every single fire tender available had to deal with between 3,500 and 4,000 incidents.

When the fire service is forced—I use the word "forced" advisedly—by economic and financial constraints to impose a series of measures that impede or weaken the efficiency of the force, it gives rise to concerns that we all share, nationally and regionally. In my area, there has been much alarm about that problem. Budget reductions over the past two years have been about £1 million. This year—as was announced only yesterday—the chief fire officer of the Greater Manchester brigade said that there would be a £1.9 million deficit. That sum can be taken out of available balances, but the Audit Commission made it clear that it believed that no further injection of funds from the balances could be reconciled. That means that no more reserves will be available until 1998.

We have seen reductions in recruitment. Recruitment courses have had to be revised because of the cuts. The reduction in the use of the Fire Service college has been mentioned today, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) on the way in which he put the case for the college. I disagree with him on privatisation, but the college is first class and that is recognised by all the brigades throughout the United Kingdom.

We have seen a decrease in repairs and in the efficiency of vital fire appliances. Further funding deficiencies, for obvious reasons, will accelerate the problem and make it harder for the fire services to fulfil their role. The prime example is the use of the fire college and the impact on core and non-core training of brigades. Future training is necessary—indeed, imperative—to give a first-class service.

In spite of the reduction in funding, the fire services are now expected to finance more and more high-tech equipment, which is more sophisticated and more costly than previous equipment. The new equipment must be used to its maximum efficiency to get value for money for the fire services, which do such a necessary job.

There is also increasing pressure to devote more resources to fire safety education. We need to do more work in fire prevention and to educate the general public. I tabled an early-day motion recently, which was signed by some 60 Members of Parliament, about the tragic death of a 15-year-old girl, Melanie Ellison, who suffered horrendous burns when the modern padded shirt that she was wearing—like the shirts and anoraks worn by many young people and, indeed, adults—ignited through a single spark from a cooker.

Some hon. Members will remember the campaign on foam in furniture. Such shirts should be labelled to show whether they are non-flammable or inflammable, according to the type of material used to fill them. Such tragedies could be avoided if warning labels were used. I have pointed that out to the Home Office, to the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs and to the industry. They have a clear responsibility to ensure that imported goods, many from third-world countries, should be subject to safety standards when imports are licensed. Labelling for such garments is imperative.

Last year, we had an unusual summer followed by a harsh winter, and the demands on fire brigades have been heavy. In the first three weeks of August, many specialist uniformed staff manned vans and cars to deal with the grass fires, and off-duty personnel were recalled for duty. Some departments have not yet recovered from the backlog of administration work that was caused. For such unusual circumstances, compensation ought to be paid.

Bonfire night and the end of December, when there was severe weather, saw more increases in activity. On 30 and 31 December brigade control handled 763 and 728 calls respectively—twice as many as the norm. A great deal of additional overtime and wear and tear to vehicles was incurred in 1995 owing to the additional number of incidents, but no additional funding has been provided to help the service cope with these unpredictable circumstances.

I do not want to make a political point directly, but in the long term if we are penny wise and pound foolish there will be a regrettable loss of life and limb. That will have certain political consequences for the Government at the next general election.

12.10 pm

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker) on winning the ballot, and on raising this important subject. I also congratulate him on his thoughtful and effective speech.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), in her customary way, made some sound, commonsense points not just about Cheshire but about the fire service's wider problems. My hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) has just given us a detailed account of the difficulties confronting the Greater Manchester fire authority. I know that he takes a great interest in that topic.

I begin with two statements which I suspect will attract consensus. The first is that firefighting is a dangerous occupation. The recent deaths of a couple of firefighters have served only to underline that point. Every hon. Member will want to be associated with sending to the families of those who lost their lives our deep appreciation of the risks they took and the price they paid on behalf of the general public.

Mr. Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent): My hon. Friend may be aware that two part-time firefighters in my constituency died a few weeks ago attempting to save the life of a child. Their deaths were mourned, and their courage was saluted by all. But the local community is very angry, because the common-law wife of one of them, who was in a caring and loving relationship with him for 17 years and who has a child of 10, has been informed that she will not receive a pension, because she is not married.

I contacted Baroness Blatch to express my concern and anger. She responded by saying that, although the matter was under review, even if the outcome of the review was positive, it would not be retrospective. May I have a commitment that a future Labour Government will not just review the situation but will ensure that this woman receives the pension she deserves, so that justice is done?

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend and I have discussed that. I should first want the review to reach its proper conclusions, and then to examine them. Generally speaking, we now recognise all sorts of relationships. Divorce law, in the context of pensions, recognises differing relationships outside marriage, and I am almost certain that the review will reach a similar conclusion.

As for my hon. Friend's specific constituency case, I know that there is a great deal of anger in his community. The public admire this country's firefighters, and it would be a nice gesture if the Minister promised to raise the matter with Baroness Blatch and gave a commitment that any regulations that may apply would be waived and the pension granted in this case. That would not necessarily be a precedent—each case is different—and I hope that the Minister will be sympathetic.

My second general point centres on the fact that the fire services offer an emergency service. People in difficulties call out the fire service, and rightly expect help to arrive almost immediately. That may not always be possible, but people certainly expect a fire crew and an engine or two to be in attendance within a short time. Our charge against the Government is that they have refused to face up to the growing crisis in the fire services.

Some of the evidence has already been covered. For 1995-96, the standard spending assessment shortfall arrived at by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of County Councils amounted to £52 million, and the shortfall for 1996-97 is forecast to be at least £70 million. Removing so much money from a relatively inexpensive national emergency service is bound to create problems.

I believe that every hon. Member has received a copy of the letter sent by the president of the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association, Mr. Davies, who states:

> "What has happened so far is that a series of issues like capital financing, pensions, fire service training costs, national employee conditions and standards of fire cover have all been examined in isolation, only to find that they are one and the same problem—the need for adequate basic funding to meet objectively set quality standards—and that is a nettle not many people want to grasp".

Mr. Edward O'Hara (Knowsley, South): My hon. Friend, as a Merseyside colleague, may be aware that Merseyside fire and civil defence authority, on the advice of the chief fire officer, has just set a budget of £52.7 million, which is £2.139 million above the cap. Her Majesty's chief inspector has agreed with the chief fire officer's assessment of these needs of the service.

Mr. Howarth: Merseyside is dear to both our hearts, and my hon. Friend has put his finger on the problem. Statutory obligations and expectations are not matched by resources—that is true across the country.

The Government simply have no way left to explain their case. The only argument they have been able to produce so far is based on selective quotations from the Audit Commission's report last year, entitled "In the Line of Fire". On that, they base their idea that there is scope for saving £29 million. A more realistic figure, quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich, would be £7 million, which, in a global service of this type, does not add up to much in the way of efficiency savings.

Fire authorities in Tyne and Wear, Cheshire, Manchester and Merseyside—and many other places—are having to make reductions that will have a measurable impact on services. It will mean that fire engines will be mothballed, stations will be closed and there will be job losses among firefighters.

Similarly, capital expenditure was reduced last year by 50 per cent., and it is forecast, from what we know about basic credit approvals, to do so again by an average of 35 per cent. The Government say that the private finance initiative can bridge the gap, but they have not yet been able to point to a single case in which the PFI could be made to work in the fire services.

The Audit Commission report "In the Line of Fire" shows that there are many in-built problems with the SSA formula: pensions, as my hon. Friends have mentioned, the assessment of risk, the application of minimum standards and special services, which are not covered by the formula. None of that is covered. What we have is a working party here, an inquiry there, a special investigation elsewhere. Government by working party does not add up to proper management of our fire services.

I ask the Government to look further at transitional costs, particularly those in Wales and the shire counties, because they are a serious problem. We have government by working party, a Government who have failed and refused to face up to the in-built problems in the fire service. I suspect that it will take a change of Government before anybody with responsibility faces those problems. The sooner we have a Labour Government prepared to accept these responsibilities, the sooner we can start moving again.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): The recent tragic events in Gwent and Avon have reminded us yet again of the risks that firefighters take every day of their working lives. I share hon. Members' feelings about that, and pay sincere tribute to the dedication and selfless courage of all those who work in the fire service.

Mr. Llew Smith: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Kirkhope: No, I have only about eight minutes.

The service performs an essential public duty; whether it is operating as an emergency service or responding to a more routine call for assistance, it is rarely, if ever, found wanting. We are all profoundly grateful for that.

The fire service has been a local authority service since the second world war. Local "fire authorities" have a statutory responsibility to provide an effective and efficient fire service. As a result, funding for the fire service is included in the local government finance settlement, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment announced in January. It is, I believe, a fair settlement.

In 1996-97, central Government support for local authorities will increase by £966 million. Total standard spending in England for 1996-97 has provisionally been set at £44.9 billion. That is an increase of 3.3 per cent. on 1995-96. The fire service standard spending assessment for England in 1996-97 has been increased by £17 million. But it is ultimately for local authorities to decide how much is spent on individual services, in the light of their local circumstances.

It is true that the fire service is being asked to make efficiency savings, but so is virtually every other public service. It is essential that we ensure that the taxpayer gets the best value for money, as was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), who has explained to me the reasons why he has had to leave us.

When the Audit Commission looked at the fire service, in its report published last year, it concluded:

"There are local opportunities that can be taken now within the current framework. The locally achievable savings identified by this study are £67 million a year. This represents 5 per cent. of the total expenditure on the fire service".

Although some people—some hon. Members, even—may take issue with the Audit Commission's conclusions, I stress that it is totally independent and has an excellent track record in this area. Moreover, its report highlights specific areas in which efficiency savings can be made. It suggests that "reducing sickness rates in all brigades to the level of the lower quartile would save £17 million a year nationally."

Bringing the level of leave in all brigades down to the level of the lower quartile would lead to savings of £8 million a year; and moving all brigades' management costs to the performance of the most efficient quarter would save about £29 million a year nationally.

The fire service element of the SSA is distributed to individual authorities via a formula that is reviewed every year in consultation with local authority associations. The Government carefully considered the formula for the fire service element of SSAs for 1996-97. We decided that it should be adjusted to include factors for fire safety enforcement, fire safety education and firefighters' pensions. That is in line with recommendations by the Audit Commission.

The process of reviewing the SSA formula for the fire service for 1997-98 has just begun. To help inform the review, the Department of the Environment has commissioned research on the costs of providing services in densely and sparsely populated areas and the area cost adjustment. That adjustment is included in the formula to compensate for the additional cost of providing services in south-east England.

The Home Office is also participating with local authority associations in a technical group, which is exploring the possibility of an alternative formula based on the number of fire stations in each brigade area. Any change to the formula must not unreasonably increase the grant to some brigades and disproportionately reduce it to others. However, the Government are always willing to see what improvements can be made.

The provisional council tax capping criteria for 1996-97 set by the Secretary of State for the Environment allow an increase in net budget of 2 per cent. for metropolitan fire authorities and 3 per cent. for shire authorities as the norm. However, in many cases, authorities were permitted an increase above that norm if the result otherwise would have been to prevent them from receiving the full benefit of agreed increases in SSA.

If an authority believed that it could not set a budget for 1996-97 that would allow it to meet its legal obligations, it had the option to set a budget higher than the proposed capping limit, and to apply to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment for redetermination of the cap. Some authorities have taken that option. The outcome of such applications will depend on the quality of the case that is made.

Many hon. Members referred to London, the SSA of which will increase by £1.1 million in 1996-97. Under the proposed capping criteria, the authority was able to set a budget of up to £5.1 million—or 2 per cent.—more than in 1995-96. In setting its budget, the authority would have taken these factors into account, as well as the scope for savings and the availability of its reserves.

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North-East): As £27 million of reserves have emerged only belatedly after the consultation period by the LFCDA, will my hon. Friend urge our right hon. Friend seriously to consider rejecting these unnecessary proposals from the London fire brigade?

Mr. Kirkhope: My hon. Friend is right to raise that, as was my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton. The relatively high reserves of about £27 million were referred to even by the authority's own director of finance as needing to be reduced. It is important that the Labour party should remember that so much political activity, which has been referred to by my hon. Friends, is not particularly in the interests of the fire service for London. Indeed, I am aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) has asked that an investigation take place into the activities of the authority in that regard.

Mr. George Howarth rose—

Mr. Kirkhope: I shall not give way.

As hon. Members will know, the authority has decided to set its budget for 1996-97 at the capping limit. It has decided not to proceed with the closure of four fire stations, recommended by its own fire cover review. Nor does it propose to seek approval to withdraw appliances from seven stations, which was also recommended. It has, of course, applied to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary for approval to withdraw pumping appliances from 15 fire stations. The authority also intends, as I understand it, to provide an additional appliance at two fire stations. As hon. Members will know, that does not require approval, and was mentioned by Opposition Members.

Under section 19 of the Fire Services Act 1947, my right hon. and learned Friend's approval is required if a fire authority wishes to reduce the number of its fire stations, fire appliances and firefighting posts. My right hon. and learned Friend has a specific but limited role in considering applications, and grants approval when the conditions are met.

Mr. Llew Smith: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Kirkhope: No.

My right hon. and learned Friend will also consider representations in addition to those already forwarded to the fire authority, provided that the individual or organisation concerned forwards them promptly on being advised that a section 19 application is to be submitted.

The standards that are applied dictate the initial response to a fire in weight and speed of attack. They rest on four main standards of service, according to the risk category into which an area has been placed. This system of risk is based on the characteristics of the buildings and property in an area, and assumes for each category that a predetermined number of firefighting appliances should attend within a certain time.

The standards are not just nationally recommended, but are nationally agreed in the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council.

The Government consider that the standards have served the country well, but that is not to say that we regard them as immutable. The Audit Commission's report recommended another fundamental review of the levels of fire cover, and we are proceeding with that review.

We are grateful for the assistance of my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) in our consideration of the future of the Fire Service college. We are keen for it to remain in existence. Although it is subject to financial constraints, we want it to succeed, and will do all we can to preserve it.

The fire service in England provides an excellent public service. We value the work of firefighters—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Time's up.

Taiwan

12.30 pm

Mr. William Powell (Corby): This debate takes place at a particularly opportune time, in view of the unfolding drama involving mainland China—the People's Republic of China—and Taiwan. I speak as chairman of the British-Taiwan parliamentary group; my interests are fully declared in the Register of Members' Interests, but let me add for the avoidance of doubt that I have visited Taiwan twice as a guest of the Government of the Republic of China on Taiwan.

There is no doubt that relations between Great Britain and Taiwan have improved enormously in the past few years, and that that has resulted from a great deal of hard work on both sides. I pay tribute to members of the British Government who have been involved, and to our representatives in Taipei who have worked so hard to build up trade and cultural relations with the Republic of China. The House and the country owe a great debt to those involved in such work—for instance, Mr. Morrice and his successor, who has recently gone to Taipei.

I also pay tribute to the work done by representatives of the Republic of China in London, particularly Dr. Eugene Chien and his admirable staff, who have worked hard in recent years to make relations between our two countries increasingly warm. And I pay tribute to the remarkable and redoubtable Dr. David Liu, head of the cultural office in this country, whose distinguished work in building close educational and cultural ties was recently and appropriately recognised by the University of Central England in Birmingham. The university awarded Dr. Liu an honorary doctorate, a thoroughly well-earned tribute and distinction.

The objective indices of the improvement that is taking place can be found everywhere, but let me highlight two or three that really matter. There is no doubt that trading and commercial ties are becoming much closer. That is a two-way process: although the balance of trade is not to Great Britain's advantage, ICI, Glaxo-Wellcome and many other British enterprises are investing in Taiwan, and the Taiwanese are beginning to invest in the United Kingdom. Most recently, a huge investment in Scotland was announced. I particularly welcome that, because many of my constituents have relatives who live in the part of Scotland where the enterprise is to be based. I hope that their families will secure employment in the Motherwell area.

That is by no means the only investment, however. There are successful Taiwanese enterprises on Tyneside, in the west midlands and elsewhere, and the Taiwanese have invested in the City of London. I hope that there will be further inward investment. I pay special tribute to all who are working so hard in this country, and with the British Government, to secure those investments.

There has been a huge increase in the number of Taiwanese tourists coming to this country. Until a few years ago, it was very difficult for people from Taiwan to travel to Great Britain. Although niggling difficulties remain, much hard work has been done to try to reduce them, and I pay tribute to all those involved. We have much to gain from the Taiwanese students who come here. The staggering increase in their number is the most dramatic development of all. When I first became interested in the subject, only a handful visited this country each year—certainly fewer than 100. Now, the number is rising 10,000.

[Mr. William Powell]

It is understandable that the Taiwan authorities should want only the best for students who go abroad to enter further and higher education. It is therefore not surprising that they wish to send so many to our universities and colleges. Although some of those in higher education are pessimistic about their financial opportunities, the fact remains that our further and higher education institutions are the best in the world, and are recognised as such. It is not surprising that so many students want to go to Cambridge, Imperial college, the London school of economics, Oxford and scores of other institutions, and I hope that they will arrive in ever larger numbers.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): The figure that my hon. Friend has quoted is truly remarkable, given that the figure for the People's Republic of China is only about 8,000. That is a major achievement.

We should bear in mind the current tensions between the two countries, and the fact that the Chinese authorities in Beijing have repeatedly suggested the concept of one country, two systems for Taiwan along with their plans for Hong Kong. Notwithstanding the current dangerous circumstances—one wishes that both sides would cool it—and bearing in mind the fact that Taiwan is historically a province of the Chinese motherland, does my hon. Friend agree that it would be a great mistake for the American authorities to encourage the Taiwanese population, or politicians, to think of future independence?

Mr. Powell: I thank my hon. Friend for his observations. He chairs the British-Chinese parliamentary group, and has extensive experience of relations between Great Britain and China. I know that his words—along with mine and those of my right hon. Friend the Minister—will be minutely scrutinised by people in Beijing, Hong Kong and Taiwan, and throughout the Asian Pacific region. The debate is taking place at a time of extraordinary sensitivity in the development of Chinese relations and policy towards all China—in which I include Hong Kong, the People's Republic, Taiwan, Macau and the whole Chinese world. My hon. Friend is right to sound a note of caution, and I hope that it will be heard and acted on by the authorities in Beijing.

Tension is clearly rising rapidly, and the danger of a miscalculation could be considerable. It is important that every effort should be made in the international community to lower the temperature and reduce the danger of any such miscalculation. Taiwan's greatest triumph has been its moves towards establishing a genuine popular democracy. It is extremely difficult to do that—not merely to hold an election and to ensure that it is the only election that is ever held, but to establish genuine and legitimate democratic institutions and ensure that freedom can be fully exercised in all areas of life, not just in the election of a national leader.

The election of a President, which will take place next week, is only the latest step in a process that has been going on for nearly 10 years—since 1987—to establish fully democratic institutions. We should be proud of any country—any region, indeed—that takes such steps. The greatest tribute that I pay those who lead Taiwan is to the courage, persistence and steadfastness that they have shown in unfolding their programme of democratic reform. Only 10 years ago, the stage of democracy that is being reached would have been unthinkable for people who knew Taiwan. Not least for that reason, we should do all we can. I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary are working hard to ensure that the danger of enhanced tension is reduced as much as possible. The People's Republic has announced that the military exercises in the strait of Taiwan are to last nine days. Clearly, prolonging them would be a dangerous step.

Equally, if the People's Republic enhanced the degree of the exercise and, instead of conducting what it calls air exercises over the sea, tested live missiles, leading to aggression against the islands of Quemoy or Matsu, or against the main island of Taiwan, that would lead to a most regrettable and difficult international position. As someone who has tried to study these matters intensely in recent years, I look forward to a time when Taiwan and mainland China can be reunited, but that should not be achieved by coercion or by trying to undermine the remarkable progress of liberalisation and democratisation that has taken place on Taiwan.

Nevertheless, I hope that it will be possible for all Chinese people to come together in one country, even if it involves more than one system of government at some stage. That policy is being pursued by the Government of Taiwan and by President Lee, who has been responsible for that remarkable programme of liberalisation and democratisation. I therefore support reunification, but not reunification by means of coercion, which is not the way to conduct international relations at this stage in the world's history. As the people of Taiwan rank, by reason of their history, as the most sophisticated in the world, to imagine that the rest of the world community will accept an attempt to achieve by coercion an objective that is shared on both sides of the strait of Taiwan, will cause considerable problems in the rest of the world.

Taiwan's revolution has been peaceful and economic. It has led to enormous prosperity and to huge investment by Taiwan in southern China. Let no one for a moment imagine that what has taken place in southern China to the north of Hong Kong would have been possible without Taiwanese capital, which continues to pour into southern China and to build the Chinese economy. Of course, there is a natural partnership between these people and the wish to bridge their political gulfs is a legitimate aspiration.

In recent years, many hon. Members from both sides of the House have had the opportunity to visit Taiwan. I hope that more will go to see for themselves the remarkable developments at Hsinchu science park, the original one-stop shop for the world, now covering 140 acres. Taiwan's gross national product is bigger than that of Scotland, Wales and the whole of Ireland put together.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on raising this issue and on the way in which he has sensitively dealt with the topics—the way in which he has talked about the immediate issues and the future will unite the House. His comments about the advance of democracy in Taiwan will also be supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House. It is a great shame that we do not have more time to debate this issue, but I congratulate him on raising it.

Mr. Powell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. It is important that we speak in the House with one voice on this matter because there must not be any miscalculation of where we stand in these sensitive days. Equally, the future matters. Taiwan, already the 12th largest economy in the world, will play a substantial part in that future. It is an economic powerhouse.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister is doing all that he can to improve relations between Great Britain and Taiwan on a number of fronts. My final point may not be my most popular point with him. As Taiwan is the source of the second largest reserve of savings in the world, it is absurd that some international institutions—I have in mind especially the World Trade Organisation, which supersedes the general agreement on tariffs and trade, the International Monetary Fund and the World bank—should not have Taiwan as a participating member.

Some mechanism will have to be found, which may initially amount to less than political recognition of Taiwan, but which will enable it to participate in the world community to a much greater extent than has been possible. I hope that part of the Government's work will involve trying, with other countries, to enable Taiwan to play the full part that her economic power dictates she should play.

That having been said, these are serious times in Taiwan. I hope that the international threshold of anxiety will be lowered. That will be to the advantage not only of Taiwan, but of Hong Kong, of China and of her reputation in the rest of the world.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Jeremy Hanley): My hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell) has done the House a service by raising the important and topical subject of Taiwan. The tribute paid to him by the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) is wholly appropriate and agreed by all hon. Members.

In 10 days' time, the people of Taiwan will go to the polls to elect their President—the first time that they have had the opportunity to do so. It represents the last stage in the development of democratic institutions in Taiwan, a development that hon. Members can only welcome and applaud. It is therefore a matter of grave concern that the People's Republic of China should be conducting missile tests and military exercises with the apparent aim of influencing those elections and of intimidating the electorate.

Four missiles have been fired into the sea near Taiwan's two main ports. Aviation and shipping have been warned to avoid an extensive area near the Chinese coast in the strait of Taiwan, where the exercises will include live firing. Such activities have caused anxiety to people in Taiwan—including the British community there—in Hong Kong and throughout east Asia. They have led the United States of America to take precautionary action. Anything that affects the stability of the region that includes Hong Kong affects us all.

Let me make the Government's position clear. We acknowledge the Chinese Government's position that Taiwan is a province of China. The Taiwanese should be singularly ill advised were they to proceed to a declaration of independence or some similar initiative. Our understanding is that the Taiwanese authorities seek negotiations about reunification, not independence. That echoes the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes).

Equally, on the Chinese side, we have no current reason to believe that the present activity is the prelude to a military attack on Taiwan or that the Government of the People's Republic have abandoned their long-standing policy of seeking peaceful reunification, the policy repeated by the Chinese premier Li Peng to our Prime Minister less than two weeks ago. Nevertheless, it is clear that the present position has heightened tensions in the region and is potentially dangerous—indeed disastrous. There is a risk of error or a miscalculation that could have the most serious consequences.

Taiwan is one of the economic powerhouses of east Asia. It is the 14th largest trading entity in the world. As my hon. Friend the Member for Corby said, its foreign exchange reserves are the second largest in the world—they are second only to Japan. For its security, Taiwan has always looked to the support of the United States, which has already backed up its warnings about the seriousness of the position by moving two task forces near to Taiwan. We support and welcome the sensible precautions that the American Government have taken.

Mr. Hartley Booth (Finchley): My right hon. Friend widens the point to encompass the whole world. Those of us who are concerned about Taiwan and China are obviously here this morning for that reason. Is it not right also to widen the debate so that concern for democracy is shared world wide? Even if we support Beijing, we do not want it to force the extinguishment of democracy as it begins in Taiwan.

Mr. Hanley: I can only agree with my hon. Friend. That is why I welcome the elections in Taiwan, which should not be interfered with by anyone outside, not even China.

The risks of any escalation of the present crisis should be evident to all. I hope that all concerned, but especially the Government of the People's Republic of China, will pay heed to the dangers and proceed with the greatest possible caution and restraint.

That has been the central message of our own public statements about the matter and of the statement issued at the end of last week by the European Union. The Prime Minister expressed our concerns directly to the Chinese Prime Minister Li Peng when they met in Bangkok at the recent Asia-Europe meeting. We are continuing to follow the development of the situation extremely closely and will take all further opportunities to urge restraint and peaceful resolution of differences.

Such a path is not only in the interests of Taiwan and the east Asia region, but it is very much in the interests of China itself. Even though direct trade is still not permitted by the Taiwan authorities, Taiwanese companies have been among the largest investors in mainland China and the indirect trade is worth billions of dollars. My hon. Friend the Member for Corby alluded to that.

The astonishing economic transformation of the coastal provinces of China has, as my hon. Friend rightly said, benefited greatly from this infusion of capital and business acumen from across the Taiwan strait. These substantial economic benefits would be put at risk if the present crisis were to escalate out of control. There could also be consequences of particular importance for us in Britain—but also for China—if the situation led to a drop in confidence in Hong Kong.

[Mr. Hanley]

I do not wish to be alarmist. The evidence we possess points to intimidation and bellicose activity, but not an attack. The risks at this stage are potential rather than actual. If all sides act with good sense, as I hope and believe they will, calm should return and tensions be relaxed. I believe that all in this House will join me in expressing concern at the demonstrations, which are unnecessary and an over-reaction, and in urging the utmost restraint.

I have so far spoken of the relations between China and Taiwan, as they are the subject of the greatest topical interest. I want now to put on record the flourishing links between Taiwan and this country. Although, like our main western partners, we have no formal diplomatic relations with Taiwan, it has become an important partner for us in terms of trade, investment, tourism and educational exchange. We continue actively to promote those links that are of considerable benefit to both sides. So far, 11 Ministers have visited Taiwan in pursuit of those objectives. Only recently, three of my ministerial colleagues from the Scottish Office—it is good to see the one they left behind, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) on the Bench this morning—and from the Departments of the Environment and of Health visited Taiwan to secure further commercial opportunities and inward investment for the United Kingdom.

The centre of our activity is our unofficial office in Taipei, the British trade and cultural office, currently under the direction of Alan Collins. The office boasts seven front-line commercial staff dedicated to helping British business. Its cultural section has an excellent record in attracting Taiwanese students to the United Kingdom. Several high-profile events were staged last year, including the British festival in Taipei and a British promotion in Kaoshiung. More events are planned for this year to enhance British interests. The active British chamber of commerce in Taipei, which the DTI helped to establish several years ago, also offers help to British business men. The DTI holds regular talks with the Taiwan authorities on a wide range of trade issues to improve access to the market.

My hon. Friend mentioned the work done by the Taipei representative office in London. Our lack of diplomatic relations means that we cannot afford Dr. Eugene Chien and his colleagues the privileges and immunities that go with diplomatic status, but we do make every effort to minimise any practical inconveniences that they may face. We believe that they share our aim of developing the practical links between Taiwan and the United Kingdom.

In this regard, I believe that our record speaks for itself. Last year our exports amounted to £962 million, a remarkable increase of more than 30 per cent. on 1994. Recent commercial successes included Davy International's £75 million contract from the China Steel company to design and build a new blast furnace. British companies are in the running to construct both a high-speed rail link between Taipei and Kaoshiung and an £8 billion metro project in Kaoshiung. The Government are committed to offering all the practical help they can in pursuit of those opportunities.

British firms are also showing their commitment by investing in Taiwan. Glaxo has completed a major pharmaceutical plant in Hsinchu and Kingfisher B and Q has signed a joint venture worth £10 million and is setting up a pilot do-it-yourself home centre store in Taiwan, which is due to open in March this year. Eagle Star has signed a joint venture to create Eagle Star Insurance Life, whose operations are due to start very soon. ICI plans to build a second chemical plant for completion in 1997, which would put its investment in Taiwan well in excess of half a billion US dollars.

The United Kingdom is also an increasingly attractive location for Taiwanese investment, as my hon. Friend rightly said. In the past, Taiwanese manufacturing investment has been mainly concentrated in the USA and east Asia. The first investment in Britain was when Tatung set up a manufacturing plant in Telford in 1984. Over the past five years, the United Kingdom has become the preferred European location for a further 10 companies with a range of products from penicillin to hard disk drives.

The announcement in November 1995 of the Chunghwa investment of £260 million to build a plant in Lanarkshire, creating 3,300 jobs, is a sign of things to come. It is the largest so far by a Taiwanese investor in the United Kingdom and, I might add, the largest single investment by a Taiwanese company in Europe. We expect it to generate more inquiries from smaller companies wishing to follow Chunghwa's lead.

It is important that we remain active in Taiwan to capitalise on the potential for further investment opportunities on the back of our recent success. The United Kingdom offers a highly attractive environment to Taiwanese companies, with a skilled and flexible work force and a warm welcome from local and national Government.

In recent years we have also made significant efforts in the area of education to attract Taiwanese students to the United Kingdom. An education fair, with representatives' attending from all major British colleges and universities, is held every year. There are now more than 10,000 Taiwanese students at British colleges and universities and the number continues to grow. We are also benefiting from an increasing flow of Taiwanese tourists and business visitors, especially since we simplified visa procedures in December last year.

All this represents a record of solid achievement in deepening the practical links between Britain and Taiwan. Despite our lack of diplomatic relations, we remain wholeheartedly committed to developing closer ties. We see great potential in the future for the promotion of United Kingdom exports and investment, attraction of tourism and the promotion of educational links in the United Kingdom and Taiwan.

Although much has been done, much more could be done. We intend to work closely with British companies to ensure that they take full advantage of the opportunities. We will continue the partnership between the British Council and the universities to promote educational contact. We will intensify our campaign with the regions of the United Kingdom to attract investment and create jobs for British workers at Taiwanese-owned factories. That requires a sustained effort. In the United Kingdom, investors have access to the European single market, but retain the freedom to run their businesses as they wish—and an overseas investor in the United Kingdom has all the rights and privileges of a British investor. No wonder we are doing so well together.

I know that the House will join me in congratulating my hon. Friend on what he had to say about the excellent relationship between Taiwan and the United Kingdom. The fact that he spoke without a note in his hand shows that he spoke from the heart. There are many here who hold Taiwan in their hearts.

Mr. Charlie Thom

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): This debate has been rather overshadowed by events in Scotland today. I understand that at Dunblane primary school in Dunblane 13 children and two adults have been killed and eight others have been injured. I offer my sincere condolences to the families and relatives of those killed or injured in the tragedy. I understand that, later today, formal statements will be made by the Leader of the House and the shadow Leader of the House. I also understand that the Minister of State wants to say a few words, and I give way to him.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): The whole House will share the sense of distress, horror and outrage that children lost their lives at Dunblane primary school this morning in an appalling incident. The whole House will wish the deepest sympathies to be expressed to the families of the victims and to the families of those who have been injured. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), the shadow Scottish Secretary, left this morning to travel to Dunblane, and I understand that the Under-Secretary of State responsible for education, my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), is already there.

The House should expect a full statement to be made as soon as all the facts have been established. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will confirm the arrangements for a statement at 3.30 pm today.

Mr. Donohoe: I am grateful to be able to present the case in this short Adjournment debate of Charlie Thom of 35, Ashgrove road in Kilwinning, which involves a march-fence division wall. The case could be considered to be very complicated. Indeed, from reading several documents and letters concerning it, I consider it complicated. I shall try to make it as simple as possible and break it down into three different sectors. The first concerns the courts, the second concerns politicians and the Government and the third concerns the Scottish Law Commission.

I shall try to approach the matter from a simple commonsense point of view and outline the case briefly. I understand that the wall was built in the early 1950s and that a wooden fence was subsequently built next to it without Mr. Thom's permission. Lord Jauncey, the Lord Ordinary, heard the case over 28 days in 1987 and, on 24 April 1987, came to the conclusion that the case was not made by Mr. Thom. He said that huge sums of money had been spent in defending and prosecuting the case. It has been estimated that more than £50,000 was spent—concerning a wall that cost between £700 and £1,000 to build.

In the opinion of the pursuer, Mr. Thom, Lord Jauncey's statement ignored all previous decisions. To find case history, one has to go back to the 19th century, when there were five cases that specifically concerned boundary walls. The first such case was Wallace v. Brown on 21 January 1808, and the last was Cochran's Travellers v. Caledonian Railway Company in 1898.

[Mr. Donohoe]

Mr. Thom argues that Lord Jauncey came to his conclusion on the basis of tenement gable cases in the 1900s and took into account the minority view of the last case in the previous century, to which I have referred. Lord Jauncey concluded:

"However I can see no reason why the principles of law applicable to the interest in a gable built half on A's land and half on B's land should differ from the principles applicable to the simple division wall similarly built".

I understand that the Scottish Office Minister became involved on 27 October 1987, when he wrote:

"The Secretary of State cannot interfere in the judgements of the courts. Such judgements can only be overturned in the normal manner by appealing to a higher court and Mr. Thom should consult his own solicitor regarding this."

Two Lord Advocates became involved in the case. The first, Lord Cameron of Lochbroom, said on 21 December that Mr. Thom should refer the matter to the Scottish Law Commission, as did his successor, Lord Fraser of Carmyllie, on 2 March 1992.

At about the same time, Mr. Thom wrote to the Faculty of Advocates, and on 4 June 1993 was told by the dean of the faculty to take the matter up with the deputy principal clerk of session. That had disastrous consequences for Mr. Thom, of which I am sure the Minister is aware. It has caused such a delay that the case has still not been considered by a judge.

After a fairly lengthy written and verbal dialogue with Mr. Thom, the third vehicle in the case, the Scottish Law Commission, produced a consultation document in June 1992. It was very supportive, as was a letter from Lord Davidson, the chairman of the commission. Shortly before the research undertaken by the commission on the subject was completed, Lord Davidson said:

"case law on the subject is in disarray".

I would argue that there is a remedy. It is clear that the law on dividing walls is in total disarray. The law faces two ways and there are two lines of decision that cannot satisfactorily be reconciled. It is clear that my constituent no longer has any confidence in the Scottish legal system—and with some justification, given what I have described. The extent of the events that have occurred in the Scottish Court Service is astonishing, as I understand the Minister is aware.

What can we do to remedy the situation? For one part, compensation is due. We need only to approach the matter from a commonsense point of view. Everyone knows that it is not possible to own half a brick, yet the judgment seems to suggest that it is. As it is not possible to own half a child, it is certainly not possible to own half a brick. Such a premise makes a nonsense of the law, and the law falls into disrepute in the eyes of the public as a result.

Lord Jauncey had absolutely no right or power to change the law. As I understand it, to change a point of law in Scotland, five judges sitting together are required to make a majority decision. A single judge does not have that power.

The only other two ways in which the law can be changed are through the House of Lords, on a case basis, and through the House of Commons, by statute or by parliamentary order. Those are clearly not open to Mr. Thom. In terms of his rights of appeal, it would be nonsense for him to approach the case from the angle suggested by many people. The use of judicial discretion in the case has been highly questionable.

The most recent annual report of the Scottish Law Commission said that the case would have to be set aside because, as with other cases of equal importance, more resources are needed from the Government to continue with it. The Government must examine the resourcing of the Scottish Law Commission. In my discussions with the commission, that fact has been clearly borne out.

The time spent on the case has been inordinate. My constituent has been almost literally banging his head against a brick wall for more than 15 years. He feels that the system of law has been ganging up against him, and that there has been some form of collusion. So far as I can determine, all facets of the law suggest that he has a right of appeal. The Scottish Law Commission alone stands against that possibility.

About 3,000 years ago, in a book called the Mishnah, the Jews determined what would happen if two parties decided to build a dividing wall:

"If they acted with each other's consent, they should build the wall in the middle and make the boundary mark on either side; hence if the wall fell down the place and the stones belong to them both."

I fail to understand why, if the Jews could get it right 3,000 years ago, the Government in Scotland cannot get it right after more than 10 years.

I hope that the Minister will not sit on the fence, so to speak, for another 10 years. Mr. Thom is becoming an old man; he is 79 years of age, and I argue forcefully that he deserves justice today.

1.12 pm

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe) on obtaining this Adjournment debate. I have studied the issue closely, and there is one issue of concern to me that may provide the basis for some claim for recompense—the failure of an officer of the Court of Session to process Mr. Thom's application for a reduction of Lord Jauncey's judgment in 1993. If the hon. Gentleman or Mr. Thom believes that that failure led to additional or abortive costs for Mr. Thom, I ask them to let the chief executive of the Scottish Court Service or myself have details so that consideration can be given to an ex gratia payment to cover those additional costs.

I shall describe to the hon. Gentleman and the rest of the House the present legal position. "Common property" means a single piece of property jointly owned by two or more people. "Mutual property" means a piece of property of which two or more people own a part. The law on boundaries is mostly common law not statute law, and it is interpreted by the courts in the circumstances of the time.

The modern interpretation of the law on garden boundary walls is that each neighbour owns his own half of the wall. The two neighbours have a shared interest in the upkeep of the wall as a whole. That interpretation of the law formed the basis of Lord Jauncey's judgment against Mr. Thom in 1987. In effect, he ruled that the garden wall was mutual property, whereas Mr. Thom had argued that it was common property. That interpretation of the law has been in place since 1886, and the leading authority on property law, "The Laws of Scotland Stair Memorial Encyclopaedia", says that "The modern law"— on boundary walls—

"is not now in doubt".

The Scottish Law Commission is now examining the subject of property law, including the law relating to boundary walls. We shall consider carefully any recommendation that it makes in due course. In the meantime, there is no reason to say that the law is unclear or in disarray.

Mr. Donohoe: Surely the Minister must recognise the fact that the Scottish Law Commission has been dealing with the case for seven years. We require a decision in the near future, not one that will take two, three or four years. Some effort is needed, because the Law Commission has no resources to complete the consultation process and present to the necessary authorities the solution to the problem.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My understanding is that the Law Commission is considering its conclusions, which will reach the Government without undue delay. I shall certainly ensure that the commission is made aware of the hon. Gentleman's concern that the matter should be processed without unnecessary delay.

I shall now deal with some of the specific issues that the hon. Gentleman raised. First, he asked about the description of the boundary wall in Mr. Thom's title to his property. In the title deeds, the wall is described as mutual property between the two householders. The hon. Gentleman argued that the terms "mutual property" and "common property" mean the same thing, but I must disagree. That was a key point argued by Mr. Thom in his original case before the Court of Session, and one that Lord Jauncey considered closely in his judgment.

That judgment distinguishes clearly between the idea of mutual interest in property and the legal concept of common property. Lord Jauncey refers to that distinction as it applies in many areas of property law. Put simply, mutual interest means very much what the ordinary sense of the term implies: both parties share an interest in the overall piece of property, although they separately own only individual parts of it.

Having property in common involves a much closer relationship, because the parties are held to be joint owners of the whole property and therefore have to agree about how any part of it is treated, and share the costs of upkeep. As I made clear earlier, the law as it stands treats garden walls, such as Mr. Thom's wall, as mutual between the householders and not as common property. That is a sensible approach.

Indeed, it could be argued that treating a garden wall as common property in the strict legal sense would raise a lot more problems than it would solve. For example, should it be necessary for the party on one side of the wall to get agreement from his neighbour before he can fix a trellis to the wall and grow roses up it? That could be the effect of regarding such a wall as common property. If a garden wall built on both sides of the dividing line between two pieces of ground is regarded as common property, should the ground on which the wall is built not also be regarded as held in common?

The hon. Gentleman also suggested that the papers issued by the Scottish Law Commission following Mr. Thom's case implied that the commission—

Mr. Donohoe: On the question of a common wall versus a mutual wall, does the Minister not concede that the Thom case itself changed the definition? Before that, all case law was seen by others as based on 18th and 19th-century case history, and Lord Jauncey could show nothing to suggest that a change had taken place between the 19th century and the 20th century. Clearly from a commonsense point of view, nobody could understand what a "mutual wall" means in real terms. Does not that demonstrate a fundamental failure in Lord Jauncey's approach, in terms of common sense?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The modern interpretation of the law on garden boundary walls is that each of the neighbours owns his or her own half of the wall concerned and they have a shared interest. The hon. Gentleman may disapprove of that, but that is the position. The hon. Gentleman may want to return to the position as it was hundreds of years ago, but I suspect that, were we to do that, many people would argue that we should bring the law up to date.

We are awaiting the conclusion of the Scottish Law Commission, which I hope will not take too long. I strongly disagree with the hon. Gentleman's view that "common property" and "mutual property" mean the same thing. The consultation paper issued by the commission makes clear distinctions between the technical meaning of "common property" and the sense of the term "mutual property".

The paper refers specifically to the outcome of Mr. Thom's original case, not to Mr. Thom's view of the law. It also says that the paper is published "for comment and criticism and does not represent the final views of the Scottish Law Commission".

As the commission has still to complete its report on those issues, its final views are not known.

I was interested to hear what the hon. Gentleman said about Jewish law on boundaries between property. I admit that much of that was new to me, but the Scottish Office is always ready to consider and learn from good practice from other jurisdictions and I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would let me have papers on the Jewish legal framework. We shall study them with considerable interest.

The hon. Gentleman described the law on boundary walls as being "in disarray" and said that the interest shown by the Scottish Law Commission in Mr. Thom's case showed that the commission supported that view. The law is not in disarray. I draw the attention of the House to the firm statement about the law on boundary walls made in paragraph 223 of the current edition of Stair's "Laws of Scotland":

"The modern law is not now in doubt . . . each proprietor owns to the mid-point".

I am aware of no justification for the suggestion that the Scottish Law Commission supports the idea that the law is "in disarray". The commission has a long-standing project reviewing the whole law of property, the feudal system and the law of the tenement. It has included in that project consideration of the law on boundary walls. It issued its consultation paper in 1992 and has yet to issue its conclusions. If the commission had believed that the law on boundary walls was in a critical condition, it would have made specific recommendations on the subject much earlier.

Following on from that point, I should address the hon. Gentleman's concern—

Mr. Donohoe rose—

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: May I develop this point? I should address the hon. Gentleman's concern that the commission's review of the issues surrounding property law has taken a long time. The commission's considered views on the specific legal issues relating to boundary walls will not be available for some time but, as I explained, the commission takes the view that there are many detailed and related issues covering the whole law surrounding property where interests may overlap or be shared. The commission wishes to explore all those issues carefully before producing final views about any aspect of property law. The commission is right to take a prudent approach. The hon. Gentleman eloquently argued the importance of the law relating to property, especially domestic property. It is important that all the complex and related issues should be carefully considered.

On the issue of compensation for Mr. Thom, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will accept that there can be—

Mr. Donohoe: Obviously the Minister was not listening to what I said about the Scottish Law Commission. Viscount Davidson, the chairman, wrote to Mr. Thom on 16 October 1990 to say that, having researched the matter, he believed the law to be in disarray. That was in 1990; here we are in 1996, and nothing has been resolved. The latest—30th—annual report of the Scottish Law Commission says about boundary walls:

"Because of the need to divert resources to more urgent matters, this project has been temporarily suspended."

That gives no sign of the urgency that should be applied to the matter by the Government and legal departments.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman may believe that changing overnight the law on such an issue, the interpretation of which is clear in the courts, would solve many problems, but it might create many more problems. It is the job of the Scottish Law Commission to investigate all the complexities surrounding the matter and reach conclusions. That it will do, and it would be wrong for the Scottish Office to try to pre-empt its consideration because, if it were to do so and it introduced legislation, that legislation might have to be changed immediately in the light of all the evidence.

The hon. Gentleman draws only one case to the attention of the House.

Mr. Donohoe rose—

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: May I go on to discuss consultation? I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will accept, as I do, that there can be no suggestion of compensation for costs arising from the original court case. Mr. Thom initiated the action against his neighbour at his own instance and chose to persist in that action. The judge found against Mr. Thom and awarded restricted expenses against him. It would be wrong for the Scottish Office to take a different view and award compensation to Mr. Thom, and it would be unfair to the other party in the case, his neighbour, who is also a constituent of the hon. Gentleman.

I can see no case for compensating Mr. Thom for costs that he incurred in pursuing his view of the law with the Scottish Law Commission and others; he did so by choice. Although the commission has been grateful for Mr. Thom's detailed submissions, it does not necessarily share Mr. Thom's view of the law, although it did use some aspects of the original case as material in its 1992 consultation paper. That paper records the position of both sides in the dispute and, of course, Lord Jauncey's judgment.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned a possible judicial review of Mr. Thom's case. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman appreciates why I cannot respond directly: it is for the courts, not the Scottish Office, to decide on individual legal cases. In this instance, Mr. Thom has unsuccessfully sought to bring his case to appeal and has since tabled another application to the Court of Session, which remains outstanding, so it would be inappropriate for me to comment on that aspect of the case at this stage.

The current law in Scotland in relation to domestic boundary walls is clear. Both householders own their half of the wall and they have a shared interest in the wall as a whole. That is a practical and commonsense view, and I suspect that many householders regard it as sensible. There may be a case for placing the current law on a statutory footing, but that issue can be argued with intensity both ways and it is best tackled when we have the considered views of the Scottish Law Commission on all related property law issues.

Finally, while I admire the tenacity shown by the hon. Gentleman's constituent in pursuing his view of the law, I cannot support his or the hon. Gentleman's conclusion that the law relating to boundary walls requires urgent change. The view of the law that Mr. Thom holds is based on judgments made in the 19th century. I cannot help feeling that, if the original case had gone in favour of Mr. Thom, we might now be debating whether a more modern interpretation of the law was required—perhaps at the instigation of another constituent of the hon. Gentleman.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this matter, and Mr. Thom's energy and application in pursuing a complex point of law are worthy of remark. Mr. Thom's case is a telling example of how a small domestic dispute can involve complex legal issues.

I consulted "The Laws of Scotland Stair Memorial Encyclopaedia" on boundary walls and fences. It begins with a short paragraph that hon. Members may believe sounds a warning note. In earlier times, boundaries, or "marches" as they were known, were set out with markers called march-stones, rather than walls or fences. March-stones could be moved and so were not entirely reliable. Stair records:

"When march-stones are solemnly set, boys used sometimes to be laid upon them and sharply whipt, whereby they will be able to remember, and be good witnesses as to those marches when they are old, that impression on their fancy lasting long."

The more modern use of boundary fences and walls may lead to some difficult legal problems, but at least small boys can rejoice in that connection.

As I understand it, the original case involving Mr. Thom began as a result of long-standing disagreement between him and his next-door neighbour. It centred on the boundary wall between the two properties. In 1982, Mr. Thom's neighbour created a fence along her side of the boundary wall. Mr. Thom argued that the erection of the fence had damaged the foundations of the wall and that the action of the wind on the fence caused further damage to the wall structure. In 1983, Mr. Thom raised an action in the Court of Session seeking a declaration that the wall was common property and that his neighbour should do nothing that would affect the wall without his consent. He sought to have the fence removed and the wall restored to its original condition.

The case was strongly contested on both sides, with Mr. Thom representing himself from a very early stage in the proceedings. By the time the case came before the court, the judge, Lord Jauncey, was so concerned about the expense of money and time on the case that he tried to encourage the parties to settle their dispute between themselves. He pointed out that the combined cost of replacing both the fence and wall was only about £2,000.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Time is up.

Electricity Generation (Billingshurst)

1.30 pm

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): I have to tell the House a cautionary tale of an event that has occurred in a beautiful part of my constituency, called Five Oaks, which lies between Billingshurst and Slinfold. It is an example of what can happen under existing planning legislation through expansion, by stealth in this case, by the utilities.

Without warning, in an attractive rural area, but close to a number of residential properties, a substantial diesel-fired 10 MW power generating station has been added to the three transformers and small brick shed that previously stood on the site.

The site itself has expanded, and the character of the undertaking has totally changed. The five new diesel generators, with tall gleaming chimneys, together with two massive oil storage tanks and associated pipework, completely dwarf the original set of buildings. The oil tanks and the associated pipework lie outside the fenced enclosures that formed the original transformer station.

The new installation is quite unprotected against vandalism. No proper precautions were taken against the leakage of oil and chemicals into the site and thence into the adjoining watercourse. That is exactly what has happened, with neat diesel being discharged from a field drain from the site.

Mr. Kelly, the clerk of Slinfold parish council, has told me that the council was given no notice of the development. He also told me that a fire has occurred, and a spillage of ethylene and 100 litres of diesel oil, which have polluted the river. That river is next to the watercourse, which flows into the Adur river, a short distance to the south. It is clear from what has happened that the development is a major potential hazard.

The other environmental consequence to consider is the damage caused by noise and the smell of diesel as a result of the plan to operate the generator for three hours every day. The five new generators and chimneys are visually obtrusive in the rural landscape, and it amounts to an industrial eyesore in one of the most beautiful parts of West Sussex.

The local community was offered no notice or opportunity to comment on that industrial intrusion. When I heard about it, I naturally took it up with the company concerned, Southern Electric. Mr. Wilson, the chairman, replied that the reliability of electrical supply to the area had given cause for concern since the storms of 1987. The generators were necessary to improve reliability. He did not just stress the reliability of supply, because he said:

> "In addition, small generating sets will be operated whenever pool prices of electricity is greater than the cost of generation. This is expected to be in the region of 3 to 4 hours on a winter's week day, and electricity wholesale prices have reached record levels recently."

He went on to describe the efforts taken to minimise the effects of noise and emissions as well the visual impact of the development. It seems to me that the best way to minimise them is not to build the plant in the first place.

The project was apparently discussed with the planning department of Horsham district council, which confirmed that it was a permitted development under conditions set out in the Town and Country Planning (General Development) Order 1988.

[Sir Peter Hordern]

I wrote to the Minister for Industry and Energy and asked him why those units, if they had to be built in the first place, could not have been built in an existing industrial zone. I wrote to the chairman of Southern Electric and asked him why he had not consulted local people. I asked him how he would like to wake up one morning to see a large diesel-fired 10 MW power generating station erected outside his office in Littlewick Green. I never had a reply to that point.

I also wrote to the Secretary of State for the Environment, asking him to call in the application, because I could see no reason why that type of development could not occur piecemeal all over the country. I wonder whether that is what the Government are prepared to see. Of course electricity companies want to make the best use of technology, but that natural desire should be measured and weighed against environmental issues in the normal planning process.

The Secretary of State replied to me on 19 January and said that he understood that Southern Electric constructed the station under permitted development rights comprised within part XVII of the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995. My right hon. Friend told me that, notwithstanding that statutory undertakers were not required to submit a formal planning application, they had agreed to consult the local planning authority and to publicise their intentions locally well in advance of work starting. In the case of Five Oaks, that, regrettably, was never done. Horsham district council says that Southern Electric's contact was informal, and quite unrelated to whether there would be any significant effect on the environment.

It is possible, apparently, for local planning authorities to make directions under article 4 of the general permitted development order to bring specific cases of permitted development within the scope of the development control system. That is possible, however, only in advance of the development, and depends, of course, on the planning authority being told exactly what the electricity company has in mind.

In any event, any such direction must be cleared subsequently by the Department of the Environment. The record to date shows that the Department seldom overturns the judgment of the local authority. So not only does the local authority require the endorsement of the DOE, but it may find that it is necessary to pay compensation for any development that is not carried out.

There then followed a meeting between Southern Electric and local residents, which should have been held long before, during which the company admitted that there had been just one failure on the 33 KW line during the past three years. There was therefore no need for undue excitement on its part to build the extra plant.

I then heard from Lord Crickhowell, who hon. Members will know is the chairman of the National Rivers Authority. He wrote to me saying that the installation of such a generating station falls outside the control of the planning authority and Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution. Why should that be? After all, pollution is pollution wherever it occurs and whatever the size of the development.

Moreover, it appeared from the meeting with local residents that the plant is on call to the grid and Southern Electric's supply company. That demonstrates not only that it was intended that the plant should generate extra power for distribution, but that assurances about operating hours were without meaning. So the plant can be called upon whenever commercial logic informs the generating company that it would be wise to use that extra power rather than to rely on the grid. That was never revealed to Horsham district council. It is therefore not merely a plant erected to cover shortages of supply, but a commercial undertaking.

Residents were told that, in an emergency, staff would be summoned from Petersfield, which is about 45 minutes away. They discovered that no arrangement had been made with the fire brigade. It was at that point that the Council for the Protection of Rural England became interested, and lent its support, mentioning not least the fact that, if such a development were to be allowed at Five Oaks under the permitted development legislation, there would be no reason why such developments should not occur in other parts of the country as often as generating companies wanted them.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Small Business, Industry and Energy told me that the procedures under the general development order would not apply where a station had a capacity of more than 50 MW. There lies the beginning of a solution. If that is the case, why do we not reduce the limit from 50 MW to a much lower figure? Southern Electric is planning a 40 MW station near Reading, and perhaps four or five others.

If Southern Electric is planning to do that, what about all the other electricity generating companies? Under existing legislation, they may find it possible to use the latest technology to put up such generators all over the country in the most beautiful rural areas—including yours, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is a matter of great importance.

What is to be done? My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will not call in the application, because it is impossible to do so when permission has been granted by the local authority. He says that he is satisfied that the present system whereby the statutory undertakers consult local planning authorities and publicise proposals which would have a significant effect on amenities and the environment works well. He is not persuaded that he should amend the general development order in respect of the permitted development rights of statutory undertakers.

However, this is a case in which the existing system has not worked as intended. I was therefore pleased to learn that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intends shortly to seek tenders for a research programme on the use of permitted development rights by statutory undertakers as part of the Department of the Environment's planning research programme for 1996-97.

I understand that the project would, among other things, establish the extent to which statutory undertakers rely on permitted development rights to carry out their activities—here is evidence for them—consider the scope for those rights to be altered, and examine the operation and effectiveness of the non-statutory consultation arrangements.

I hope that this short debate may be drawn to the attention of the researchers and amenities societies, which may have an interest in the matter. The case has shown that the statutory undertakers do not always conform with what is expected of them. They do not always tell planning authorities all they should about their intentions, nor do they consult local people when they should. The result is that electricity generating stations can spring up all over the country, without heed to environmental considerations and without consultation with local people.

One idea might be to limit developments under the existing legislation to, say, 30 MW, and to limit them to existing industrial areas. Why should it be necessary to generate electricity in the most beautiful rural parts of the country when so many industrial zones are available where less objection would be made? Surely it is desirable to do that rather than to have such developments in beautiful countryside like Five Oaks; otherwise, there will be much more invasion of the countryside as power generation technology improves.

I am glad to have had the opportunity to raise what could be a nationwide problem, and I look forward to what my hon. Friend the Minister has to say.

1.43 pm

The Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency (Mr. Robert B. Jones): I am delighted to have the opportunity to reply to the debate, because my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern), in all his years in the House, has managed something rare—a reputation both for the breadth of his knowledge on key national and international issues, and for being an assiduous constituency Member. On this issue, as on others, he has been tireless in representing his constituents' concerns. He has put his case today with characteristic fairness and accuracy, and so thoroughly that he has almost taken the words of my reply out of my mouth.

My right hon. Friend knows that some Horsham district councillors raised the matter with me on my recent visit to Horsham, and I recognise the concerns that it has aroused. Before I reply, I should like to say how much I was impressed by the town centre development in Horsham, and I congratulate all those who were involved with it. It is encouraging to see a thriving town centre into which a lot of thought has gone, and some fine new buildings.

I have listened carefully to the points made by my right hon. Friend. I hope that he will find it helpful if I first explain the legislation that controls the sort of development carried out at Slinfold, and our role, and that of the local planning authority.

Electricity supply companies, like other statutory undertakers, have permitted development rights under the Town and Country Planning (General Permitted Development) Order 1995, or GPDO. Those rights enable them to carry out certain developments that are necessary for them to perform their day-to-day activities without having to make planning applications.

The rights were given to statutory undertakers because they provide a service to the public and because it was felt that it would be unreasonable and inefficient to require them to make a planning application for routine development on every occasion. Part XVII, class G of the GPDO sets out the permitted development rights for electricity undertakings in connection with the generation, transmission or supply of electricity. Any development beyond the permitted rights as set out in part XVII requires planning permission in the normal way.

In exceptional circumstances, as my right hon. Friend said, a local planning authority may consider that the permitted development rights granted by the GPDO should be withdrawn. In such cases, they may make a direction under article 4 of the general development order, withdrawing the permitted development rights and requiring specific planning permission. Permitted development rights have been approved by Parliament, and consequently should not be withdrawn unless the circumstances are exceptional and the planning grounds for doing so compelling. Such a direction requires the approval of the Secretary of State before it can come into force.

Measures were introduced in June 1995 relating to permitted development and environmental assessment. They mean that, under certain conditions, development under permitted development rights, which normally does not require a planning application, will need formal planning approval if environmental assessment of the project is required.

The measures include a provision for developers to seek an opinion from the local planning authority, with a right of appeal to the Secretary of State, as to whether a particular permitted development project should be subject to environmental assessment, and hence whether a planning application, accompanied by an environmental statement, is required.

Development that is covered by the permitted development order does not require statutory consultation or publicity. However, it is considered desirable for there to be arrangements for advance publicity for individual proposals where appropriate. Arrangements for consultation are explained in paragraph 33 of the Department's circular 15/92, "Publicity for Planning Applications", and in paragraphs 9 to 12 of circular 9/95, "General Development Order Consolidation 1995".

The circular states that, although not governed by statutory provisions for publicity, statutory undertakers exercising their permitted development rights should inform both local planning authorities and the public of developments likely to have a significant effect on the amenity and environment well in advance of work starting. Where a proposal is notified to the local planning authority, adequate time should be allowed for it to consider whether it should advertise the proposal, and for discussion of ways in which the proposal might be amended to overcome any planning objections.

It has been suggested—both by those who feel that it could be extended and by others who consider that it needs to be restricted further—that the scope of the rights of statutory undertakers contained in the GPDO need to be reviewed. We have therefore, as my right hon. Friend said, approved a research project into the use of permitted development rights by statutory undertakers that will form part of the planning research project in 1996-97. It is expected that that will take place this autumn.

In the case of the Five Oaks sub-station, local residents have asked whether the Secretary of State could intervene in some way, but I have to tell my right hon. Friend that there is no scope for that where a development has already been carried out under permitted development rights. It is not possible to call in an application for which permission has been granted, in this case under the general development order, and the development completed.

As I have said, in exceptional circumstances it is possible to make a direction under article 4 of the general development order, withdrawing permitted development rights. However, as my right hon. Friend is aware, the district council maintains that it was given little information on the appearance and potential visual impact of the plant; nor did it have any indication from Southern Electric that the company considered the proposal to have the potential for a significant effect on amenity and the environment.

A consultant's report, commissioned by the company and made available to the council, advised that the development would not affect groundwater or, air quality, or create noise nuisance. In those circumstances, the district council considered it unlikely that it could have persuaded the Secretary of State that the circumstances of the case were so exceptional and the planning grounds so compelling that a direction would be justified.

I understand local concerns that the development has taken place apparently without informal consultation by the statutory undertaker with those most likely to be affected by its impact in terms of amenity and the environment. I was told by Horsham district council that consultation with Southern Electric in advance of the works being undertaken was solely to determine whether permitted development rights applied. Again, on the basis of the information provided by the company, the district council took the view that the generators would be permitted development, and would not therefore require a specific application for planning permission.

In view of the considerable concern about the size of the generators subsequently installed on the site, the council took advice, which confirmed its earlier view that the development benefited from permitted development rights. As I understand it, the critical point is that the generators, flues and tanks that have been installed are regarded as plant and machinery, and can be installed as permitted development without the need for prior approval of design and appearance. Those decisions were matters for the local planning authority as part of its responsibility for the development control system.

It is not for me to comment on the merits of the development, but perhaps wider consultation than that apparently undertaken in this instance might have allayed some of the fears about the operation of the generators and provided an opportunity for negotiation about the visual impact of the development. It is unfortunate that some local residents became aware of the development only when test running of the plant commenced, and certain incidents at the plant gave cause for alarm. I commend the parish council and other residents for their prompt action in pursuing their concerns with Southern Electric and with my right hon. Friend.

Southern Electric has stressed that the generators were placed at the location to improve the service provided to the locality, which should reduce the cost of providing electricity to its customers. Those commercial decisions are, of course, entirely for the company to make. However, it has recognised that the delay in commissioning the plant, spillage and the temporary failure of the generators to meet the noise specification have, unfortunately, caused local residents some distress.

I am pleased that the company has been able to give certain assurances about improvements in the operation of the plant, which should ensure that the effect on the locality is minimal. It has acknowledged that it may be some time before local residents can accept that the site will have minimal impact, but it has assured them that that is its intention.

When Horsham district council mentioned the matter to me, I suggested that representations from my right hon. Friend direct to Southern Electric might assist in achieving some remedial measures to resolve any outstanding problems. His intervention would appear to have had some good effect, because I understand that the metal flues have now been painted green, which has reduced the impact of the development in the locality.

Furthermore, the district council's chief environmental health officer is currently trying to resolve complaints about noise disturbance with the company. It has been suggested that that may be achieved only by erecting a building over the generators. To do that, Southern Electric would have to give the planning authority precise details of the design and external appearance of the building.

I very much hope that negotiations will continue, and that the problems will be resolved to the satisfaction of the local community. In the longer term, the research that we have commissioned can examine the question whether the permitted development rights of statutory undertakers should be restricted or amended in some way. I shall ensure that my right hon. Friend's concerns are drawn to the attention of my colleagues who have jurisdiction over the non-planning issues. I also confirm that the debate will be drawn to the attention of those involved in the research project, as my right hon. Friend requests.

I hope that I have set the concerns in context. I understand why my right hon. Friend's constituents are worried about the issue, and I assure him that he has done a great service in raising it today.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Defence-related Equipment

1. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total value of defence-related equipment manufactured in the United Kingdom and exported abroad in 1995. [18686]

The President of the Board of Trade and Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Ian Lang): Information is not yet available on the total value of equipment manufactured in the United Kingdom in 1995. However, in 1995 British defence equipment manufacturers won export orders worth some £5 billion. This represents 19 per cent. of the world market and retains our position as the world's second largest defence exporter, after the United States.

Mr. Evans: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the export of defence-related manufactured items is important to the United Kingdom because of the balance of trade and for the retention of manufacturing skills, particularly in companies such as British Aerospace, in Samlesbury and nearby Warton in my constituency, and in a number of smaller companies that supply equipment to British Aerospace? Will he therefore ignore the ignorant and politically correct pleas of a number of Labour Members who have asked him to cancel the Hawk order to Indonesia? Does he agree that if we were to go down that route it would be bad news for manufacturing jobs in Lancashire and the north-west, but good news for manufacturing jobs in France, Germany, Spain and other countries that compete with us in this field?

Mr. Lang: I agree with my hon. Friend. The greatest care and consideration were given to the Hawk trainer export licence to Indonesia, to which he referred. In the past few months, I have visited the Lancashire aerospace consortium. I was enormously impressed by the high technological skill of many companies engaged in the defence sector and by the civil engineering activities. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to link the two.

Mr. Barry Jones: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the situation would be better if he could say for certain that the future large aircraft will be constructed? Have the French killed off the project by saying that they will not invest in it? I emphasise to him that 2,200 aerospace workers in my constituency make the wings of the airbus family aircraft. If he could say that the British Government are determined that the future large aircraft will go forward and fly, he would give a big boost to my constituency and to other constituencies that have an interest in aerospace, particularly British Aerospace plc.

Mr. Lang: I agree with the hon. Gentleman on the importance of contracts of this kind, and I am glad that he recognises that. However, it would be premature to reach conclusions of the type that the hon. Gentleman invited me to reach—it is essentially a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall continue to take a close interest in the contract.

Sir John Cope: Will my right hon. Friend bear it in mind that, like other hon. Members, I welcome the jobs and the investment that the defence industry brings to my constituency? Will he make it clear that it is no good us thinking that our great defence companies could function without exports? They could not—not only would we lose exports but we would have to import.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. If we lost the export market in the defence industries, not only would we have potential difficulties in defence alliances with other countries which would turn to other manufacturers, but it would considerably undermine our high-technology manufacturing base in non-defence activities.

Mr. Harvey: Will the President of the Board of Trade comment on this morning's press reports which anticipate this evening's "Dispatches" television documentary in which it is alleged that the Department of Trade and Industry has part-funded market research into opportunities for British firms to export electric shock torture equipment to security services in middle eastern countries, including Qatar? Can the President of the Board of Trade tell us whether the DTI has funded such research?

Mr. Lang: I cannot comment on a television programme that I have not yet seen, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the Government deplore the use of torture or torture equipment and would never knowingly support the export of equipment for such purposes.

Mr. Gallie: I should like to identify with comments made earlier about the sale of the Hawk aircraft. Does my right hon. Friend recognise that there are some 2,200 jobs in British Aerospace in my constituency, where, I might say, there will be great sadness today, as there will be throughout Scotland?

I look to my right hon. Friend to ensure that sales of the Hawk aircraft continue to be made to countries throughout the world because, without doubt, finance from that has created great investment in my constituency.

Mr. Lang: I certainly recognise the merits of the employment created in my hon. Friend's constituency as a result of the activities of British Aerospace.

As regards the other matter to which my hon. Friend alluded, which is a source of great distress to many of us, there will be an opportunity on another occasion to refer to that.

Mr. Bell: I associate myself with the remarks of the President of the Board of Trade and the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Gallie) on the great sadness in Scotland today which the whole House shares.

The President of the Board of Trade will remember Lord Justice Scott's recommendation in relation to a consultation procedure on defence-related equipment in terms of empowering legislation, export licensing and procedures. He announced on 26 February that there would be consultation. How far has that progressed, when will the consultation document be published and can the right hon. Gentleman offer us legislation on the Scott report recommendations between now and the general election?

Mr. Lang: We are making as rapid progress as we can in our consideration of those matters and all the other matters on which we gave commitments following the publication of the Scott report. I expect that we shall be in a position to publish a consultation document on the export control legislation in the summer.

Nuclear Electricity

2. Mr. Pope: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the total cost to the Exchequer of the nuclear electricity industry following privatisation. [18687]

6. Mr. Eastham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the annual cost to the Exchequer of the nuclear electricity industry following privatisation. [18693]

The Minister for Industry and Energy (Mr. Tim Eggar): The external financing requirement of the nuclear electricity industry is shown in table 6A.5 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1996-97".

Mr. Pope: With the Red Book showing that the cost of privatising the nuclear industry in the first full year after privatisation will cost the Exchequer £650 million, is it not clear now to everybody except the Minister that consumers and taxpayers will be ripped off and that it is about time that the privatisation was stopped in its tracks?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman, as he knows, is completely misconstruing the figures. The important thing about nuclear privatisation is that it will transfer significant potential and actual liabilities into the private sector along with the assets that are being transferred into the private sector. Furthermore, the reorganisation of the nuclear generating industry will increase efficiency both in the soon to be privatised entity and of course in Magnox Electric.

Mr. Eastham: Is it not a fact that billions of pounds have been invested by the taxpayer in the industry, yet it is now proposed that it should be sold for £2.6 billion despite an expected profit during the next five years of £2 billion? Is that not a reckless way to use taxpayers' money?

Mr. Eggar: I recognise the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, which is that, with the benefit of hindsight, I am sure that the Labour party would not have made the kind of commitment to expenditure on advanced gas-cooled reactors that it made. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) will apologise to his hon. Friend.

Mr. Congdon: Given the benefits that have flowed to the consumer as a result of electricity privatisation, what assessment has my right hon. Friend made of the benefits that are likely to flow from this privatisation?

Mr. Eggar: Clearly, there have already been very significant benefits for electricity consumers following privatisation. The average electricity consumer's bill this year is likely to be about £90 less than it was two years ago. Furthermore, flowing from the decision to privatise the British Energy part of the nuclear industry, there is likely to be a further significant reduction, in excess of 6 per cent., in bills in future years.

Creating two new competing nuclear generating companies will put pressure on generating prices and will enable the whole generating industry to become more competitive and provide more flexibility, with lower prices for industrial and domestic consumers.

Mr. Battle: Is it not the case that, so far, the Minister for Industry and Energy has proposed flotation to the institutions without liabilities, and that he has then added in some—but not all—of the liabilities? Two weeks ago, a trade sale to the American company Duke Power was proposed, and yesterday a flotation of shares to the general public was suggested. Is not nuclear privatisation already proving to be a bad deal for taxpayers who will continue to foot the liabilities for years to come? Is this not the last desperate dash for cash for a tax bribe in November? Nuclear privatisation should be called off now because it is economically indefensible.

Mr. Eggar: The first part of the hon. Gentleman's question made it clear that he does not understand his brief. The second part of his question made it clear that he cannot even deliver the soundbite effectively.

Israel

3. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about trade between Britain and Israel. [18689]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Phillip Oppenheim): I am pleased to report that trade relations between Britain and Israel have never been better.

Bilateral trade last year reached £1.8 billion. United Kingdom visible exports in 1995 were £1.1 billion—almost exactly double the figure five years ago.

In December 1995, the first meeting of the Israel-Britain Business Council was opened in London by my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and the Israeli Minister of Industry and Trade. The council, established last March by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister during his visit to Israel, is a new bilateral private sector forum to expand commercial links of all types between Britain and Israel.

Mr. Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that trade between Britain and Israel is inevitably linked to the success of the peace process? Does he also agree that the conference of world leaders discussing anti-terrorism in Egypt today will play an important role in the success of the peace process? Will my hon. Friend therefore condemn the failure of the leaders of Syria to attend that conference?

Mr. Oppenheim: We all particularly condemn the extreme cowardice of terrorism against civilians. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is today attending the Sharm el-Sheikh conference, which is intended to put the peace process back on track. We can all agree that it is a great shame that Syria, which is a major player in the region, is not at the conference. Trade and peace go hand in hand, and open and interdependent trading relations make it less likely that countries will go to war. That is why the growing trade relations between Israel and other Arab states are greatly to be welcomed.

Manufacturing Industry

4. Mr. Atkins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received about manufacturing industry in the north-west of England. [18690]

The Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs (Mr. John M. Taylor): Other DTI Ministers and I regularly receive representations about manufacturing industry in the north-west. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, as he said a moment ago, has discussed issues facing manufacturers with the Consortium of Lancashire Aerospace and, more recently, has received representations on behalf of the automotive sector in the north-west.

Mr. Atkins: Is my hon. Friend aware of the success story that is manufacturing industry in the north-west of England, with large companies such as British Aerospace and Leyland Trucks and smaller companies such as Schwan's Pizzas and Centurion Furniture doing extremely well in South Ribble? Does he agree that the cry must be "Do not let Labour ruin it"?

Mr. Taylor: I would, of course, agree with my right hon. Friend. He has hit the nail on the head and he is right about the success story. The manufacturing sector in the north-west is second only to the south-east in value, and there are some well-deserved success stories. I was not aware of the success of the pizza and furniture companies, but I know about Leyland Trucks and its deal with Isuzu Motors of Japan and about British Aerospace, the Eurofighter and the airbus. That is all very good news for the north-west and it has been supported by inward investment.

Mr. Pike: Will the Minister recognise that aerospace is extremely important to Lancashire? I am glad that he has met the consortium. Will he further recognise that if British Airways insisted on British engines and on using the European airbus, with its British components, that would be a tremendous boost to this country's aerospace industry?

Mr. Taylor: I have never been in favour of compulsory "Buy British" policies, but we ought to look optimistically at the fact that British goods will sell because of British quality.

Mr. Dover: Will the Minister convey to his colleague the Minister for Industry and Energy the grateful thanks of many manufacturing firms in the Chorley and South Ribble area for the efforts made to ensure that Konver European funding will be available to help us get out of defence-related industries and into more peace-related activities?

Mr. Taylor: I understand that my hon. Friend is talking about no less than £84 million. I shall make sure that his message is relayed to my Department and to the north-west Government office.

Sub-Post Offices

5. Mr. Tyler: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the profitability of the sub-post office network. [18691]

Mr. Oppenheim: This is primarily an operational matter for the Post Office. The Post Office Counters network as a whole is profitable and over 95 per cent. of the 19,500 post offices are privately owned and operated sub-post offices which are usually run in conjunction with other retail businesses.

Mr. Tyler: Is the Minister aware of the recent survey in Devon and Cornwall showing that 58 per cent. of sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses are being forced to consider selling up, chiefly because of the impact of the uniform business rate, which is a Government responsibility? Will he acknowledge that it does not require legislation to extend hardship relief to all village sub-post offices? Will he also acknowledge how important they are to the life of villages, and undertake to make representations to his colleagues in the Department of the Environment, the Welsh Office and the Scottish Office, to bring in legislation as soon as possible, if that proves necessary? In the meantime, the current hardship relief should be extended to village post offices.

Mr. Oppenheim: I have great sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's points. I have not seen the survey to which he refers, however. We are committed to maintaining a nationwide network of post offices, particularly in rural areas where, as we all recognise, they are very important. We are trying to help sub-post offices, first by introducing new technology—especially the automation project, which is expected to go on stream early next year. We are also allowing Post Office Counters to sell new products, which should help, and we are allowing the Post Office more commercial freedom.

In rural areas there can be problems when sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses retire—it is sometimes difficult to fill their places. I know that there have been three closures in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, but I understand that two of those sub-post offices have subsequently reopened.

I accept that there is concern about the business rate. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister recently said that he would look at it again. In any case, I shall certainly look carefully at the document that the hon. Gentleman mentioned if he will send it to me.

Mr. Waller: Will my hon. Friend confirm that information technology and the installation of terminals in sub-post offices will provide the latter with great new opportunities and help to secure their position in the many communities in which they play such an important role?

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We are pushing forward the automation project as rapidly as possible. I am pleased to say that we hope that the first terminals will be installed at the beginning of next year; others will then rapidly be installed over the course of 1997.

Dr. Howells: Why has there been such a delay in the installation of new equipment in the 20,000 sub-post offices? Why has the cost of administering the private finance initiative to pay for this work mounted so rapidly? The public sector team allocated to the project has grown to at least 100 officials, and bidding costs alone will amount to £40 million—several times the cost of a traditional procurement.

Mr. Oppenheim: With respect, I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman has got his facts exactly right. This is a very large project which involves linking in Departments such as the Department of Social Security. It is important for that Department's recipients that we get the technology right. We are determined to ensure that when it goes in, it works properly. That is better than rushing it, with the result that some social security recipients might end up with problems. It is an enormous project. Automation equipment will be installed in almost 20,000 sub-post offices and post offices. As far as I am aware, the project is unique in the western world. I do not think that any other country is pushing forward automation as radically as we are. It is important that we get it right, and I am confident that the first terminals will come on stream next year.

Mr. Harris: I accept that there is a real problem with the uniform business rate, but does my hon. Friend agree that the incomes of many rural post offices and sub-post offices have been boosted considerably by the national lottery, and does he have any figures on that?

Mr. Oppenheim: I do not have any figures to hand, but my hon. Friend is right. The incomes of sub-post offices have been boosted by the national lottery, and the range of new products that we are allowing Post Office Counters to sell will particularly help to maintain the rural network.

Overall, there are some 19,500 post offices, and the number has changed little over the past six years. We are absolutely committed to ensuring that the post office network is maintained, because we recognise how important it is to rural areas.

Merchant Shipbuilding

7. Dr. Godman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the approximate number of men and women currently employed in (a) merchant shipbuilding yards and (b) oil and gas fabrication yards; and what were the equivalent figures in 1987. [18694]

The Minister for Small Business, Industry and Energy (Mr. Richard Page): On the latest available figures—for 1993—39,900 men and 3,800 women were employed in shipbuilding, ship repair and boatbuilding, compared with 53,000 men and 4,400 women in 1987. Comparable figures between the two years for shipbuilding alone are not available.

Statistics are not collected for oil and gas fabrication yards on their own, but the Offshore Contractors Association estimates that up to 10,000 men and women are employed by such yards.

Dr. Godman: Is the Minister in a position to estimate how many of those employees are apprentices? In the distant past when I was an apprentice shipwright, the employment ratio was one apprentice for every six tradesmen. What is the Minister's Department doing to ensure that those skills are maintained by a healthy number of apprenticeships being served by young men and women, or is it standing idly by and allowing those skills to run down?

Mr. Page: The hon. Gentleman and I can claim some brotherhood on this matter because I also served an industrial apprenticeship. I am fully aware of the value of an apprentice education and of its value to the nation. I must point out, however, that this is a matter for the Department for Education and Employment, with which we are in communication. We want more modern apprenticeships to give that core technology and skills base and to move it forward. At the moment, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the figures, but I can tell him that in the period about which he asked, although the number of employees decreased, efficiency in British yards increased from some 247,000 tonnes to some 288,000 tonnes, so there has been an improvement.

Mr. Batiste: Although all of us would like more young people to obtain relevant industrial qualifications, what assessment has my hon. Friend made of the impact of the minimum wage on the recruitment and training of young people? Such a policy, as advocated by the Labour party, would be disastrous for the employment and qualification prospects of our young people.

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend makes a valuable point. Companies are locating and investing in this country because we have the right environment and economic background in which they can develop and grow. There is no doubt whatever that a minimum wage would be disastrous for employment prospects. It is not a coincidence that unemployment is falling in the United Kingdom but rising in the European Union, where there are such restrictions. One question that I should like to ask the Labour party is: what will be the minimum wage? [Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. I think that the Minister was answering the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste).

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the Minister share my concern that fewer merchant ships are flying the British flag and that a significant number of them are no longer crewed by British merchant sailors? Will he welcome the fact, as revealed in a recent periodical, that Belfast is poised to become the Aberdeen of the next decade because of its role in oil and gas exploration?

Mr. Page: The hon. Gentleman has given me a very good lead-in, enabling me to pay tribute to the recent successes of Harland and Wolff. I hope that those successes increase, and provide many jobs in Northern Ireland. As for the question of flagging out, that is indeed up to the individual companies involved; it is not a matter for the British Government.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Has my hon. Friend any idea of the number of new orders that have been won by British shipyards for merchant vessels, and the number of jobs involved? Has he taken action against our European partners and others in regard to the provision of state aids that have been featherbedding their shipbuilders rather than allowing the productivity of the British worker to win new orders?

Mr. Page: There is an agreement by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development to abolish any direct support schemes, which should come into effect on 15 July, assuming that Japan and the United States ratify it. If they do not, the Government and the European Union will have to re-examine the position.

There is no doubt that there is overcapacity in the world and very hard pressure on prices, but British shipping is doing quite well. In contrast, in Bremen Vulkan in Germany some 23,000 people are threatened with some form of bankruptcy, and hence with unemployment. Here in the United Kingdom, good news is coming through from Swan Hunter; Appledore continues to maintain a full order book; Kvaerner Govan has a contract worth some £61.5 million to build a vessel to support the launch of a western communications satellite by Ukrainian rockets from a sea platform—it should be exciting when that starts—and Ferguson Shipbuilders, in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, has recently won an order worth some £19.3 million to build a fisheries research vessel for the Scottish Office. There is quite good news for British shipping at the moment.

Domestic Gas Supplies

8. Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will discuss with the Office of Gas Supply measures to improve the security of gas supplies to domestic consumers. [18695]

Mr. Page: I was sorry to hear of the supply failure that affected part of the hon. Gentleman's constituency during the exceptionally severe weather last December. The stringent security standards set out in the gas licences are appropriate to ensure that such events are rare.

Mr. Home Robertson: The Minister knows that 5,000 households in my constituency had their gas supplies cut off during the Arctic weather at the end of December, with dire consequences. We still await the Ofgas report. Is the Minister aware that the compensation paid by British Gas is derisory, and that the excuses offered by TransCo—that it was very cold, and that consumers were using too much gas—are laughable? Does he accept that gas consumers have a right to expect secure gas supplies in cold weather, and that effective and binding contractual conditions must be imposed on this wholly profitable privatised utility?

Mr. Page: I accept what the hon. Gentleman says. He has been a doughty battler on behalf of his constituents. I must point out, however, that public gas transporters are required to design their systems to meet peak demands that are likely to occur once in 20 years, and that the demands in late December were likely to occur once in 80 years.

Having said that, let me add that British Gas TransCo has offered those who were disconnected compensation of some £20 per day of disconnection. Moreover, I understand that it plans to reinforce the local system as part of an on-going work programme—some 1.25 km is involved—to ensure that the situation does not occur again.

Mr. John Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that, notwithstanding the difficulty encountered by the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) in his constituency, gas supplies generally are much more secure than electricity supplies, which are more likely to be disrupted by the kind of weather that we have seen over the past few months? Is that not the reason why more and more people would like their homes to be connected to gas, and will he ensure that British Gas continues to take every opportunity to ensure that it is available in rural areas where it is not currently available?

Mr. Page: I can only say to my hon. Friend that the answer must be yes, we must try to ensure that the gas network expands. One of the reasons why people wish to connect to gas is that in real terms gas prices are down by some 23 per cent., excluding VAT, to domestic users and by some 46 per cent. to industry. When the south-west becomes open to free and open competition, prices to the domestic consumer will decrease by a further 15 to 20 per cent., so it is no wonder that people want to sign up for gas.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Will the Minister investigate the Gas Consumers Council's complaints that elderly people have been left without heating because the gas company puts a 30-minute limit on the time that it allows for fault repairs? What kind of Government would introduce legislation such as the Gas Act 1995 which permits a company to act in such an indefensible way?

Mr. Page: Once again, the hon. Gentleman is saying things that are not completely accurate. It is nothing to do with the Gas Act. When there was a disconnection in the constituency of the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), British Gas provided heaters for people who were most vulnerable.

Manufactured Exports

9. Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of exported manufactured goods for the year 1994-95; and if he will make a statement. [18696]

Mr. Lang: In 1995, the value of exported manufactured goods was £127.5 billion, a substantial increase over the figure for 1994.

Mr. Dunn: In congratulating all the people in industry who are responsible for such an outstanding result, does my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade agree that nothing could be more destructive of the United Kingdom's export success than the introduction of the social chapter and of the minimum wage, and the implementation of some of the European Court's dafter decisions?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The improved productivity of manufacturing industry has been the secret of so much of our success and of the growth in employment, output and exports in that sector. That productivity growth of 80 per cent. since the Government came to office would be severely undermined if we accepted either the social chapter or a national minimum wage.

Mrs. Clwyd: Does the calculation of value include possible losses under the export credits guarantee system? The President of the Board of Trade will recall that his Department lost £652 million of taxpayers' money in exporting so-called non-lethal equipment to Iraq—or has he refined his policies since then?

Mr. Lang: According to my recollection, the hon. Lady's figures in relation to defence equipment are wrong by a substantial margin, but I will of course check them. I hope that she realises that the purpose of the Export Credits Guarantee Department is to provide the insurance cover that our exporters need. It is matched by comparable schemes in other countries. Without it, it would be impossible for many companies to break into export markets and to achieve those remarkable and record export figures.

Mr. Sykes: Following my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), is my right hon. Friend aware that the French Government recently had to export a large contract to Pindars in my constituency of Scarborough because French companies cannot compete with companies in Britain? Is that not because we do not have the social chapter, the minimum wage and the 48-hour week?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He will welcome, as I do, the fact that since 1981 the United Kingdom's volume of exports has risen faster than that of Germany, Italy or France, to which he refers.

Mrs. Beckett: Why does the Secretary of State agree with his hon. Friends when he must be aware that despite exporting success, which we all welcome, the level of imports of manufactured goods into this country is even higher and we have a net deficit of £8 billion? Many of the countries which export more successfully to us than we do to them are signatories of the social chapter and have national minimum wage type provision. Manufacturers argue that that substantial net deficit is due to the fact that we have too few world-class manufacturing companies, too few skilled workers for them to hire, and too little research and development and long-term investment. Why do Ministers not listen for once to manufacturers and to Labour Members and introduce the measures, such as investment allowances, that they urge on the Government to help solve those problems?

Mr. Lang: We do not need lessons in this matter from the Labour party. From 1974 to 1979, the Labour Government's last period of office, we had the slowest growth in manufacturing productivity and the slowest growth in output of any country in the European Union. Through the period of office of this Government, there has been the highest growth in both productivity and output of any country in the EU. As the right hon. Lady will have seen from figures published recently, we now have a visible trade surplus with the EU.

Shipbuilding

10. Mr. Hutton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the future prospects for the shipbuilding industry. [18697]

Mr. Page: I am pleased that United Kingdom shipyards are continuing to improve their competitiveness and win orders in the face of very difficult international market conditions.

Mr. Hutton: What action will the Government be taking to ensure that British shipbuilders, such as VSEL in my constituency, will not be disadvantaged by hidden or indirect subsidies paid by foreign Governments to their shipbuilding industries? Will the hon. Gentleman join me in congratulating VSEL on recently winning two new orders to build merchant ships in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Page: As I said earlier, there is an OECD agreement to abolish direct support schemes. It will come into force on 15 July, assuming that Japan and the United States both ratify it. If the hon. Gentleman or any company has any evidence of unfair subsidies, the DTI would be only too eager to investigate those allegations. The order for two merchant vessels is a tribute to VSEL. It shows that, subsidy or not, that company has not been prevented from gaining orders.

Sir Donald Thompson: When considering shipbuilding, will my hon. Friend ensure that he does not forget the large boat and yacht building industry in the United Kingdom, the products of which employ many thousands of British men and women throughout the world?

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. When UK yards concentrate on vessels for ownership and use in north-west Europe, where they do not face competition from Japanese and Korean yards, they do extremely well. The boat building industry is a valuable contributor to the UK economy.

Foundry Industry

11. Mr. Canavan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will arrange to meet representatives of the foundry industry to discuss prospects for the industry. [18698]

Mr. Page: The President has no plans to meet representatives of the foundry industry. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and Energy met representatives from the foundry industry on 16 November 1995.

Mr. Canavan: Bearing it in mind that the British foundry industry employs 52,000 people, is the Minister aware of the concern about a crippling burden on the industry if the higher rate of landfill tax is imposed? In view of the recycling nature of the industry and the fact that most of its waste consists of inert sand and slag, may we have an absolute assurance that the industry will be charged the lower rather than the higher rate of landfill tax?

Mr. Page: All that I can say to the hon. Gentleman at this stage is that the matter is out for consultation. It is with Customs and Excise at present and I know that the foundry industry is heavily involved in those discussions.

I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising the whole question of the foundry industry. I pay tribute to the DTI's Foundry 2000 initiative. For the first time in three decades the decline in the number of tonnes produced has been halted and production is on the way up again. It is forecast that by the year 2000 production will be 1.45 million tonnes, which is a considerable improvement in the right direction.

Scott Report

12. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to paragraph D4.42 of Lord Justice Scott's report, if a fear of strong public opposition was a factor in determining the nature of the answer to the hon. Member for Linlithgow concerning al-Hillal deemed by Sir Richard Scott to be a deliberate failure to inform Parliament. [18700]

Mr. Lang: No.

Mr. Dalyell: As a former Secretary of State for Scotland, the right hon. Gentleman will have as little stomach as I have for indulging in Question Time today, in the light of Dunblane.

With regard to al-Hillal, why was the House of Commons deceived? That is what Lord Justice Scott said. If the specific questions that I tabled on al-Hillal had been answered truthfully, would not the whole course of events in the arms-to-Iraq saga have been different? Should there not have been a truthful answer to a proper parliamentary question?

Mr. Lang: It remains the Government's clear and very firm view that the House of Commons was not deceived. I recognise that Sir Richard Scott concluded that some of the information given to the House, whether in parliamentary answers or in correspondence, was inaccurate, but he also acknowledged the good faith and sincerity with which those views were advanced by my right hon. and hon. Friends. It is quite clear that they did not knowingly mislead the House. It remains my view, and that of my right hon. and hon. Friends, that the House was not knowingly misled.

Manufacturing Industry

13. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are his policies for the promotion of British manufacturing industry. [18701]

Mr. Oppenheim: The Government attach high priority to manufacturing as an important and growing sector of our economy. There has been an enormous improvement in our manufacturing performance, which will be sustained and built on if we maintain sound monetary policy and low interest rates, and refuse to burden industry with a minimum wage and the social chapter.

Mr. Winterton: Now that the Confederation of British Industry has sidelined yet again its support for manufacturing industry, thus justifying my establishing the all-party manufacturing and construction industries alliance, may I urge the Government to redouble their efforts, as they are doing in the textile industry, to encourage import substitution by identifying goods in which we have a trade deficit, and liaise with industry in bringing forward proposals to encourage British suppliers to compete for orders which otherwise—sadly—will go overseas?

Mr. Oppenheim: My hon. Friend is right to emphasise the importance of manufacturing to the British economy. The best way to improve business prospects and manufacturing in Britain is to carry on running the economy sensibly with a sensible monetary and fiscal policy, to ensure that taxes are not too high and to try to improve the education system—often in the teeth of opposition from Labour local education authorities.

Many important high-tech sectors of British manufacturing have done very well over the past 16 years. In pharmaceuticals, for example, we have moved from being the third largest exporter to being the largest exporter, having overtaken Switzerland and the United States. Our aerospace industry has also done extremely well, especially in very high-tech aero engines, in which Rolls-Royce has increased its share of the civil air engine market from 10 per cent. to 30 per cent. In many high-tech sectors, Britain has done very well and it is very important that we continue with that progress. I am not sure that an interventionist sector-by-sector approach is necessarily the best way to take that forward, but I agree with my hon. Friend's underlying point.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the Minister encourage his colleagues to stop gloating when the German, French or Spanish economies get into any trouble and remember that they are our major customers for manufacturing products and that when they start getting into trouble, it is not long before we follow them into recession? Will he remember that the lead element needed to reactivate British manufacturing is top-quality managers? Are the actions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment encouraging that development by cutting university education, university postgraduate education and business schools? Is that the right way to tackle our manufacturing dilemmas?

Mr. Oppenheim: I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of education to the overall competitiveness of the economy. However, I should point out that the number of people aged 16 and over in higher and further education has trebled under the Government. The hon. Gentleman should pay tribute to the progress that we have made. A recent survey showed that in the late 1970s the competitiveness and productivity gap between Britain and Germany widened. That gap has narrowed by 75 per cent. since 1979 and it is a tribute to the progress that we have made in making British manufacturing more productive and competitive since that time.

Mrs. Roche: Let us keep talking about 1979, because since then investment in manufacturing has fallen by 10 per cent. in real terms. Does that not explain why some small businesses in that sector are so disillusioned with the Government, who have totally failed to make this country the enterprise centre of Europe, as claimed by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Oppenheim: I am delighted to concentrate on 1979, because I remember that manufacturing output fell under the Labour Government, whereas it has grown sharply under the Conservative Government. Not only that, but business investment and manufacturing productivity have risen at twice the rate they did under the Labour Government.

Domestic Gas Supplies

14. Mr. Luff: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he plans to extend competition in the supply of gas for domestic consumers to Worcestershire. [18702]

Mr. Eggar: Domestic gas consumers in Worcestershire will be able to benefit from competition in the supply of gas from a date to be determined in 1998. Experience in the first phase of competition in the south-west suggests that consumers may be offered average savings of 15 to 20 per cent. on their gas bills—and more in some cases.

Mr. Luff: Does my right hon. Friend understand that of all the policies that he pursued during the three years during which I had the privilege to be his parliamentary private secretary—[HON. MEMBERS: "Give him a job."]—probably none will bring greater benefit to ordinary consumers than competition in the supply of domestic gas? For precisely the reason set out in my right hon. Friend's answer—the sharp reduction in prices that competition will bring consumers in the trial area—does he understand my enthusiasm to ensure that my constituents have that benefit at the earliest possible date?

Mr. Eggar: I thank my hon.—and close—Friend for his opening comment. I assure him that I am doing my best to live up to the standards that he set. There is no doubt that domestic consumers will benefit immensely from the Gas Act 1995. The information that we have already received from the south-west trial area shows not only that consumers of average quantities of gas will benefit, but that low-quantity consumers will benefit, too. At least two of the competitors have offered consumers tariffs involving no standing charge, thereby exposing as a fraud the constant accusation from the Opposition Front Bench that gas competition will benefit only averagely-off consumers and not low-volume and therefore often lower-income consumers.

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Madam Speaker: The substantive question relates to Worcestershire only.

Mr. Foulkes: Thank you, Madam Speaker. Can the Minister say whether gas consumers in Worcestershire, in the south-west of England—[HON. MEMBERS: "Where?"]—in the west country—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."]—in the west midlands, not far from your constituency, Madam Speaker, if they get competition in gas supply, will be any luckier than a constituent of mine in Coylton, who on 6 December ordered a—

Madam Speaker: Order. That was a good try, but it is out of order. I call Ms Jean Corston, who I am sure will do a lot better.

British Gas (Executive Salaries)

15. Ms Corston: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received from the south-west office of the Gas Consumers Council about the salary provision of the chairman and chief executive of British Gas. [18703]

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have received no such representations.

Ms Corston: The chairman of British Gas has just retired on £250,000 a year, with a pension package worth £3 million, while complaints against British Gas in the south-west region doubled to 3,000 last year. Does the Minister think that the decision to axe 25,000 skilled jobs in the gas industry has contributed to the soaring number of complaints? Why does boardroom pay continue to go through the roof while people are expected to put up with poorer service?

Mr. Taylor: First, the chairman of British Gas has not retired. Secondly, why does the hon. Lady not consider instead the best interests of consumers in her constituency? We believe that competition is the consumer's best friend, and it is about to commence in her area, with a pilot scheme starting on 29 April. That is eagerly awaited by consumers, who stand to gain considerably from it.

Sir Michael Grylls: Is my hon. Friend aware that my constituents in Surrey would very much like the opportunity to choose an alternative supplier for their gas and would welcome competition? Will he and his colleagues in the Government do all that they can to bring about and spread competition as quickly as possible?

Mr. Taylor: So far as I am concerned, we cannot spread competition fast enough. However, we need to complete the pilot in the south-west which begins on 29 April, and learn the lessons from it with all speed so that the advantages can be spread to my hon. Friend's constituents as well.

Trade Balance

16. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measures he is taking to improve the visible trade balance in the forthcoming 12 months. [18705]

Mr. Oppenheim: Through Overseas Trade Services, the DTI provides the best ever package of information, advice and practical assistance to all British companies wishing to explore new export opportunities.

Mr. McAvoy: That entirely complacent answer from the Minister totally ignores the ever-widening deficit. Is the Minister aware that 1995 was the 13th successive year that the United Kingdom had an annual world visible trade deficit? Whereas we welcome proper measures to reduce that deficit, is not the Government's record appalling and is not the best and only way to improve the country's economic performance for the present Government to go?

Mr. Oppenheim: The hon. Gentleman will not expect me to agree with his last comment, although I agree with him about the importance of the trade balance of the manufacturing sector. I remind him that in the 1960s and 1970s our trading position deteriorated steadily under Governments of both colours, but since the mid-1980s we have maintained our share of world trade for the first time in many decades and exports of manufactured goods have increased at twice the rate they did under the last Labour Government.

Mr. Garnier: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the best ways to improve the visible trade balance is to continue the Government's strong economic policies, to discourage the imposition of a minimum wage and to discourage the introduction of the social chapter?

Mr. Oppenheim: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. The best way to empower workers and increase their bargaining power at the workplace is not by intervening artificially in wage contracts, but by ensuring that workers have a good education and good training so that they are valuable and productive to their employers. It is fundamentally dishonest for the Opposition to pretend to British workers that there is an easy, painless way to increase wages without a commensurate increase in productivity. Come the general election, people will be asking members of the Labour party at what level they intend to set the minimum wage; unless they can answer that question, no one will take that key Labour policy seriously.

Export Contracts (Language Barriers)

17. Mr. Rendel: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the proportion of British export contracts lost because of communication difficulties caused by language barriers in the most recent year for which information is available. [18707]

Mr. Oppenheim: A survey of UK companies carried out in 1995 as part of the DTI's national languages for export campaign showed that 25 per cent. of exporting companies had lost trade due to language barriers.

Mr. Rendel: Given that that must mean a considerable loss of export revenues, what does the Minister plan by way of incentives to British companies to ensure that they train their employees more effectively in languages?

Mr. Oppenheim: Uncharacteristically, I agree with that great German socialist Willy Brandt about that. He was a socialist in the days when socialists really were socialists and one knew where they stood. He said—I hope that the House will excuse my accent:

"If I am selling to you, I speak your language; if I am buying, dann müssen Sie deutsch sprechen."

I agree with those sentiments, and I will send the hon. Gentleman a list of the incentives and initiatives that the DTI is taking forward in that direction.

Mr. Viggers: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is easy for us to become complacent because English is the language of international trade? There is a remarkable disparity, for instance, in the number of Japanese learning English and the number of English learning Japanese. Will my hon. Friend encourage English people to study Japanese?

Mr. Oppenheim: I agree with my hon. Friend. People sometimes go too far in taking advantage of the fact that English is the lingua franca—to coin a mis-phrase—and become complacent. As a result, it can be a disadvantage rather than an advantage. It is important that British exporters should take the trouble to learn the languages of their customers, and I am pleased to say that the number of Japanese language courses in British schools and universities has increased dramatically in recent years.

Mr. MacShane: An earlier German Chancellor, Otto von Bismarck—who spoke Russian, French and English—said that learning foreign languages was a matter for head waiters. He was quite wrong, of course, and German business men speak very good English. As we have Trade and Industry Ministers on the Government Front Bench who are barely capable of speaking English, perhaps I should ask the Minister whether he could conduct this Question Time in a foreign language. If he cannot, will he go and learn one after he loses his seat in the next general election?

Mr. Oppenheim: I know from my various experiences with the hon. Gentleman on the ski slopes that he is an expert linguist and fluent in French, German and, I think, Spanish, which might qualify him for a job as a mâitre d'. When he gets that job, perhaps he will produce a menu with prices rather than a menu without prices, which characterises Labour's minimum wage policy.

Nuclear Electricity

18. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the current timetable for nuclear privatisation. [18708]

Mr. Eggar: Privatisation of the nuclear power generation industry is expected in the summer.

Mr. Prentice: Why was there no mention of nuclear privatisation in the 1992 Conservative manifesto but only a reference to a review of it? Is it not a deceit and a deception of the British public for £2.5 billion of assets to be handed over—perhaps to the dodgy American company, Duke Power, whose safety record has been absolutely deplorable?

Mr. Eggar: There was a reference in the manifesto to a review, and it was carried out. It concluded that we should move forward to privatise the nuclear industry. As for the outrageous comments towards the end of the hon. Gentleman's question, there are few things that I despise more than people who bring safety fears into the Chamber of this House.

Metrication

21. Dr. Wright: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the effects on business and consumers of the recent metrication of weights and measures. [18711]

Mr. John M. Taylor: My Department carefully assessed the costs to business of complying with the latest metrication changes. Between 1988 and 1993, we consulted business organisations, consumer groups and others, who generally supported further metrication because of the very real savings and other benefits that this would bring. The latest changes are part of a process started by the Labour Government in 1965.

Dr. Wright: Has not metrication of weights and measures produced a great increase in burdens on business and confusion for consumers? Is it not even more disgraceful that the over-regulation of an EU directive by the previous deregulation Minister—the former President of the Board of Trade, now the Deputy Prime Minister—was responsible for this measure in the first place? Is it not an outrage that we have the measure, an outrage that it was introduced without discussion in Parliament and a further outrage that it was introduced by the deregulator-in-chief?

Mr. Taylor: That is quite a lot of outrage for one afternoon. The fact is that it is extremely important for British trade to sell in metric units throughout the world. The hon. Gentleman would not make much headway if he tried to sell in quarts, for example, in Italy. The British people and British consumers wanted metrication. Consumers seem to be taking it in their stride, and I am not aware of a single criminal prosecution being brought by a trading standards department.

Manufacturing Industry

24. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what new measures he is taking to promote investment by British companies in domestic manufacturing industry. [18714]

Mr. Oppenheim: Low inflation, low tax rates, low interest rates and sound public finances are the best stimuli to investment. Manufacturing investment rose by more than 6 per cent. in 1994 and 1995, and the Confederation of British Industry expects a further increase of 9 per cent. this year.

Mr. Hughes: Has the Minister noticed that our major companies are investing heavily overseas but are tending to neglect the domestic market? I do not know whether incentives are necessary, but we certainly need to invest in the domestic market to increase efficiency and to create new jobs.

Mr. Oppenheim: I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of investment. He will no doubt be pleased to know that investment rose quite sharply last year and is forecast to do the same this year. It is rising at the fastest rate since 1988. We are an international economy, and it right in an open, global market that British companies should invest at home as well as abroad.

Conferences and Meetings

27. Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his estimate of the United Kingdom's share of the international conference and meetings industry. [18717]

Mr. Page: The British Tourist Authority estimates that 490,000 visitors came to the United Kingdom for conferences and meetings in 1994. My Department has no estimate of the share that that figure represents of the international conference and meetings industry.

Mr. Atkinson: Does my hon. Friend agree that in that intensely and fiercely competitive world industry, this country does well, including the Bournemouth international conference centre in my constituency? What effect does he think that a 48-hour working rule and a national minimum wage would have on the competitiveness of our industry and its ability to compete successfully with the rest of the world?

Mr. Page: My hon. Friend makes a point that has been mentioned once or twice already this afternoon. The British Tourist Authority estimates that £285 million is currently spent by overseas delegates, an average of £582 per delegate. There is absolutely no doubt that the restrictions of the social contract and a minimum wage would inhibit our ability to offer conference facilities and ensure that people would not be so willing to come to the United Kingdom.

Point of Order

3.30 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Members will have heard with horror of what occurred in Dunblane this morning in an appalling incident that has left 16 young children and a teacher dead and many others injured. I know that the whole House would wish me to express not only our horror but our heartfelt sympathy to the families of those killed or injured and to everyone else in what is this afternoon a shocked and grieving community. That shock and grief will be shared throughout the country.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, who is also the constituency Member, has gone to Dunblane with the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), who lives there and whose children attended the school where this terrible tragedy took place.

We shall arrange for a full statement to be made to the House tomorrow. I should also tell the House that following discussions in the usual channels it has been agreed that it would not be appropriate to proceed with the meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee which was due to take place in Glasgow on Friday.

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): The whole House will want to be associated with the comments of the right hon. Gentleman. May I say on behalf of the Opposition that every one of us is deeply shocked by the events at Dunblane this morning? Our genuine and heartfelt sympathy goes out to everyone who has been affected. Our first thoughts are naturally for the parents and families of the young children who have been murdered and the family of the teacher, for those who have been injured and also for all of those at the school and in the local community who have been traumatised by the events this morning.

It is a bewildering tragedy and it is entirely right that the Leader of the House should indicate that a statement will be made to the House when more of the facts are known.

Today, we in the House are united in our feelings of absolute horror at what has happened. Hon. Members, many of us parents, share the grief of those whose lives have been devastated by events in Dunblane.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): May I associate my right hon. and hon. Friends with the expressions of grief and sympathy that have been expressed by the Leader of the House to the bereaved parents, families and friends? May I also commend the Government on taking the decision quickly to cancel the meeting proposed for the Scottish Grand Committee on Friday? That was the appropriate thing to do.

Violating the sanctity of a primary 1 classroom heightens the horror of the event and prompts the question: is there really nowhere that is sacrosanct? Even a closely knit community like Dunblane will have to dig deep into its reserves of human capital to recover from that incomprehensible attack. All our thoughts are with it this afternoon.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): May I associate myself with those sentiments and express my party's sympathy to the bereaved over an incident that defies belief and description? I support the decision to cancel the meeting of the Grand Committee as a mark of respect. I do not think that there is much appetite in Scotland right now for political debate, nor will people want to draw lessons too quickly—until we know all the facts. One thing is certain. Most of us in Scotland know the community involved well. All Scotland will show that community sympathy, support and solidarity in the next few days.

Madam Speaker: I am most grateful to the House. I think that we should now move on until we get a statement tomorrow.

NORTHERN IRELAND GRAND COMMITTEE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 90(2) (Northern Ireland Grand Committee),

That the Matter of the proposal for the draft Regional Strategy for health and social well-being 1997-2002, being a Matter relating exclusively to Northern Ireland, be referred to the Northern Ireland Grand Committee for its consideration.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

Question agreed to.

Hostage Recovery

3.35 pm

Mr. Neil Gerrard (Walthamstow): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to place a duty on the Secretary of State to ensure that appropriate assistance is provided to people returning to the United Kingdom, having been held against their will as hostages, and to their families; and for connected purposes.

The purpose of my Bill is simple and straightforward: to put a duty on the Government to ensure that people who have been held as hostages abroad get support, assistance and advice from the Government when they are released. The public think that few people have been held as hostages and remember that when Terry Waite and John McCarthy—two well-known cases—returned, they were taken to RAF Lyneham and given assistance. People assume that that is the natural course of events and that it occurs in every case.

The reality is rather different. In recent years, a significant number of people have been held hostage. More than 1,200 people were held in the Gulf during the Gulf war and smaller numbers have been held in several other places since, including the two men who are being held in Kashmir. Although we may like to think that hostage taking will cease, I suspect that it will not. It has gone on for the whole of recorded history and will happen again somewhere, at some time. None us can predict where or how many people will be involved.

It is obvious that what happens to people when they are held is deeply traumatic and stressful. I do not want to speculate on cases with which I have not been personally involved, but I am sure that it is safe to say that Keith Mangan and Paul Wells, who are being held in Kashmir, will have been through some dreadful experiences and will need support and help when they are released, which I hope will be soon. In many cases, people who have been released have not had the help that they should have had.

I became involved in the issue through the case of my constituent Paul Ride. He was taken over the border between Kuwait and Iraq by an Iraqi patrol and given a seven-year sentence, supposedly for illegally entering Iraq. At the same time, a constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) was held, together with several other people of various nationalities.

I think that people will be shocked to learn what happened to those men when they were released. Paul Ride was given a taxi home from Heathrow airport and that was the end of direct assistance to him. Nothing else was done to help him. Over the next year or two, he suffered family breakdown and psychiatric problems that led to him attempting suicide by setting fire to his house. The Crown Prosecution Service responded by charging him with arson. It was only after a year of waiting for the case to come to trial that it was dropped and he got the help that he needed.

Finally, I got in touch with Terry Waite, who was able, in turn, to put us in touch with Dr. Gordon Turnbull, who had done the work for the Government when Terry Waite and John McCarthy were released.

That case is not unique. Anyone who is in touch with the Gulf war human shield victims will know that many continue to suffer serious problems four or five years later. The Government are well aware of that fact. They funded research conducted by Dr. Stuart Turner which concluded that psychiatric problems should be resolved. He found that social and financial problems might lead to psychological problems and, finally—and most importantly in the context of my Bill—he proposed co-ordinated planning in advance in order to deal with possible psychological and social problems.

When the money was provided to Dr. Turner's clinic, the Prime Minister commented in a Department of Health press release about the effect of disasters and traumatic stress on people and the severe and long-lasting problems that could result. His sentiments were echoed by the then Under-Secretary of State for Health, the present Secretary of State for Health. I do not think that anyone doubts that action is necessary. The problem is that it does not occur: people fall through the gaps between the various agencies that might be expected to provide assistance.

My Bill sets out to rectify the problem. Obviously, I accept that there are some difficulties in defining exactly who might be regarded as a "hostage". In some cases, it is very clear that people have been held illegally. In the cases of Paul Ride and Michael Wainwright, the Government helped to arrange for family members to meet the United Nations Secretary-General and ensured that they did not face legal costs in Iraq. Such action is not taken when someone has been charged with a genuine criminal offence.

I accept that we must help all people who have been incarcerated in foreign prisons, but I think that those who have been held hostage have special needs. Those needs may vary from case to case—whether it is psychiatric counselling or direct practical assistance such as temporary housing, social services assistance and so on. Someone must be responsible for ensuring that that assistance is co-ordinated and that people know where it may be obtained. We are talking about people who have been through deeply traumatising and stressful experiences: they are not in the best position to make decisions about how to help themselves or to know where they might receive assistance.

I do not ask the Government to spend vast amounts of money or to set up permanent quangos or bureaucracies that might do little for long periods. The Government established a special unit in the Foreign Office during the Gulf war, but it was concerned simply with helping to achieve the release of those who were being held as part of the human shield. No organised assistance was provided to follow up those activities. The Government also funded Dr. Stuart Turner's clinic, thereby acknowledging that a need exists.

In the past year or 18 months I have talked to those who have been held as hostages, to doctors who have been involved in treating returned hostages and to members of the Gulf support group. I have received direct support in my endeavours from both Terry Waite and John McCarthy, who believe that we must ensure that other people receive the same assistance as they did.

I simply ask the Government to accept their responsibility—their duty—to British citizens who have suffered for political reasons, who have been in the wrong place at the wrong time. That aim could be achieved without legislation, but legislation would mean that the duty exists and that something will be done.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Neil Gerrard, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Ms Ann Coffey, Mr. Barry Field, Mr. Bruce George, Mr. John Gunnell, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. Jim Marshall, Miss Emma Nicholson, Sir Nicholas Scott and Mr. Alan Simpson.

Hostage Recovery

Mr. Neil Gerrard accordingly presented a Bill to place a duty on the Secretary of State to ensure that appropriate assistance is provided to people returning to the United Kingdom, having been held against their will as hostages, and to their families; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 29 March and to be printed. [Bill 84.]

Orders of the Day

London Regional Transport Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

3.45 pm

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment standing in the name of the Opposition.

Mr. Norris: London Regional Transport came into being technically as a statutory corporation—but more commonly described as a nationalised industry—on 29 June 1984. On that date, the London Regional Transport Act 1984 transferred political and financial control of what is generally known as London Transport, the old LT, from the Greater London council back to central Government, which had last been directly responsible for LT in 1969. As hon. Members would be aware, London Transport's principal duty is to provide or to secure passenger transport services in Greater London, having regard to the transport needs of London and to efficiency, economy and safety of operation.

The board of London Transport is headed by a chairman appointed by the Secretary of State for Transport. Peter Ford took over as chairman in September 1994 and, additionally, became chairman of LT's subsidiaries London Underground and London Transport Buses. There are currently three other full-time LT board members, one of whom is responsible for finance, one of whom is also managing director of London Underground and one of whom is also managing director of London Transport Buses. Additional part-time members, including a non-executive vice-chairman, bring a wide range of outside business experience to the LT board.

London Transport is also a parent or holding corporation with two wholly owned operating subsidiary companies. The first company is London Underground Ltd., which is responsible for the operation of the London underground. Since April 1994, it has included the Waterloo and City line between Waterloo and Bank, which was formerly operated by British Rail. The second wholly owned operating subsidiary is Victoria Coach Station Ltd., which is the principal London terminal for national and international express coach services, serving more than 1,000 destinations in 21 countries, with some 170,000 departures each year. Although VCS administers the coach station, it is not responsible for the operation of the coach services using it—they are the responsibility of the individual contractors.

A third operating subsidiary, London Buses Ltd., effectively ceased to trade when its 10 component companies were sold into the private sector by the end of 1994. London Buses Ltd. was set up in 1985 to operate London Transport's bus services and had, in turn, set up locally based subsidiary companies in anticipation of the new arrangements for bus services in London—although the Government announced in November 1993 that the original planned deregulation would not be implemented before the next general election. LT began competitive tendering of its bus routes in 1985, and in 1993 those LBL routes not yet involved in the tendering process were placed on a contractual basis.

That development, together with the sale of the LBL subsidiary companies in 1994, placed those companies on a basis similar to that of the private companies which are also operating bus services on behalf of, or under contract to, London Transport. Overall responsibility for all bus services in London is now exercised by London Transport Buses, which is a department of LT, but with its own chairman, managing director and management board.

Against that background, the Bill is essentially technical in its nature. Its purpose is simply to extend the powers of London Transport in order to allow it to make full use of the opportunities available under the Government's private finance initiative. The Bill has the full support of LT itself. I should say that it was London Transport that identified the deficiencies in the existing legislation which the Bill is intended to address and which asked the Government to assist in taking that forward.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow) rose—

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South) rose—

Mr. Norris: I give way first to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman).

Dr. Godman: I hesitate to intervene in a London debate, but as someone who travels frequently between Heathrow and Westminster, may I ask the Minister whether anything can be done to improve the tube service between Heathrow and the centre of London, not just for Members of Parliament, but for visitors from our constituencies to the capital? We hear over and over again from our constituents the complaint that they have to put up with that terrible tube service between the airport and the centre of London.

Mr. Norris: One of the things that I have learnt about being responsible for transport in London is that there are 651 Members who have an interest in it. Although one's constituency may not be in the capital, hon. Members are likely to spend most of their week in it. Certainly, with regard to the licensed taxi industry I have at least 651 additional constituents with whom to deal. Therefore, I well appreciate the hon. Gentleman's question.

The hon. Gentleman will know that the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) raised that matter in the House a few weeks ago. When I heard of his complaint I made it my business to take a personal interest in the apparent inadequacy of the arrangements for boarding the Piccadilly line. I have done it myself on many occasions and I agree that the service there is not as good as it should be because of the physical constraints of the layout of the station within the airport and also because of the difficulty that people often have in acquiring tickets, perhaps because they do not have change or British currency in their pockets, or because they have to ask questions in a foreign language or through some intermediary at the ticket office. All that means that the process of buying a ticket at Heathrow is infinitely more complicated than it is likely to be elsewhere.

London Transport has a programme of improvements for Heathrow station. Bob Bayman, the general manager of the Piccadilly line, has been in touch with hon. Members, circulating a note of the improvements. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I will take a personal interest in ensuring that those improvements are delivered.

Mr. Spearing rose—

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South) rose—

Mr. Norris: I shall give way first to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who caught my eye previously, and then to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Spearing: May I revert to the Minister's remark that this is a technical Bill? Clearly, reading the long title, it is to extend the powers of London Regional Transport. In the notes on clauses, under clause 1, paragraph a says:

"the carrying on by the contractor of activities which LT do have the powers to carry on, in particular the provision of public passenger transport services."

But clause 1 itself says:

"to . . . carry out an agreement with any person for the carrying on by that person ('the contractor') of any activities which London Regional Transport does not have".

It makes out that that can be done only with the consent of the Secretary of State. Therefore, surely the Bill gives the Secretary of State extra-statutory powers to let the contractor for London Transport do anything that he and London Transport want to be done. Is not that more than technical?

Mr. Norris: No. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman because Bills such as this ought to be subject to forensic scrutiny and it is perfectly appropriate that he should raise that extremely important question. In many ways, it is the whole question posed by the Bill and the Opposition's reasoned amendment. But I shall be at pains to demonstrate in what I have to say on the subject that the technical amendment is simply to allow London Transport to benefit from the full potential of the private finance initiative, and that means the need to extinguish technical bars to its doing so, which I do not believe any hon. Member would seek to place in its way. I will give the hon. Gentleman a firm undertaking from the Dispatch Box that nothing in the Bill is intended to extend the effective powers—the de facto powers—of London Transport or, indeed, of the Secretary of State. I shall go on to assure the House that the intention behind the Bill is specifically not that about which concern is expressed in the reasoned amendment. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me, as I develop my speech, to respond in more detail to the points that he has raised.

Mr. John Marshall: I revert to the question of Heathrow. Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the most important developments at Heathrow is the Heathrow to Paddington link, which is a joint private and public sector project? Can my hon. Friend tell the House when he expects that link to be up and running?

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and that investment of £300 million by the British Airports Authority has set a considerable precedent in the provision of privately owned railways. The project is intended massively to improve the public transport rail link between all the Heathrow terminals and central London. BAA is investing some £300 million in that large and imaginative project, and I am delighted to be able to tell my hon. Friend that in my most recent conversation with BAA, it confirmed that it hoped that the trial running of trains would begin next year, in 1997. Obviously, regular scheduled services will follow on from then.

As I understand it, the major restraint is the time it has taken to finish tunnel work into the airport terminals. The idea behind the scheme is that passengers and their baggage will have direct access to the rail link from the airport terminal at which they arrive. They will not be required to change terminals or to go outside in all weathers. Such seamless transfers will be attractive to every class of traveller, including the business user. In the past, some business users have chosen to use private cars or other forms of personalised transport, especially if they are going into the City—although that can be a very long and arduous journey. It does not take as long as it takes to get from Narita airport to the centre of Tokyo or to make a similar journey in New York or Paris, but it takes a very long time. The project will provide a high-quality link to the centre of London that will be attractive even to those business users who are met by chauffeur-driven limousine, because that will not have to be at Heathrow. It will be a tremendous benefit to other road users and the communities in that area.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): As somebody who served his time during the consideration of the London Regional Transport Act 1984, I return to the question asked by the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing). His question expressed the key concern about the Bill, although we support the other aspects of it.

Clause 3 would add a new section—31B—to the 1984 Act, which would provide that "the Secretary of State may by order provide for any functions of London Regional Transport under any statutory provisions to be exercisable by that person",

"that person" being the agent. Does that section, when read together with section 3 of the 1984 Act—irrespective of the Minister's intent—permit the wholesale transfer of functions, either bus or rail or tube, to another body? I understand that the Minister says that that is not the intention, but what can he say to persuade us that the Bill would not permit that?

Mr. Norris: As the notes on clauses show, the new section 31B(1) would enable the Secretary of State

"to provide that certain of LRT's statutory functions are to be exercisable by"— a contractor—

"for the purposes of carrying out agreements"

under section 3(2) or (2A) of the London Regional Transport Act 1984. That means that the obligations laid on London Transport to provide services will not alter. What will alter is how LRT can procure such services so as to allow it to get the best value from the private finance initiative. On occasion, it will have the power, in a given commercial eventuality, to carry out such functions for itself.

The hon. Members for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) and for Newham, South have both asked the important question in this context. I can tell them that nothing in the Bill extends the powers of London Transport in the exercise of its functions. Nor does the Bill extend its field of responsibilities. They remain as defined in the 1984 Act.

Mr. Hughes: I understand that exactly. Section 3(2) of the 1984 Act gives LRT a statutory duty to provide an underground service, for instance. Although LRT may retain that statutory duty, what is to stop it contracting out wholesale any or every line of the network? Nothing on the face of the Bill would seem to prevent that. If the Bill becomes law, LRT could immediately give the private sector responsibility for running every tube line across Greater London.

Mr. Norris: The answer is that the powers given to LRT in the 1984 Act permit it to do precisely what the hon. Gentleman suggests—we should be under no illusions about that. Opposition Members will seek to draw out from me a commitment not to privatise; that is basically what their reasoned amendment is after. In due course I shall come to that point in my speech. I must repeat, however, that nothing in the Bill adds to the general powers that LRT possesses.

The specific power to which we are all referring is the power to provide or procure services in the context of public transport. The Bill represents no increase in that area of responsibility. London Transport is not being allowed to move outside the provision of public transport services. Moreover, there will be no change to LRT's ability to extend the involvement of contractors in its business—save only what is in the Bill.

Neither this Bill nor the 1984 Act provides for LRT to wind itself up. My advice is that further legislation would need to be brought before the House for that to happen. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey would no doubt want to make his own contribution on that occasion.

In short, a great deal of what the hon. Gentleman has suggested is already possible under LRT's current powers. The Bill deals with some practical areas for which its current powers are manifestly deficient. The deficiencies were brought to our attention by LRT. When it first told me that it needed more powers, my reaction was to ask it to go away and carefully justify the need for additional legislation. LRT did precisely that, and has furnished me with some examples with which I believe the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey will be satisfied. I know that, throughout the years he has represented a London seat, he has always been a great supporter of London Transport. Like him, I want LT to deliver the best possible value for money. The central message is the acceleration of the improvement in services that all hon. Members want to see.

On that basis, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be assured that nothing in the Bill extends LT's current power to proceed further with contracting. The Bill simply facilitates what hon. Members wish to achieve.

Mr. Spearing: In reply to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), the Minister has partly answered my question. As he is contemplating a contract for a power supply company under the current powers of the Act, surely it will be possible for, say, Wisconsin Central to lease the Central line to run trains or provide some of the line's functions and for the District line to have a management buy-out. If that is possible under the Act, all he is saying is that the Bill will make it simpler under the PFI. Will he assure the House that that is not the intention and that London Transport will not be privatised on the pattern of British Rail, Railtrack and the present operators?

Mr. Norris: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance. LT may wish to enter into a power supply contract to improve the quality of its power supply. Hon. Members will recall the power supply failures of 18 months or a couple of years ago. Power supply failures account for a substantial proportion of total failures in the system. Much investment, therefore, is clearly necessary. It is likely that the most efficient contract would involve LT purchasing power from a contractor that may wish to sell additional power supplies to third parties. That is perfectly reasonable. It would represent an excellent deal to LT and a perfectly sensible deal to the contractor. We wish to put in place arrangements to allow London Transport to take over the contractor's function and to continue the commercial arrangement without disadvantaging Londoners. That is a perfect example of how the Bill will work sensibly and very much in the public interest. It will procure good value for money and sensible commercial bases for the contracts into which LT will wish to enter.

Mr. Simon Hughes: This will be my last intervention on the Minister's speech; I am grateful to him for giving way.

Clause 2 deals with land and its disposal. Will the Minister help the House by saying what is permitted under the clause? Quite a lot of LRT's land is not used for transport operations. Will it be possible under the Bill—it could not do this otherwise—for LRT to enter into a contract with an hotel or leisure chain to build and jointly operate an hotel, as some water companies did after privatisation?

Mr. Norris: We are having almost a Committee debate on technical points, but as the Bill is broadly technical in nature I see no reason why I should not attempt to give the hon. Gentleman as full an answer as I can.

Let us take the example of a contractor who acquires land that LT would need at the end of a contract. It might involve land on which a power sub-station is to be built, the power project having some limited life. Clause 2 ensures that the freehold could be acquired in LT's name, albeit that the land would have been identified by the contractor, who would be responsible for its development. The purpose is to minimise the possibility of disputes over ownership at the end of a contract. If we did not frame the Bill in that way, when a contractor's relationship with London Transport had ceased, the contractor would then have a sub-station on land that was not technically owned by London Transport, and London Transport would therefore encounter some difficulty in offering a re-tender to another party. We are providing a more flexible basis for London Transport to enter into such contractual arrangements without altering the basis of the powers that it exercises.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I wonder whether my hon. Friend can help me. I am trying to identify the area of controversy between the two sides of the House. Is it simply the hoary old argument about the introduction of private finance into public services, or am I missing something rather more complicated?

Mr. Norris: No doubt, as this afternoon drags on—I mean, continues—my hon. and learned Friend will find the answer to his question. It may well be that, with his customary perspicacity—perspicacity that he has charged many a client thousands of pounds to savour—

An hon. Member: And many years to regret.

Mr. Norris: Indeed—but I cannot possibly say that to my hon. and learned Friend, who comes from a distinguished libel chambers and with whom I do not wish to tangle.

My hon. and learned Friend has put his finger on what is, I suspect, at issue in the "reasoned amendment"—a euphemism if ever I heard one—that the Opposition have tabled. They simply say, "We have read the Bill and see nothing exceptional in it, but because the word 'private' occurs somewhere in it, can we assume that this is privatisation by the back door?"

I think that my hon. and learned Friend has touched a raw nerve. The deputy leader of the Labour party, the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott)—who was a very vocal transport spokesman and who is, if I may say so, a very great man—has said on many occasions that he invented the private finance initiative. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Hon. Members are keen to press the right hon. Gentleman's claim. In that case, I am an inadvertent convert to his cause. I have been a convert to the cause of privatisation from my mother's milk; the difference between the right hon. Gentleman and me is that I can spell it.

The right hon. Gentleman's relationship with private finance is rather like the late Larry Grayson's relationship with rugby league—somewhat tangential. The right hon. Gentleman's idea of private finance is bludgeoning the private sector into pre-arranged contracts in which the private sector puts up all the money and takes all the risk, while he and his hon. Friends reap a reward that simply is not there, because the private sector never invests on that basis. But, in so far as there is great joy in heaven over every sinner that repenteth, I am delighted that Opposition Members have been converted to the cause of the private finance initiative, and that they are apparently prepared to support the Bill.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): I am glad to hear the Minister reassuring himself that there may still be a place in heaven for him, but I am sure that he will go on to reassure the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) that we might all have been saved a good deal of trouble today had it not been for the blundering, inopportune remarks of the Deputy Prime Minister, who became entangled in the debate just when we might have been considering whether the Minister's assurances were to be taken at face value.

Mr. Norris: With great respect to the hon. Gentleman, I am relaxed about the private sector's involvement in the provision of services, and that goes to the heart of my remarks about the Labour party's attitude. Clearly, it is not relaxed. I am because the function of any Government, never mind that of London Regional Transport in relation to public transport services, is to provide or to procure services. In the health service, for example, it is important that the service should remain free at the point of delivery on the basis of need and not of means. To procure that, we should use the most efficient means of investment, bearing in mind the fact that, in such circumstances, the taxpayer is hard pressed to meet all the demands placed on him or her by the Government, whatever party is in power.

In this case, an absolute key to my proposition is that, in the past 10 years in particular, London Transport has made great strides in improving the quality of its services by taking advantage of massively greater public investment from this Government than ever before. My hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) is in his place. He has long been keen to point out the extent to which investment in London Transport has increased over the years. If he checks the figures, he will find that, at current prices, in 1979, investment in London was £167 million. It now stands at £543 million.

However, if one takes account of further expenditure on the Jubilee line extension, the real comparison is between total investment in 1979 of £257 million and investment this year—remember, these are at constant prices—of £1,880,000. That shows the huge increase in public finance committed to the underground, yet—all hon. Members appreciate this, including many hon. Members who represent London constituencies—much more needs to be done. We all recognise that the investment need is there. London Transport has identified it. In their plans for London transport, London Pride and London First recognise that that backlog is still there, although they pay considerable tribute to the Government's efforts in recent years to end it.

The essence of the Bill is that it allows us to harness more efficiently private sector resources so as to decrease that backlog even more quickly.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): My hon. Friend's figures are right, but in 1978, the historic figure for investment in London Transport was only £66 million and, throughout the 1970s, the average figure was under £50 million. If he excludes even the £500 million per year invested in the Jubilee line extension, he will find that investment in London Transport is well over £500 million and has been for the five years of this decade. Allowing even for inflation, that means that, under this Government, we have quadrupled the amount of investment in London Transport. Does he agree that, if hon. Members on either side of the House still say that more investment is needed, because of the necessary priorities of Government spending, that investment can and must come only from private finance initiatives?

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend has touched on an extremely important point that directly relates to the Bill. None of my right hon. and hon. Friends should ever take criticism of the Government's investment record on public transport in London, for it is exactly as my hon. Friend said—about quadruple that available under the Labour Government. We are trying to accelerate total investment on the basis that we, at least, recognise that the key is that investment should be provided. We, at least, are not blinkered by the extraordinary presumption that somehow investment does not happen unless it is investment by taxpayers. We, at least, look for—and we say so wholeheartedly and openly—investment from both the public and the private sectors to ensure the efficient development of services.

Mr. Keith Hill (Streatham): Will the Minister confirm that, until 1969, London Transport operated under a break-even requirement, and that its first call upon Government for funding did not occur until the late 1970s, for macro-economic reasons? Is it not therefore entirely bogus to draw comparisons between levels of central Government funding in the late 1970s and the current period? Would it not be more germane to reflect upon the fact that, in 1992-93, core funding for London Underground stood at £683 million per annum; and that, in two years' time, it will stand at £435 million? That is a deplorable comment on the Government's lack of investment in London Underground.

Mr. Norris: The devil may quote scripture for his purpose, but I read from the authentic work. The hon. Gentleman may squirm on the definition of public expenditure in London. He may try, under the great umbrella of the Greater London council, to bury the clear evidence that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet elucidated—and, my goodness, there is not much that went wrong in London during the GLC's years that was not attributable to the GLC. The reality is one from which the hon. Gentleman cannot escape.

If the hon. Gentleman is referring to the fact that, over the past few years, investment has been at even higher levels than at present, I am grateful to him for drawing the attention of the House to that. He is right. If I had picked the most embarrassing statistics on which to judge the records of the Opposition and the Government, I would have referred to even higher levels of investment in previous years. However, as they already stand at an all-time high, I doubt whether the hon. Gentleman is on safe ground in criticising them. Of course, he has not let that stop him in the past, and I am sure that it will not stop him in future.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): If the Government's investment in, for example, London Underground over the past 16 years has been so consistent and so large, why is it that, for the first time in its history—or so I believe—London Underground will have to close four separate sections of track and the Bakerloo line for about seven months simply to catch up on the backlog of maintenance work that it has been unable to fund until now?

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Go on, answer that.

Mr. Norris: The hon. Lady says, "Go on, answer that," as though that were a challenge.

First, I shall dissect the question, why is London Transport doing so much maintenance work that it has not previously been able to afford? I wonder whether it might have anything to do with the fact that it now has the money to do the work and the willingness to get on with it. The extraordinary double standards of the Labour party are that it claims bitterly that there are inadequate maintenance resources, and then, when the work is being done, it complains about what it alleges to be disruption. It is the most fatuous example of double standards. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), who has considerable knowledge of London, knows better than that. She makes her point better than I could.

Mr. Wilson: The Minister surely realises that maintenance work often takes place because capital is not available for renewals. I am sure that he understands that basic point, and would wish to acknowledge it.

Mr. Norris: I do acknowledge it. The hon. Gentleman and I have had many discussions on the matter over the years, and he understands the issues extremely well. We have an entirely cordial relationship; we get on. I say to the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) that I admit that, as my political career enters its twilight, the matter is more likely to damage the hon. Gentleman's political prospects than mine—but I am ruthless in such circumstances.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) is quite right. If one does not spend on capital, one almost inevitably reaps the consequence of higher levels of maintenance expenditure. London Transport, above all, is based on a culture of safe operations, which means that at no time is safety prejudiced—even if that means slow running or closures.

There is common agreement on the thesis, and that is why I know that the Labour party supports the main thrust of the Bill. We all want to accelerate the capital investment through use of the PFI, which will enable us to avoid producing a railway in which disruption brought about by historic under-investment and the need to accelerate the improvement programme happens more often than either the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate or I would want.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I listened intently to what the Minister said about lack of investment. I think that he was referring to the planned closure of the Bakerloo and Northern tunnels under the Thames. He must be aware of the massive disruption that that will cause. Does he therefore agree that one could foresee the need for capital investment many years ago? Has not the fact that capital investment was not made available led to this sorry and parlous state?

Mr. Norris: The work would have necessitated closure whenever it happened. The hon. Gentleman is—I think—about the only hon. Member who is a fellow of the Institution of Highways and Transportation, and may therefore appreciate the civil engineering implications of the work. For example, in order to ensure entirely safe operation, the work at London Bridge requires continuous periods of ownership of station and track. In such circumstances, it is therefore necessary to close the line, and would have been, regardless of when new investment in London Bridge was made. I have LT's specific assurance on that matter.

It will not surprise the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) that, if we could have achieved the renewals programme without any closures—although it may have taken slightly longer to deliver—I would have been very keen to do so. Nobody likes to announce such closures. Having been satisfied that, for good, sound operational and safety reasons, it was right for London Transport to go ahead with the work and effect the closure, my job was to ensure that the closure was minimised to every possible extent, and that London Transport was able to carry out the works.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I am sure that the House will appreciate and agree with my hon. Friend's explanation of those major capital works. May I return for a moment to the subject of Heathrow? Could my hon. Friend discover what London Underground regards as an acceptable time for anyone to wait in a queue to pay to travel? If it is not possible either to make change available so that people can use coins in the machines or for more kiosks to be open, could people who have had to wait for, say, more than five minutes be issued with a free pass? LT might then start getting people to sell tickets.

Mr. Norris: There are two aspects to my hon. Friend's point. As he will readily know from his experience, ticketing arrangements on the underground are necessarily complex. Point-to-point journeys require a knowledge of station names at both ends, which have to be found on the automatic machines, as well as the journey type—single, child or return fares. Day travelcards are also available from machines. The system is therefore quite baffling to newly arrived visitors to Britain.

London Transport is looking at a much simplified ticketing system that does not require staff to dispense tickets. That is of course where real economies can be made—indeed, it is extraordinarily efficient. Most hon. Members will find it more convenient and easier to drop the coins or feed a note into the machine to get a ticket. Certainly I do, but that is because I know my way around.

I readily agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) that that is by no means always the case. At Heathrow in particular, as I said in answer to an earlier question originally raised by the hon. Member for Workington, London Regional Transport does indeed need to address the issue; it is a real problem.

I shall take back my hon. Friend's suggestion that there should be some form of reimbursement scheme—although I cannot imagine that LRT will find it especially attractive. It will at least reveal the scale of my hon. Friend's concern.

Mr. Bottomley: There is a serious point here, especially for people who are not regular visitors to London and do not work here, as Members of Parliament do. For overseas visitors to arrive here and find themselves stuck in a queue for more than five minutes is unacceptable. Not only London Underground but Members of Parliament have a duty to ask for—indeed, to demand—the ability to get on to the underground within five minutes of arriving at an underground station. That is the minimum that we should demand.

Mr. Norris: I understand my hon. Friend's concern; indeed, as I have said already, I share it. I hope that the work that London Underground has announced will be carried out at Heathrow can be done quickly, and will bear early fruit. I cannot think of a worse way of welcoming visitors to Britain than for them to encounter an incomprehensible arrangement for getting on to the metro system. That is especially true when we should encourage not only those whose first language is not English but many visitors from within the United Kingdom to gain access to central London via the Piccadilly line.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose—

Mr. Norris: I give way to the hon. Member for Workington, who has arrived late to a discussion of which he is to some extent a parent.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Yes, I think I am the parent. I have been in correspondence with the director of whatever the London transport undertaking is called—is it London Underground Ltd. or something?—and I do not think that the Minister has grasped what I am on about. In the letters that I have received from him, the most recent of which arrived last week, the hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand the fact that our complaint is about windows being closed when there are long queues of people.

However much I stress that fact, the Minister has not grasped it. I have asked only that, when there are queues, all the windows should be open. That is all—no more. Yet the Minister writes back to me with long explanations about all the other initiatives that are taking place, including selling tickets halfway round the world. Those are irrelevant to my complaint.

Mr. Norris: I appreciate that point, and I explained to the House before the hon. Gentleman arrived that I was taking a personal interest in it. Indeed, he will know that, when I saw his early-day motion, I wrote and told him that I too was concerned, and wanted to take the matter on personally. I can give him and the rest of the House an undertaking that I shall monitor progress.

We are all not only Members of Parliament but travellers around the system in the normal way, as the hon. Gentleman is. Like me, he has every right to feel frustrated when it looks as if a half-time service is being provided when there are clearly queues of people wishing to be served. That cannot be right, and I assure him that I shall take a close personal interest in the matter.

Mr. Garnier: If what the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) have said is true, the answer is to second a manager from a supermarket. No supermarket would tolerate long queues at a checkout.

Moreover, if what the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) and other Opposition Members have said is right—for the purposes of argument, let us assume for a moment that it is, although I do not accept their contention—and the Government have engineered appalling levels of investment in London Transport over the past 15 or 16 years, surely the answer is to vote for the Bill.

Mr. Norris: The trouble with having bright lawyers in the House is that they always ask the right questions. My hon. and learned Friend has gone straight to the heart of the Bill.

We can defend our position indefensibly, as the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) tried to do, or in a concrete way, as I tried to do, but it does not matter, because, whatever the present level of investment, we all agree that more is needed. If we agree about that, and if we agree—as appears to be the policy of the Labour party—that the public sector cannot be landed with further commitments and none of us wishes to burden the taxpayer more than necessary, my hon. and learned Friend is entirely right to say that we should support the Bill, and I hope that in due course the House will do so.

If I may, I shall say something about the Bill itself. [Laughter.] It may be a somewhat novel proposition, but none the less I intend to advance it. I appreciate that it may be a risible notion.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Bulldozer Norris.

Mr. Norris: None the less, I shall try.

It is generally agreed that London Transport has made substantial strides in improving services and efficiency in recent decades. The quality of service has progressively improved, and LT has been right to focus carefully on the needs and views of passengers, thus reflecting the principles of the citizens charter—a charter in which I strongly believe.

The citizens charter gives consumers of services which, as it happens, are provided by the state, the rights that they would automatically expect to enjoy if those services were provided by the private sector. The citizens charter has been one of the singular achievements of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. In my opinion, it is not yet appreciated how much it is changing the culture of public services and instilling in them a recognition that, at every level of interface with the public, the public have a right to demand quality of service from operations in the public sector, just as they have the right to demand those services in the private sector.

London Transport's charters for tube and bus users emphasised its commitment to that concept. Efficiency in services has also been much improved by measures such as London Underground's company plan and the contracting out to the private sector of non-core services.

Much of that improvement reflects a transformation in the management of LT and the efforts of LT's hard-working staff, but much has depended on the availability of funds for investment. Much of the underground network dates back to about the turn of the century, so much of it needs to be renewed and brought up to modern standards.

To help meet that need, investment has been running at record levels. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet reminded the House, this year LT will invest more than £1 billion. More than half is being devoted to improvements in the existing network, such as the comprehensive upgrade of the Central line—which, purely accidentally, happens to go through my constituency—which nears completion, and the remainder is principally being spent on the construction of the Jubilee line extension.

To date, most of that investment has been funded by the taxpayer, although I emphasise that the operating surplus that is now being generated by LT is making an increasing contribution. There is often criticism that fares on London Transport are relatively high. That criticism, in so far as it draws comparisons, is a fair comparison.

Ms Glenda Jackson: It is a justifiable criticism.

Mr. Norris: I hear the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate say that it is a justifiable comparison. I believe that in that respect she is correct, but I want to make it clear that investment in the service can be funded only by the taxpayer or the farepayer. It is vital that we get the balance right and that we look to farepayers—those who use the service—to make a substantial contribution to investment in the system.

For every pound by which lower fares would not cover the running costs of an operation such as London Transport, it would be necessary for any taxpayer contribution to make good that deficiency before it could be invested in improving the service.

I am therefore proud that, in the nearly four years that I have been responsible for London Transport and have been the Minister to whom its chairman has been answerable, we have moved from making losses to making a substantial operating profit, which has then been made available for accelerated investment. The House must not ignore that consequence of a fares policy that I am frequently asked to justify in answer to tough questions from reporters and commentators.

Although our approach is entirely right, we and LT are keen for the private sector to make a fuller contribution to investment financing, which I believe is a common aim among hon. Members on both sides of the House. If we can involve the private sector more directly in the financing and provision of public services, it will help us to deliver higher-quality and more cost-effective services through the exploitation of the full range of private sector commercial, management and creative skills. The Government's private finance initiative has been designed to do precisely that.

LT has already achieved conspicuous success with the PFI through the contract we concluded last year for the provision of new Northern line trains. Hon. Members on both sides of the House with constituencies through which the Northern line runs have very much welcomed that announcement. That £400 million deal will provide a new train service for one of London Underground's busiest lines, with the supplier, GEC Alsthom, taking the responsibility for, and the risk of providing and maintaining, the required number of trains to run the service for the next 20 years. Those new trains are expected to begin entering service from the middle of next year.

London Transport is naturally keen to make further use of the PFI, and competition for further substantial schemes is already in hand. To illustrate the need for the Bill's technical measures, I should like to mention four of the most immediate PFI projects, the first of which is in relation to communications.

We have undertaken a project with LT that will require a contractor to provide an integrated radio system for the underground, based on a fibre-optic network. The network will not only provide updated systems for London Underground's communications systems, but will have sufficient spare capacity for the contractor to provide telecommunications and information technology services to third parties. Sharing costs in that way will greatly reduce the cost to LT. [Laughter.] Does the hon. Member for Newham, South find something amusing in that concept? If so, would he care to unburden himself of it?

Mr. Spearing: Imagine a cable going through a tunnel that takes not only London Transport's traffic, as it currently does with conventional cable, but that of other businesses as well. At the same time, someone will be running the trains, and someone else may be contracting for the track. Imagine the complications that will ensue as to who will deal with safety, who will be trained to do what, and what the line of management will be.

The Minister should consult railwaymen about the difficulties that have already been encountered above the ground and the risks that have been taken because of all sorts of patterns of mismanagement. He would then discover that the risks to the underground in London would be increased by contracting out power and telecommunications facilities, and possibly ticketing, to individual contractors.

Mr. Norris: I am tempted to dissect the hon. Gentleman's intervention in the same manner as I did that of the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington, but I shall content myself by observing that he has set his face against the use of the PFI in respect of telecommunications.

The hon. Gentleman's stance will not sit easily with that of his colleagues on the Opposition Front Bench, but that is a matter for him. He is pretty old to be a member of new Labour, and I suspect that he might have the skids placed under him very quickly if he goes on in that old recidivist vein. There are ugly rumours that that has already happened. I have personal affection for him because he is a good cyclist and enjoys the river, so sharing two of my passions. I fear that we may be seeing the last of the hon. Gentleman with outbursts of that sort. His point is a logical absurdity.

There is not the slightest difficulty in running the cabling in the way we propose. The only difference, on which the Bill concentrates, is the issue of the spare capacity that the contractor may wish to sell to third parties, the effect of which would be to defray costs that would otherwise have to be borne by London Transport. This is a straightforward way to optimise the cost to the taxpayer and to the service.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend has answered that point very well. I wish to raise a separate issue that does not necessarily require an immediate answer, but I would like my hon. Friend to consult railway operating businesses about it.

If a train for some reason comes off the track, neither automatic train protection—if it is available—nor other communication systems can immediately tell a train coming in the other direction or on an adjacent track that the line is blocked. Will my hon. Friend consult his technical experts to find out whether there is some way for a driver or guard, if there is one, to advise other trains in the locality, whether underground or overground, that they should stop, even though they cannot see a signal?

Mr. Norris: I shall ask London Transport for an answer to that question. It is in the interest of the system as a whole that we have an effective and instantaneous method of communication on the underground system.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (Colchester, North): I may be speaking out of turn, but I understand that there is such a system, and that it is extremely simple. Along the side of the tube, two exposed wires run parallel to each other.

If any driver or member of staff wishes to stop traffic on that track, he squeezes the wires together, which creates a circuit, sends a signal and cuts out electricity to all trains on that track. It is simple technology. It does not matter who owns the wires or how they are financed—it will still work.

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend is right, and I especially endorse his point on the ownership of the two wires, but the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham was slightly different. He asked about how the information could be transmitted more widely and how more useful information could be transmitted, rather than merely about switching off the power to trains in the immediate vicinity of the point where the power has been disconnected. I will send a reply on that to my hon. Friend, and copy it to my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin).

The second type of PFI project we want to undertake involves ticketing and what we call the "prestige" project. It would involve the complete modernisation of London Transport's ticketing systems, based on the progressive introduction of smart card technology. The contractor would take over responsibility for providing and selling tickets for tube and bus services and for the equipment to validate them, such as the ticket gates at underground stations.

Giving the private sector responsibility for the whole system would itself provide scope for the introduction of innovative and efficient systems. As with the communications project, there may be scope to spread costs if the smart cards can be used with third parties—for instance, as an electronic purse accepted by retailers. It could be used as a means of paying for parking charges or whatever. That is the underlying basis of the need for the Bill in relation to that project.

The third scheme involves power supply. That would involve a contractor taking over LT's existing power generation plant and taking responsibility for the provision of main and emergency power supplies for the underground network. As with the schemes that I have already mentioned, the contractor would be able to spread costs by supplying power for third parties.

Finally, LT is developing plans for extensions of the east London line. Powers are being sought under the Transport and Works Act 1992 for the northern extension to the line, while LT is also considering proposals to extend its southern end. It is intended that they will be taken forward with the private sector under the PFI.

In total, those projects would involve private sector capital investment in LT of about £750 million. Competitions for two of the schemes—for power supplies and for the prestige ticketing project—are under way. London Transport is evaluating pre-qualification bids, and hopes soon to move to the full competition stage. London Transport is also about to invite pre-qualifying bids for the communications project.

In working up those competitions and schemes, LT has run into some potential or actual legal problems in taking them forward within the PFI. As I have said already, LT's powers derive from the London Regional Transport Act 1984, when schemes of that sort were simply not envisaged. The Act, quite rightly, constrains LT's powers to public transport, so as to prevent its becoming, in effect, a Government-sponsored general trading company. However, it has now become clear that the effect of those restrictions is also to circumscribe LT's ability to enter into agreements under the PFI, whereby the private sector party to the agreement would carry out non-transport-related activities.

For example, under its present powers, LT could not enter into agreements of the sort proposed for communications, power or ticketing to the extent that they would involve the private sector partner in the provision of services to third parties to any substantial extent. Nor could LT enter into agreements that might at some stage need to be transferred to a third party: for instance, if the original contractor were to default and the financiers to the deal wished to appoint a new contractor.

Unless addressed, those restrictions will limit the scope for LT to execute successful PFI deals, and will especially reduce the opportunities for pursuing deals involving the use of assets both for LT's own services and for third parties, which promise value for money and the benefit of private sector funding.

The aim of the Bill, which, as I have said, commands the full support of London Transport, is therefore to remove those constraints, and to ensure that LT has the ability to make full use of the PFI. Given the desirability in principle of removing impedances to the PFI, and given that the problems that have been identified would prevent LT from taking forward schemes for which it has competitions under way already, it is clearly important to put the deficiencies right as quickly as possible.

Before I go on to explain the purpose of the Bill in more detail, I should like to emphasise—[Laughter.] It is an important measure. I shall emphasise to the House what the Bill does not do.

Mr. Wilson: There must be an hour or two in that.

Mr. Norris: Indeed.

The Bill is not intended to widen the role or functions of LT itself, other than where that is necessary as a by-product of facilitating PFI schemes. As I said before, we are not in the game of setting up LT as a general trading company.

In response to the amendment tabled by Labour Members, I reassure the House that the Bill in no way erodes LT's powers or changes its status. It is not a privatisation Bill; thus, it does not affect the basic duty of LT—as set out in section 2 of the 1984 Act—

"to provide or secure the provision of public passenger transport services for Greater London".

Nor does it affect LT's functions under section 8 of that Act in relation to the planning of fares and services. The Bill does not change the wide range of other provisions in the 1984 Act that would almost certainly need to be changed if the underground were to be privatised.

Of course, we on Conservative Benches believe in the benefits of privatisation, which have proved themselves already in so many transport industries: British Airways, the British Airports Authority, the National Bus Company, the National Freight Consortium and the ports, to give just a few examples. Those benefits are now being extended to the national rail network.

[Mr. Norris]

However, we have no plans to privatise London Underground, and we are not in the business of privatisation by stealth. The Bill is essentially a technical one. It has the strictly limited aim of extending—

Mr. Michael Stephen (Shoreham): Shame.

Mr. Norris: I hope that my hon. Friend is not suggesting that it is a shame that the Government do not act by stealth. He may be suggesting that the Government have a real enthusiasm for the benefits of privatisation, which I heartily share.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend accept that London's commuters are concerned about the quality of service and the level of investment in the underground? Many of them would welcome privatisation, because, wherever it has taken place, it has led to increased investment and better-quality service. The sooner my hon. Friend gets on his bike and privatises London Underground, the better.

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend is correct—although I do not wish to inflict the sight of me on my bike upon more Londoners than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. Jenkin: The Minister is seeking a transformation of London Underground, the like of which has been achieved in other nationalised industries only by privatisation and the preparations for it. I wish him well in trying to transform that business, while keeping it in the public sector. However, I fear that customers will expect a complete transformation—particularly when they see the success of rail privatisation and how services have been transformed. [Laughter.] We are now hearing hoots of derision from Labour Members—as we did with British Airways, British Telecom, and so on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker, I see that you are looking at me sternly, but I wish to make the point that, unless we actually achieve that kind of transformation in customer service, we must surely look to go to the next stage—to go the whole hog—and shift the business into the private sector, so that we get access not only to private capital but to private sector management techniques. That will lead to the transformation we seek.

Mr. Norris: The issues of private or public ownership and capital are germane to the Bill—they are the very essence of it. I heartily endorse my hon. Friend's observations about the extraordinary success that privatisation has brought to British Airways, for example. He is entirely right to remind hon. Members that, when the privatisation of British Airways was debated in this place, Labour Members constantly decried the proposition, derided it, and said that it would never work in commercial terms.

Labour Members pointed to the fact that no nation in Europe had privatised its national flag airline, and that it was therefore, de facto, impossible. They said that the baby would never fly. That baby is now not only the world's favourite airline but is hugely profitable. Instead of taking money from taxpayers to support its operation, it is making a significant contribution by way of corporation tax.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. Although this is interesting, we are debating not British Airways but the London Regional Transport Bill.

Mr. Norris: I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I have no wish to stray any further down that path, except to point out that, in relation to the involvement of private capital in transport operations, Labour Members have consistently maintained that private capital would not work, and that privatisation would not work—in this respect, they were spectacularly and self-evidently wrong.

I fear that I may have to disappoint my hon. Friend so far as London Transport is concerned. I have made it clear that this is not a plan to privatise London Transport or London Underground. I have said in quite specific terms that the Government are not in the business of privatisation by stealth.

I believe that the observations that my hon. Friend made about the success that will clearly follow from the actions that we have taken in relation to the railways—as success has followed in every other area—will soon become so clear that the cloak of obfuscation, which is all that the Opposition have been able to deliver over the last few years, will become nothing. Customers will see the benefits for themselves on the ground, in services such as the London-Tilbury-Southend service, of which my hon. Friend has some considerable experience.

Mr. Keith Hill rose—

Mr. Norris: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, who is no doubt enthusiastic to point out that he has always been a supporter of privatisation, and that he wishes to endorse it on this occasion.

Mr. Hill: I may do that in due course, if I manage to catch the Chair's eye. In relation to the success of privatisation in public transport, will the Minister identify the success in the deregulation and privatisation of buses in this country? Since 1986, there has been an annual loss of 30 million passengers. Where is the success of privatisation in that?

Mr. Norris: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman very directly: since 1985, costs in the industry have been reduced by one third, public subsidies have more than halved, the proportion of routes run profitably has increased from 65 per cent to 86 per cent., and one third more mileage is being run. In the past year, the decline in bus use—which is attributable to the growth in the use of the private car—has been almost entirely arrested. Bus usage is London has increased.

That significant gain would not have been brought about without the benefit of deregulation and privatisation. However, I note that the hon. Gentleman confused the two—they are very different concepts.

Mr. John Marshall: I thank my hon. Friend for his usual courtesy in giving way this afternoon. Does my hon. Friend accept that where London Buses has put routes out to competitive tender, a process that he described earlier in his speech, substantial savings have been made? That shows that London Buses, when owned by the taxpayer, was inefficient, but when routes were put out to competitive tender, working practices improved and the cost to the community went down.

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend is entirely right. That has been the benefit of the franchising process and of involving private bus companies in the operation of London Buses services. My hon. Friend knows that we have recently sold the operating subsidiaries of London Buses Ltd. into the private sector, many of them, incidentally, purchased by the management, and further efficiency gains and savings to the taxpayer have been brought about thereby, while the quality of the service is manifestly improving.

My hon. Friend also knows that in all the recent surveys by bus user groups, it is the privately operated services that have tended to win the first prize within the capital city. There is absolutely no doubt that we have had some tremendous benefits from the involvement of the private sector.

As I say, the Bill is essentially a technical one. It has the strictly limited aim of extending LT's powers only in so far as that is necessary, first, to remove certain restrictions imposed by the present legislation on LT's ability to enter into agreements for the purposes of the private finance initiative, and, secondly, to deal with the possibility that LT may have to take over the functions of a PFI contractor at the end of a contract.

Clause 1 would extend the scope of section 3 of the 1984 Act by empowering LT, subject to the consent of the Secretary of State, to enter into agreements with contractors which involve the contractor carrying out activities for which LT has no powers. That is needed to provide for schemes such as those related to communications and power, where the value for money of the scheme will be enhanced if the assets being provided by the private sector can be used for commercial activities as well as for purposes directly related to LT's services. Clause 1 also allows LT to enter into agreements with persons such as financiers where that is needed for the purposes of a contract.

Clause 2 makes provision for LT to acquire land, by agreement, for purposes connected with such agreements. That would, for example, as I have said, enable land to be acquired in LT's name for an electricity sub-station not directly required for LT's own purposes, but for use by the contractor in supplying electricity to LUL. I would emphasise that that is not a compulsory purchase power; it is intended to safeguard LT's claim to essential assets at the end of a PFI contract.

The clause also provides that LT may, with the consent of the Secretary of State, carry on the commercial activities of a PFI contractor when the contractor ceases to do so. That power, I emphasise, is intended to be used only as a last resort. It is not the Government's intention that, as and when PFI contracts come to an end, LT should progressively acquire a portfolio of commercial interests.

The expectation is that when PFI contracts expire, the commercial activities associated with them will normally either cease or pass to a new private sector contractor, following a further competition. But we do need to provide for what I trust will be very rare circumstances in which a contract comes to an end prematurely, for instance through default of the contractor. In that situation, LT would clearly want, and would have the powers, to take over immediately those functions connected with the running of its own services. But it would be perverse if services being provided to third parties then had to be terminated.

Thus the aim is that LT would in those exceptional circumstances be able to take over on a caretaker basis the provision of such services, pending the establishment of suitable arrangements to put them back into the private sector. The Secretary of State would expect to give consent to such arrangements only on the basis that LT would do its best to find a private sector party to take over as soon as practicable.

Clause 3 provides the facility for certain of LT's statutory operating powers, not including LT's main functions under the 1984 Act, to be transferable by order to or from another party. The aim of the provisions is to ensure that for schemes involving the provision of some aspect of passenger services involving statutory powers, those powers may be exercisable, for the duration of the contract, by a PFI contractor.

We also want to ensure that the necessary statutory powers can be exercised by LT at the end of a PFI contract. For example, a scheme for the east London line extensions might involve a PFI contractor in providing a train service, for which he would need the relevant operating powers. But again I emphasise that while in such cases a contractor might physically be providing the service, and should have as much commercial freedom as possible to respond to public demand, the service would remain within the overall control of LT under the terms of the 1984 Act.

Finally, clause 4 simply makes consequential amendments to the 1984 Act and to other legislation. Clause 5 is a standard financial provision. It does not mean that we expect the Bill to increase public expenditure. Indeed, by enabling LT to gain the maximum benefit from the private finance initiative, it should reduce LT's need for Government grant. Clause 6 contains the usual provisions in relation to short title, commencement and extent.

Summing up, therefore, the Bill is a limited but important measure which, while not affecting the fundamental role or powers of London Transport, will substantially enhance its capacity to secure maximum benefit from the Government's private finance initiative. LT has been closely involved in the preparation of the Bill and is fully supportive of it.

In particular, the Bill will enable LT to take forward and secure best value from schemes already in progress such as those relating to power supplies, ticketing and communications. In turn, developments such as those, and others in the pipeline, will deliver real benefits to passengers.

On that basis, I commend the Bill to the House.

5.5 pm

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): I beg to move, to leave out from "That" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to the London Regional Transport Bill because although the House welcomes the higher levels of investment in transport infrastructure provided in the Bill by the development of Private Finance Initiative projects by London Regional Transport, it does not believe that the privatisation of London Underground would be in the interests of London, and fears that this Bill contains powers which will be used to that end."

I suppose that I should first express gratitude to the Government for having managed to fit such a lengthy debate into their heavy business programme. At that point, for the benefit of Hansard, I should say: he said ironically. I also congratulate the Minister on a bravura performance.

[Mr. Brian Wilson]

He is put up on occasions such as this because he is one of the few who has the wit to think on his feet. That is meant to be a compliment, incidentally.

I thought that I should equip myself with suitable research, so the House of Commons Library kindly provided John Glover's "London Underground". If things should flag a bit, there is a slightly weightier tome entitled "A Regional History of the Railways of Great Britain". If, at about 8 o'clock tonight, things are really desperate, we might need some international perspective and I have here "Underground Railways of the World—Their History and Development" by H. C. P. Havers. However, I am sure that none of that will be necessary because many of my hon. Friends are anxious to contribute to this important debate on a much valued public institution, London Underground.

I make it clear that the Labour party will support any sensible measure which makes it easier for London Underground to get more money into the system for desperately needed investment so long as it is consistent with a public operation of an integrated system. In so far as the Bill advances that objective, we shall facilitate its progress. But the water has been muddied in a most unhelpful manner by the blatherings of the Deputy Prime Minister and lord high everything, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who, only last month, was demanding that a commitment to privatise London Underground should be included in the next Tory manifesto.

It is unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman is not with us today so that he could pay his debts to London, if to nobody else, by making it clear that his desire to privatise London Underground does not underlie the Bill. In his absence, we can only take the Minister's word for it, which I am happy to do.

But first let us consider what the Deputy Prime Minister has said. I quote from the London Evening Standard of 1 February in which we were advised that "A radical new drive to sell off London Underground to the private sector is being planned by Cabinet Ministers."

It says:

"Michael Heseltine, the deputy prime minister, has told the Transport Secretary Sir George Young that he wants to include 'a commitment' to privatise LU in the party manifesto for the General Election. The plan, one of a number of options being studied by Mr. Heseltine for inclusion in the manifesto, is now being actively considered by the two Ministers."

That may sound like a contradiction in terms.

"Exactly how the sell-off . . . would be accomplished is not yet known. But, with expanding and guaranteed passenger numbers . . . LU has long been viewed by some senior Tories as 'ripe' and the next in line for privatisation following British Rail."

None of that is very encouraging for those of us who have followed the progress of British Rail's privatisation. I might say in passing to the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) that I would be happy to engage in a general discussion about the merits and beneficial effects or otherwise of privatisation, but the characteristic of the first two privatised rail franchises is that the managers have already said that they will make no new investment in rolling stock during the lifetime of the franchises. I see the hon. Member's brow furrow at that modest challenge to his ideological position. I assure him that that is the position, and I heard from the lips of Mr. Brian Souter of Stagecoach that the franchising system does not allow for investment in new rolling stock. There will be no new rolling stock from South West Trains or from Great Western Trains or, I suspect, from any of the other seven-year franchises, because the system militates against investment in rolling stock.

Mr. Norris rose—

Mr. John Marshall rose—

Mr. Wilson: I shall give way to the Minister, and I shall give way to the hon. Member for Hendon, South later.

Mr. Norris: I wish to say what I imagine my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) wishes to say. The hon. Gentleman may be right to make that observation, but he will not have heard either of the two contractors say that they are not dedicated to bringing about substantial service improvements. Mr. Brian Souter and those who manage Great Western Trains are quite clear that, even within the seven-year contract period, they can deliver substantial service enhancements which, so far at least, British Rail has failed to deliver.

Mr. Wilson: I do not accept that. In the Great Western Trains and South West Trains areas, British Rail has delivered rather good services. I will let the Minister's comment pass because I do not want to start a general debate about privatisation. But I notice a rapid shift in ground. I picked up the hon. Member for Hendon, South specifically on the subject of investment, because he referred to investment. I thought the Minister might say that there would be no new trains on the underground if it were privatised, but that there will be investment in tracks, tunnels, bridges and the infrastructure. If he had said that, I would have said that, with many fanfares of trumpets, Railtrack has produced a 10-year investment plan that actually envisages less investment than has been provided in the past 10 years. However, I will leave that point for another time.

Mr. John Marshall: I met Mr. Brian Souter of South West Trains at the Confederation of Passenger Transport dinner and I spoke to him about investment and how privatisation was going. He said that when he took over the franchise, he was told that a relatively modest investment would improve the reliability of service. He asked how much it would cost and he told the individuals concerned to go ahead. They said that they had been trying to get the investment for 18 months under British Rail and they had got it in less than 18 days from South West Trains. Mr. Brian Souter has invested in improving the quality of the service, and the hon. Gentleman is wrong to denigrate him as he does.

Mr. Wilson: That sounds like a rather partisan account of the conversation between the hon. Gentleman and Mr. Souter. The hon. Gentleman extolled the virtues of privatising London Underground on the specific ground that it would bring investment in rolling stock. I pointed out, inconveniently for the hon. Gentleman, that the franchisees in rail privatisation have gone on record as saying that they will not invest in rolling stock. Incidentally, The Independent today reports that, after the first month's operation of South West Trains and Great Western Trains, there has already been a decline in time keeping. That will not matter to Conservative Members because they are interested not in time keeping or the effects on passengers, but in the dogma of privatisation.

Ms Glenda Jackson: My hon. Friend will be aware that a Conservative think tank—in 1994, I believe—floated the idea of the privatisation of London Underground. The improvement in services for Londoners contained in that document was a reduction in the network of almost two thirds. The document also suggested that one way to raise the necessary funding for investment would be to offer for sale the names of existing London Underground stations. For example, it was suggested that perhaps Harrods would like to bid to change the name of Knightsbridge station to Harrods. Although the Minister has argued fairly forcefully that the Government are not attempting to privatise London Underground, the idea has been floating around in the Conservative party for some years.

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend is right. I always think that "Conservative think tank" is a contradiction in terms, but her general point is perfectly accurate.

I accept the spirit of the Minister's assurances today, but I must point out that he is an old lag. He has made comments on the subject before that were not in line with what he has said today. The Evening Standard article, to which I referred earlier, states:

"Just over two years ago Steven Norris, London's minister for transport, in an interview with the Evening Standard, described franchises"— in the context of London Underground—

"as 'just pure common sense.' At the time Mr. Norris said: 'Franchises could be offered on line-by-line basis. That is a concept we have clearly got to examine.'"

One does not have to be paranoid—having read those quotations, considered the history and, indeed, listened to the comments from Tory Members this afternoon—to suspect that even in this apparently innocuous or constructive Bill all might not be quite as it seems. The not very cleverly hidden agenda is the privatisation of London Underground.

I would have thought that by now even the tiny band of zealots assembled on the Tory Benches this afternoon might show some restraint in so uncritically singing the praises of the railway franchising concept, because it is certainly not proving very popular in public opinion. The Minister is on the record as supporting the principle of franchising London Underground services and privatising the whole system. Even more importantly—if that is possible—the Deputy Prime Minister has come straight out and said that he wants to see the privatisation of London Underground in the next Tory manifesto. The gaggle of Tory Members of Parliament from whom we have heard today are all clearly committed to the privatisation of London Underground. So we are entitled to inspect the Bill closely and we will do that this afternoon and again in Committee.

I might as well lay down a marker. We will resist and we will prevent the privatisation of London Underground this side of a general election. The Minister, voluntarily, will not be in the House thereafter, but the people who want to privatise everything that provides a worthwhile public service in this society will not be in government to fulfil those ambitions.

I do not want to get into a general argument about privatisation, but I despise the way in which public service is denigrated in the House. The Tories can make some claims on behalf of some privatisations. They can point to British Airways as a success story and to the success of British Telecom, although it would have been successful anyway and it probably would not have shed so many jobs in the process. But the idea, which Conservative Members propagate, that everything in the public sector was a failure and a burden on the taxpayer is so mendacious as to require correction. For example, British Airways is now a profitable and successful airline, but when it was in the public sector it was also profitable. The electricity industry has never paid as much to the Exchequer in tax as it did prior to privatisation in profits. In the gas industry, the price of domestic gas has not yet returned to 1979 levels in spite of the fact that we are now self-sufficient in gas. In all these industries, the public sector did a good job for the country. It would behove Tory Members to recognise that, instead of getting caught up in their ideological obsession with denigrating everything in the public sector.

Mr. Norris: In 1979, the nationalised industries consumed just over £2 billion in public support; in 1994, they cumulatively paid more than £2.5 billion in corporation tax to the taxpayer. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that unarguable proposition?

Secondly, whatever the hon. Gentleman's view of the merits of British Airways, and of whether it would have made a profit if allowed to continue in the public sector, it was his colleagues who claimed that that privatisation would be a disaster. It has palpably not been a disaster, which is why we would claim the same success for the railways and other privatisations. That, surely, is the hon. Gentleman's real logical difficulty.

Mr. Wilson: If we were going to debate this in more detail, I would accept some of what the Minister says about British Airways. But I do not accept his more general point. What he says about what the public industries cost and now produce is straight out of the Conservative central office crib sheet. In fact, there were two heavy loss makers in the public sector: the coal and steel industries—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have allowed hon. Members to stray rather wide with their examples, but now we should get back to the Bill.

Mr. Wilson: The public utilities used to put more money into the Treasury than they do now—that fact should not be forgotten. The analogy between British Airways and the railways, or London Underground, is false. British Airways was a profitable transport business. In this country as in every other, however, the railways require public subsidy. So the question of the railways is qualitatively different from any question attaching to previous privatisations. The only question is whether the public subsidies provided anyway by the taxpayer, in the private or public sector, are better spent on developing the industry and maximising the quality of public service or on funding the private profits of the operators.

Mr. Keith Hill: Is my hon. Friend aware of the findings of the Transport Select Committee, of which I am a member, that the consequences of the franchising system for the British taxpayer are an annual extra cost of £600 million? Does he agree that there is every reason to believe that if London Underground were privatised, the burden on the taxpayer to sustain that privatisation would be similarly increased?

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend is of course right. The all-party Select Committee under the—not exactly Trotskyite—chairmanship of the hon. Member for Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) reached the unanimous conclusion that privatisation would cost the taxpayer £600 million a year more for no extra services. If the Tories think that is good value for money, theirs can hardly claim to be the party of business.

Mr. Garnier: Can the hon. Gentleman spare us a few minutes to explain how he reconciles the two halves of his amendment? His party

"welcomes the higher levels of investment" provided by the PFI, yet does not believe "that the privatisation of London Underground would be in the interests of London".

Can he explain the apparent inconsistency?

Mr. Wilson: We have heard a great deal about this brilliant lawyer who presumably collects large sums of money outside the Chamber for that quality of intervention. I am surprised to have to point out to him that the PFI, even under the Tories, is not synonymous with privatisation. There is no contradiction between a joint funding approach and public control—the public operation of a public asset.

Mr. Garnier: So the hon. Gentleman has no problem with this Bill?

Mr. Wilson: Do people pay the hon. and learned Gentleman for this kind of intervention? Does he win any cases? I do not understand his difficulty. Even the Minister was generous enough to point out that my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) realised that there are ways of getting private money into public projects so as to facilitate the public sector's operation and provide the private sector with returns. [HON. MEMBERS: "The right hon. Gentleman is a great man."] Indeed he is, as even the Minister, who appears to be demob happy, would agree. Such partnerships also create employment and accelerate the pace of investment in public projects. They are therefore wholly desirable.

Ever since I have taken an interest in these matters, Ministers—notably the right hon. Members for Henley and for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), now known as the right hon. Member for Hill Samuel MacGregor—have stood at the Dispatch Box and said that it is impossible to get private money into public projects. They said that that was a naive approach to circumventing public spending rules. They said that it could not be done; a project had to be wholly private or wholly public. That was the Government's approach until recently. They are latecomers to the idea of public-private partnerships.

The problem is that, once converted, the Tories cannot get off the ideological hook. They cannot allow the public sector to remain in the driving seat. All the experience of the PFI so far shows that public-private partnerships happen only when the ultimate commitment to the project remains in the public sector. Without that, the private sector will not accept the risk entailed in most of these projects. That is why I genuinely believe that there will be a great many of these projects under a Labour Government. We will not be hung up on insisting that an unreasonable degree of risk must be passed to the private sector. We will go for pragmatic arrangements that allow the private sector to do what it is good at and the public sector to do what it is good at. London Underground will benefit from that.

Mr. Stephen: Would we be mistaken if we concluded that the hon. Gentleman and his party have an ideological objection to privatisation?

Mr. Wilson: We have no such objection in principle. I have no wish to buy back the Carlisle pubs for British Rail. Over the years some things have passed into the public sector that should not be there and which can be better done in the private sector. But our residual antipathy, such as it is, to the idea that the private sector can do everything better than the public sector is as nothing compared with the hatred that Tory Members display towards the public sector, and compared with their obsessive, irrational and unsubstantiated belief that there is nothing that the public sector can do better on behalf of the taxpayer.

I say that the public sector can do some things better and more efficiently, in the social, environmental and economic interests of the wider community.

Mr. Norris: I support the hon. Gentleman's remarks, in that my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), the former Secretary of State, used to make that very point to the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) when he was Labour's transport spokesman. The one thing that the Government do better than the private sector is to borrow money at finer rates. The right hon. Gentleman continually proposed leasing, a concept that he identified to accelerate public investment. But the only consequence was to impose far greater costs on the Exchequer than it would have borne if the Government had invested the funds in the first place.

The hon. Gentleman has neglected to identify how the PFI works: the transfer of risk from the public to the private sector, together with the responsibility for operations, forces greater efficiencies and greater economies. That is not because the people involved are inherently superior—I readily concede that point to the hon. Gentleman—but simply because they have more financial muscle available to them.

Mr. Wilson: The Minister is more reasonable than some of his colleagues in that he enters the latter caveat. There are no absolutes in this. Of course, risk should be transferred to the private sector, but it is a matter of degree.

I return to London Underground and the Northern line project, which is in the process of going ahead under the PFI. ABB, the company that was to the fore in advocating the project and carrying it forward, and, ultimately, I argue, making it happen, eventually pulled out because of the degree of risk that the Government wished to transfer to it. I recall that the value of residual assets was the stumbling point. As a result 700 people are unemployed. It also happened for GEC Alsthom, and the managing director left shortly afterwards. It will be interesting to know what the highest echelons of GEC Alsthom think about the level of risk that it has accepted on the Northern line project. It will be even more interesting to know whether the Government will get away with it a second time, as it is fairly well known in the industry that nobody else would have accepted the level of risk that was passed on to make the Northern line project happen. I note that the Minister does not deny that.

We are talking here about a matter of balance. We want the projects to happen. We are happy to facilitate a measure that will make them happen, but we do not want any form of back-door privatisation. Ministers cannot complain if we thoroughly test every word that they say on this subject, because the precedents and their public utterances on the subject have been very much in the direction of all-out privatisation.

I could continue with further cuttings that show that what the Government really have in mind for London Underground is privatisation. After I had got through the first few cuttings about the privatisation of London Underground, which I got from the Library today, I noticed that one was written by the crime correspondent of the London Evening Standard. I immediately thought that we were on to the LTS contract, but we shall pass on that. The Bill should include a clause, perhaps, that the public sector should not be defrauded by the private sector, but that is not Tory philosophy either.

Mr. Spearing: Before my hon. Friend leaves privatisation entirely, does he agree that although the Minister said that it was not his intention to let Wisconsin Central or its equivalent play a big part in the Central line in future—other Ministers may well allow it—the Bill permits large-scale contractorisation, which is not very different from privatisation, which we would not accept, because it would not be in the interests of a coherent London Transport railway system, which was created in the 1930s but is now in the process of being dismantled?

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We do not want the fragmentation of the London underground system any more than we wanted the fragmentation of the British railway system, which is now happening with such deleterious consequences.

I am told that all-out privatisation could take place under existing legislation and that the Bill will not make it technically more possible for privatisation to occur, and to some extent we have to be guided by what we are told in these matters. What is important, however, is the credibility of the assurances. That is what we are anxious to test tonight. I cannot find the notes on clauses, so I shall have to paraphrase. The Secretary of State says that there are no manpower implications in the Bill, but then linked to that the statement that manpower employed by London Underground Ltd. will decline as contractorisation increases. That is not exactly encouraging if that is the motivation that underlies the Bill.

Mr. Norris: This is an important point. The hon. Gentleman was generous enough to say that he did not have the notes on clauses in front of him, so I shall correct a misapprehension that I know that he would not wish to leave the House with. The explanatory and financial memorandum says specifically:

"The Bill will have no direct effect on public sector manpower, although the number of LRT employees will decline to the extent that more staff are transferred to contractors under Private Finance Initiative agreements."

That simply acknowledges that the number employed by LRT directly falls as those staff are transferred to PFI contractors. It is not in any respect a statement about numbers of staff overall.

Mr. Wilson: It is useful that the Minister put that on record. I put it on the record that we would prefer to see a directly employed work force under London Underground Ltd. with all the securities and conditions of service that that involves. In getting private money into these projects, there is no need to transfer the employees to separately established private companies. There is no necessary corollary between those two actions. I hope that the Minister recognises that.

Returning briefly to the provision of ticketing at Heathrow, I defer to my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who was good enough to point out to me that, 20 years ago, the Greater London council tried to get ticketing right at Heathrow. He suspects that it might have been more successful if the GLC were still operating it rather than the present quango. We all have a shared interest. I endorse what the Minister said and welcome his remarks that, as the entry point to this country, the provision of ticketing at Heathrow is a disgrace and that something should be done about it.

I have spoken for long enough—[Interruption.]—if that is possible. I could not help but think when I was doing my research that there used to be more interesting debates in the House. I noticed that, in 1862, means of traction were debated, and John Fowler, the engineer, was said to have envisaged that trains would be blown through an airtight tunnel, using giant compressors at each terminus. If we had that quality of debate now instead of mere political rhetoric, the nation would probably be better informed and better governed.

We have put down our markers. The tube and safety on it is of immense importance. If people did not realise before just what high risks are involved in running an underground system, the tragedy of King's Cross reminded them that it is not something with which to play politics. It is an immensely complex system that needs a high level of investment and maintenance. In so far as the Bill facilitates those ends, we will support it, but it is essential to point out that we do not want the same games to be played with London Underground in terms of fragmentation, franchising and privatisation that have taken place with British Rail.

5.38 pm

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I am grateful to be called early in the debate. I consider it a pleasure to follow the Front-Bench spokesmen. The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), who speaks for the Opposition, was courteous enough to tell me that he has to go to a meeting shortly. I shall not take that amiss. I enjoyed his speech very much. I did not agree with much of it, but he made his points in a balanced and, at times, amusing way.

[Sir Sydney Chapman]

I very much enjoyed the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister. I do not know whether he realises it, but he spoke for one hour and 21 minutes. It seemed—this is the greatest tribute that can be paid to anybody who speaks at length in the Chamber—to be only half an hour long. It probably was if the interventions are discounted. I shall not say that the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North spoke for only half an hour but that it seemed like twice that length, as that was not the case. I cannot match the eloquence of either, but I shall try to be a little more brief.

The Bill is essentially technical, conferring very limited powers. It is basically intended to encourage and increase capital investment in London Transport in general and London Underground in particular. I consider it right for London Transport's limited powers to be increased in the restricted sense in which the Bill increases them.

The Bill is also about private finance initiatives. My hon. Friend the Minister identified one of those initiatives, which is already—so to speak—in train: the Heathrow link. The British Airports Authority is to contribute £300 million in a partnership between the public and the private sector. I welcome that; I also welcome—this is nearer to my parochial home—the £400 million that is being invested in new rolling stock on the Northern line. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House have encouraged that investment, including my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) and the hon. Members for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), for Streatham (Mr. Hill), for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Khabra), all of whom are in their places.

I am not sure whether I understood my hon. Friend the Minister correctly, but he gave the impression that the new rolling stock—which I prefer to call trains; the stock on the Northern line is certainly rolling at present—would not start to be introduced until the middle of next year. I was rather disappointed by that: I had hoped that the first trains would be introduced at the end of this year. Perhaps my hon. Friend will be able to reassure the House, later if not now. Certainly, we welcome the 100 or more trains that will come on to our local Northern line.

In addition to the private finance initiatives that have already been announced and are about to be implemented, my hon. Friend mentioned a further £750 million that will enable London Transport to invest in three further specific projects. First, it plans improvements to the communications system, which I gather involves an integrated radio network. I must confess that, as a product of the pre-computer age, I do not really understand these matters, but such a system is certainly needed.

Secondly, London Transport also proposes to improve the ticketing system, and that too is necessary. Hon. Members have mentioned arriving at Heathrow. I take the Northern line, rather than fly to Heathrow, to get to Westminster. I use the underground regularly. I have used it even more since I ceased to be a Minister. There are two types of automated ticket dispenser: there is the type that demands the exact price of the ticket, and the type that gives change. I have observed that, although there is rarely a queue at those machines, there is always a queue at the window and that it consists of people who do not have any change and, no doubt, a few who do not know how to use the automated machines. I do not believe that the replacement of automated machines by any number of people would speed up the dispensing of tickets. I say that not for ideological reasons, but on the basis of observation at the sharp end.

Thirdly, there is a private finance initiative project to improve the power supply throughout the underground. It is entirely reasonable that the Bill should contain approval for electricity sub-stations in private ownership to be built on LT land. I see nothing wrong with that.

Let me make one of the few party political points that I shall make. I feel that it needs to be made. I welcome the Bill because it will encourage more private finance initiatives. I also welcome Labour's support for some of the projects that are already under way. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate and I debated the matter on television a few months ago, when I re-entered that medium after six and a half years observing a vow of silence in the Government Whips Office. I believe that the private finance initiative is accepted on both sides of the House; that is certainly the message that I received from the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North.

We all look up suitable quotations not only from what we have said ourselves, but from what our political opponents have said. Let me draw Opposition Members' attention to what was said only six months ago by the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), who I understand is one of the Labour party's economic spokesmen:

> "Alongside our corporate tax strategy is our widescale commitment to nurturing partnership between the public and private sector, particularly with regard to partnerships in infrastructure investment, putting old battles between public and private behind us."

That, I think, reflects the general view of hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Norris: Was it not also the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith)—who succeeded me in the second greatest constituency in England—who said that no alternative to the present Government could conceivably contemplate higher levels of public expenditure than those in which the Government were currently indulging? Does not that show very forcefully why the Bill is essential and, moreover, that Opposition Members could not possibly disagree with it?

Sir Sydney Chapman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Let me add that I hope that rumours that he will not be standing at the next election are without basis. Not only would that be a dreadful loss to the parliamentary Conservative party; the quality of debates in the House would take a tumble. I am sure that at least some Opposition Members share that sentiment. I can say very sincerely of my hon. Friend that he has a rare ability to speak at the Dispatch Box with authority and assurance while displaying no sign of arrogance. He also manages to speak confidently without showing any complacency. I pay due tribute to him.

The Bill is directly related to London Transport, mainly London Underground. It is therefore directly related to the Northern line. I should like to make a few comments about what my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South described eight years ago as an abominable system. The Northern line is indeed the misery line in the London Underground network, not only because it needs a good deal of investment but because it really consists of two separate lines.

Anyone who has studied the configuration of the line will know that one section goes from High Barnet in the north, via the City, to Waterloo and southwards, while the other section starts at Edgware, goes into the other spur at Camden Town and then proceeds southwards, via the west end and Waterloo. The line is rather like a chain, in that its strongest point is its weakest link—Camden Town, where the track is not sufficient to deal with the demand for services, especially during the rush hour.

I am told that, if the two parts of the line were separated, between 20 and 30 per cent. more traffic could use it. I suspect, however, that if they were separated—which I understand would cost billions of pounds—my constituents would complain when they wanted to go to the west end, just as the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South would complain that they could not go directly to the City.

The Northern line is unique. For a considerable amount of its length—from, I think, East Finchley to Morden—it contains the longest tunnel in the world. Although that might be the proud boast of people who espouse the Northern line's cause, it results in its being probably the most unpopular line for employees in the London Transport network. I suggest that staff who work on the Northern line should be paid a premium, to try to ensure that more employees will agree to work on it. Although there may not be a shortage of employees on the London Underground system as a whole, there inevitably is a shortage on the Northern line.

I shall not bore the House by reminding it of some of the investment figures that I managed to glean from my hon. Friend the Minister in an intervention, but the problem facing London Underground has been caused by chronic underinvestment in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s. It is hard for us to realise it but, until the late 1970s, planning for London Transport assumed that, each year, fewer people would use the system or, to be more precise, people would use the system on fewer occasions. That was partly to do with the great growth, during those three decades, of car ownership.

Suddenly, towards the end of the 1970s—when Labour and Conservative Governments were in power—it was realised that the chronic underinvestment had to be dealt with. In the 1970s, capital investment in London Underground averaged under £50 million a year. Between the end of 1979 and the beginning of the 1990s, it increased to more than £500 million a year. That does not include an additional £500 million of annual investment in the Jubilee line extension at present.

Mr. Keith Hill: I am deeply reluctant to labour a point that I have already made but, until the late 1960s, London Transport was under a statutory break-even requirement and, as the hon. Gentleman has conceded, its demand for central Government funding did not emerge until the late 1970s. It is bogus to draw comparisons between funding in the 1970s and in the current period as, in the 1970s, London Transport did not demand the same level of central Government subvention. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that it is far more relevant to examine the decline in core investment in London Underground from £683 million in 1992-93 to—this is a revised estimate—some £380 million in 1997-98. That is a scandal and he must justify it.

Sir Sydney Chapman: I do not try to justify it because it is nowhere near the reality. I understand what the hon. Gentleman says, but even if he were correct—which he is in technical terms—the vast increase in investment far outweighs those esoteric considerations. We could debate this all night, but most certainly will not.

In saying that investment has risen from under £50 million a year in the 1970s to more than £500 million a year in the 1990s, I exclude inflation. Allowing for inflation, but still excluding investment in the Jubilee line extension, a real comparison of those figures shows that we have quadrupled investment, but that is, perhaps, more an argument for the Committee stage of the Bill. I hesitate to say that only because I should like to assure the Government Whip on the Front Bench that that is not an invitation for me to be invited to join the Committee.

I am grateful for the House's indulgence. More and more investment is needed on the London Underground system. After the Government reached investment of £500 million a year, London Underground managers demanded that it should be £750 million a year. We would all like to wave our proverbial wands and to give more to London Underground.

That brings me back to the central point of the debate and of why we need the Bill. The taxpayer will, I hope—we cannot be certain about the future—put more and more into London Underground, year on year. Given the other priorities of public spending—pensioners at my constituency meetings do not put investment in London Underground ahead of the need to increase the state retirement pension—the only way that we can find the finance to secure the necessary investment in London Underground in the next decade is the private finance initiative. That is why I welcome the Bill.

The Bill is short. As my hon. Friend the Minister said, it has six clauses but, essentially, it has just three. It is technical but important and I commend it to the House.

5.56 pm

Mr. Keith Hill (Streatham): Despite the Minister's protests of injured innocence, my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) was clearly right to subject the Bill to his usual scathing analysis as it is a possible paving measure towards privatisation of London Underground.

Bitter experience has taught Labour Members that the Government are not always entirely transparent in their intentions on matters of privatisation. Like my hon. Friend, and also my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), I spent many weeks on the Standing Committee that considered the Railways Bill in 1993. During that long consideration, did Ministers mention their intention to privatise Railtrack before the completion of the franchising process on British Rail? Did they mention even Railtrack's flotation?

It is not without reason, therefore, that we are suspicious of the Government's intentions—all the more so in this case. After all, there has hardly been an absence of smoke about the Government's preference for privatisation of the tube system. My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North referred to the story in early February in The Independent headlined:

"Tory plan to sell off tube".

According to The Independent, that is one of the pet projects of the indefatigable First Secretary of State and viceroy of Henley—that is about the only title that he has not yet assumed, and I hope that I have not planted the idea in his mind—for inclusion in the next Tory party manifesto.

Mr. Norris: My right hon. Friend the First Secretary of State will be reading the record of these proceedings.

Mr. Hill: Exactly—no doubt he will read the record assiduously on the morrow and we shall receive an announcement in due course.

The interesting thing about that story was that it was not ascribed just to the First Secretary of State. The Independent was able to find a number of London Conservative Members who were ready to justify the scheme, so it is hardly news to them. There is, as they say, no smoke without fire. Judging from Tory Members' interventions, the privateers are snapping at the Minister's heels, despite his disavowals. Frankly, as a London Labour Member of Parliament I am almost tempted to welcome any proposal for privatising the tube. After the chaos of rail privatisation, for the majority of Londoners the privatisation of the tube would be the final nail in the Government's coffin.

If the Minister and the Government mean what they say about the Bill having nothing to do with privatisation, they will not vote against Labour's reasoned amendment. If they do vote against it, Londoners will draw the obvious conclusion, which is that a sell-off of the tube is in the Government's sights. I just hope that Ministers are braced for the consequences.

Mr. Wilson: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is an exact parallel with rail privatisation? While Londoners, including my hon. Friend's constituents, are wholly opposed to any privatisation of the tube, they would be even more appalled by its possible fragmentation.

Mr. Hill: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. He is right. The frightening thing is that the Tory think tank's favourite scheme is to sell all 10 London tube lines. It is a recipe for chaos and disaster for London's travelling public. When Londoners learn that Conservative Back Benchers, at least, are contemplating fragmentation of the tube, they will be even more pronounced in their reaction to the Bill.

I shall adopt a more charitable note and take the Minister at his stated intentions. If the Bill is simply devised in part, as the Minister has assured us, to permit London Underground to diversify its profit-making activities—for example, the fibre-optic cable scheme—I, for one, certainly have no objection. On the contrary, I am all for public sector companies engaging in profitable innovation. Many of the former nationalised utilities did so very successfully, which is why the Government were able to privatise them in due course. That sort of profit-making innovation is an entirely proper activity for a public sector company in a mixed economy. It is exactly the sort of freedom that the Labour party wants for the Post Office, but which the Government are consistently resisting.

If, in addition and as the Minister declared, the Bill is designed to facilitate London Regional Transport's participation in further private finance initiatives, I am all for that, too. We welcomed the initial embrace of the private finance initiative concept in 1991 by the right hon. Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), in his previous incarnation, and the subsequent, even warmer, embrace of the concept by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Of course, Labour Members know that the true origins of the concept lie not in Kingston upon Thames but with my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). It is exactly the right sort of public-private partnership that we should be aiming for in British industry at the end of the 20th century.

It is also indisputably the case that the PFI has hardly been a roaring success under the Government, with only one fifth of authorised expenditure having been expended on schemes to date. That is why I have been impressed by the detailed thinking undertaken by the Labour Treasury team on this. I have read all the documents carefully. As the Member of Parliament who acted as secretary to the all-party Northern line group during the lengthy and tortuous negotiations on the Northern line PFI—which ultimately succeeded, much to the advantage of my constituents in Clapham and Balham—I appreciate Labour's new proposals on the PFI concept. For example, I appreciate the objectives of securing greater prioritisation among the PFIs, of achieving greater clarity in the terms on which the private sector should be required to submit tenders and how risk and returns are to be shared and, not least, of streamlining the decision-making process. I am also interested in Labour's newer thinking about mechanisms to insure private and public sectors against the risks involved in such projects.

The PFI offers the leverage of private sector borrowing because of the efficiency gains from private sector management of the projects, but it is important to recognise that it does not actually secure significant extra funding. PFIs can bring forward projects, but at the end of the day they still have to be paid for out of public funds—either out of enhanced revenues, as is anticipated with the Northern line PFI, or directly from the Exchequer. Nevertheless, where PFIs are possible, they are very much to be encouraged. The Bill is designed to facilitate PFIs associated with power supply on the underground and with a new ticketing system. I hope that there remains scope for further PFIs more directly concerned with infrastructure on the underground—rolling stock, track and signalling renewals and, perhaps, station development.

As the Minister has already said, PFIs will succeed only where there is a real profit incentive for the private sector. The truth is that much, if not most of the renewals still desperately needed on the underground relate to intrinsically loss-making infrastructure and services. It is obvious that investment in such areas should be the subject of direct Government expenditure; yet the blunt truth is that the Government have proved reluctant to fund more than, at most, 60 or 70 per cent. of the capital investment that London Underground has identified as necessary to create, in its words, "a decently modern metro".

That level of investment was set at £700 million by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in 1991. Although I have seen subsequent disavowals that the Government ever accepted that figure as the correct level, the very fact that in 1991, the year of the report, the then Secretary of State for Transport convinced the Chancellor to increase investment to that precise level is persuasive enough proof that the Government knew that it was the right level.

The trouble was that that munificence extended for just 12 months. Having geared up to spend £683 million at 1995-96 prices on the core network in 1992-93, London Underground found its capital investment slashed by £150 million the following year. Since then, there has been a see-sawing in capital investment in the core network from one "Financial Statement" to the next—but, on the whole, there has been a distinct downward trend. There was £550 million for the core network in 1993-94, £546 million in 1994-95 and £549 million in 1995-96. Last year London Underground requested £581 million for 1996-97, but got £413 million. For the following two years to 1999, the equivalent projected sums are £383 million for each year.

Mr. Norris: Did the hon. Gentleman refer to grant or did he refer to investment? If he is referring to grant, he must acknowledge that to any grant provided must be added the very substantial internally generated investment by London Transport to give a total figure for what actually matters, which is investment in service. He will acknowledge that investment in the service is at a consistent all-time high.

Mr. Hill: I certainly accept that point, but I do not think that there is any point in having a partisan dispute. The Minister is absolutely right about the global figure for investment in the core network and the Jubilee line extension, about which I shall comment in a moment, and it would be foolish to challenge that assertion. It seems highly unsatisfactory, however, that the admirable efforts of London Transport to generate its own funding, which is running at £200 million a year, should be responsible for almost 40 per cent. of its capital investment funding. I doubt whether any public transport system in any major capital city in the western world has such a requirement for self-generated capital funding placed on it.

Mr. Garnier: So that I may understand the hon. Gentleman's point, can he say what level of direct grant he would propose if he were the Minister responsible for London Underground?

Mr. Hill: I will gladly do that. The hon. and learned Gentleman is anticipating my argument; if he will bear with me, I will come to his point.

Mr. Stephen: If a business has the ability to generate a substantial proportion of its own funds for investment, is there any reason in principle why it should not do so?

Mr. Hill: Absolutely not, but the essence of my argument is that there should not be such a heavy burden placed on self-generated funding in the overall capital programme. We ought to be innovative in our approach to possible funding for transport infrastructure programmes. Self-generated funding is one source. Central Government funding is another. Perhaps we should also be considering other sources, about which I shall comment. In principle, of course there is no objection to internally generated funds forming part of the capital programme.

I should like to make two points about the record of investment in London Underground over the past few years. First, the investment is inconsistent, and that is no way to run a railway. It is grossly unfair on policy makers in London Underground, who cannot construct reliable future investment programmes against a backdrop of the see-sawing profile of central Government grant. It creates a demoralising climate of uncertainty in the company—hopes are raised for the implementation of projects and then subsequently dashed. Such uncertainty also creates its own dis-economies. Time and resources invested in developing projects are wasted when funding ceases abruptly. I am not recommending it, but it would have almost been better for planners at London Transport to have been guaranteed stability at a lower level than to suffer the slings and arrows of such inconstant fortune at the Government's hands.

Secondly, funding for the core network will approximately halve between 1993 and 1998. The original figure suggested by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission of £750 million at current prices was a realistic assessment of what is needed to develop a modestly improving metro system for our capital city. The Government and their successors ought to recognise their responsibility in that respect. I hope that that satisfies the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier). We are talking not about megabucks in this context but about making the difference between an underground system that is set on a process of slow decline and one which, in an unspectacular fashion, can continue to meet the needs of London as a working economy and a centre of tourism.

I should anticipate a further intervention by the hon. and learned Member for Harborough by hastily adding that, as a mere Back Bencher, someone of my humble status cannot possibly be construed as offering a spending pledge on behalf of Labour in the lead-up to the next election. I am talking as much to my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North as I am to the Government, who apparently have neither the will nor the time to make the necessary change, since they are so obviously on their way out, when I say that London nowadays is short-changed in the relationship between its contribution to the national economy and its share in investment in the Exchequer. It generates one fifth of the nation's wealth and gets back one seventh in Exchequer expenditure.

Of course, I accept the principle of redistribution—I do not suppose that I would be sitting on the Opposition Benches if I did not. There are great riches in London, but it also has the greatest reservoir of unemployed persons in the country. Half of the top 25 parliamentary constituencies with the highest level of unemployment are in London—one of them is mine. It is my firm belief that a new balance must be struck to correct the present distortion in the distribution of national wealth. Higher investment in London's transport infrastructure would be one means of doing that. I repeat my belief that such higher investment ought to be forthcoming from the Government and I express my hope that it will be from the next Labour Government.

In any circumstances, either as an alternative or, it is to be hoped, as a supplement to higher Government funding—to address the point to which I referred in response to the hon. Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen)—we ought to be ready to consider other sources of financing the London transport infrastructure, including the London underground.

For many years, a company levy has helped to develop Paris's massively impressive overground and underground railway system. Remarkably, that is exactly what is on offer from London's businesses as well. Almost six years ago, in May 1990, the Corporation of London published its far-sighted report on London's transport, "A Plan to Protect the Future". That report contained a proposal for a supplement to the then unified business rate, to be earmarked for transport improvements in London.

The same plan has been taken up by the excellent London First group as part of its transport initiative. Its essential proposal is to invite businesses to vote on whether to contribute to a specific programme of investment in existing and new railway lines—overground and underground—in London. If that were agreed, the contribution would be collected through a surcharge on the national non-domestic rate. The potential of the scheme is obvious. A 10 per cent. addition to the NNDR would yield in London between £300 million and £400 million a year—more than enough to fill the gap between Exchequer funding and the needs of the core underground network.

I regret that Ministers have shilly-shallied about the proposal—I suppose that we can hope for no more—which I repeat has been on offer from London's businesses for almost six years. Ministers have raised concerns about expenditure being counted against the public sector borrowing requirement. As London First has pointed out, routes around the PSBR concept were devised for the community charge, for council tax and for grant-maintained schools, and a route ought also to be found to secure such a remarkable offer.

Mr. Stephen: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting proposition. Does he accept that although most businesses do not mind paying tax on money that they have earned, they object to paying tax on money that they have not earned? The problem with non-domestic rates, as with national insurance contributions, is that they do not relate to a business's ability to pay.

Mr. Hill: That may or may not be the case. Let us suck it and see, test it out, put it on trial and ask businesses, as their representative organisation in London is inviting us to do.

Mr. Norris: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) for giving way, because I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham (Mr. Stephen) is making an extremely important point. I must tell the hon. Member for Streatham that government is about slightly more than sucking it and seeing, inviting though that prospect may be. [Interruption.] I do not see what the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) finds so risible.

If the hon. Member for Streatham suggests the notion of additional taxation for London's hard-pressed business community, and if he accepts the undeniable fact asserted by my hon. Friend the Member for Shoreham—that the national non-domestic rate takes no account of the profitability of an individual enterprise or of its ability to pay—precisely what has the hon. Member for Streatham sucked and seen that the rest of us do not know about? Will he enlighten us? Will he get away from all the hyperbole and vague arm wavings and give us some details of his scheme for a tax on London's businesses? For example, does he think that the small shopkeepers of Streatham would be happy to pay a tax to deliver crossrail? I should be interested if he can give us an answer.

Mr. Hill: Recoiling from that devastating intervention, I must point out that it is not for me to suck it and see in that context. Notwithstanding the Minister's many claims to esteem in the House—many of us have already said that we regard him as an ornament to the Chamber—he will surely accept that both the Corporation of London, which produced a report on London's transport entitled, "A Plan to Protect the Future", and the London Pride Partnership, the representative organisation which incorporates businesses across the capital and is doing a wonderful job promoting London, have published reports in which they make precisely the proposal that I have described. Both those organisations say that the test should be to put the proposition to the businesses themselves. As representative organisations, they obviously have a strong suspicion that London businesses would say yes, because they want to put London first. London First is surely right to observe that if businesses are willing to contribute to transport investment, it would be "bizarre to veto a scheme which enables them to do so in an equitable way".

I earnestly hope that both the Government and my party will revisit that proposal, which has been on offer so long. It is a gift horse that it would be mad to kick in the teeth. That investment is desperately needed.

Mr. Garnier: Reverting to the hon. Gentleman's point about a London transport business tax, did he say what percentage the tax would be of a company's profits or turnover? If he did I missed it. Did he say which authority would levy the tax—a London Transport body, a local government body or central Government? What would be the consequences of the appeals system that would have to be set up to deal with any applications against any unfair levy of taxation that may be made by the body that he hopes to invent? Finally, what total sum does the hon. Gentleman hope that his new tax will raise? Would it be different from the £750 million that he mentioned earlier?

Mr. Hill: Those questions would be better put to the Corporation of London or to London First, because they devised the scheme.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. Gentleman is arguing in favour of the proposal.

Mr. Hill: I will give the hon. and learned Gentleman an example. It is estimated that a 10 per cent. supplement to the national non-domestic rate for London businesses would yield between £300 million and £400 million. I cannot dispute that figure as it appears in a document entitled, "Liberate the Tube", published by the Centre for Policy Studies, so it would appear to have the stamp of approval of one of the hon. and learned Gentleman's Conservative party think tanks. He might have a word with the CPS about the idea; I dare say that he is closer to it than I am.

Mr. Garnier: I would not mind asking—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) giving way?

Mr. Hill: No. I have answered the hon. and learned Member perfectly adequately.

It is perfectly true, as the Minister has repeatedly told us, that capital investment in London is at an all-time high. However, almost half that capital expenditure is devoted solely to the Jubilee line extension. I do not complain about the Jubilee line extension; I am all for new lines. In fact it would suit me if the Minister would here and now give the immediate go-ahead for an extension of the tube to Streatham. That was first promised in 1926, but we are still waiting for it 70 years on. What a wonderful millennium gift that would be for the people of Streatham. I would gladly give way to the Minister if he would make that offer now.

I would not complain about the Jubilee line extension, even if it showed the lowest cost-benefit analysis return of the four new rail projects identified by the 1986 central London rail study. I am sure that it will be a state-of-the-art underground line. But where is the advantage in adding a few miles of the most modern metro in the world to the remaining 250 miles of London underground which is falling into greater decay and dilapidation?

In my view, London Underground is doing a terrific job in keeping the network running, generating an annual £200 million of its own funds for investment and moving as swiftly as it can to capital renewal of the system, even if that makes life difficult at times for underground users. My daily journey to work now involves my negotiating both work on a new ticket hall at Brixton tube station and work on a new escalator at the interchange between the Victoria line and the District and Circle lines at Victoria, and then emerging at the industrial site here at Westminster.

Mr. Norris: When the hon. Gentleman asks where the advantage is to the rest of the tube system of developing the Jubilee line extension, he falls into the trap of assuming that new developments have no impact on the existing system. But of course they do. One of the key advantages of the Jubilee line extension is that it will take travellers from Stratford, for example, directly to the west end. Those people currently use the Central line; the hon. Gentleman will know that even after a £830 million improvement, overcrowding on the east-west flow of the Central line remains a key consideration. One of the greatest advantages of the Jubilee line extension is that it will alleviate pressure on a piece of the existing infrastructure.

Mr. Hill: Again, I accept the Minister's observation. In passenger traffic terms, he must be right. But it is still worth returning to my original question: is the advantage that he describes great enough to justify devoting half the current capital programme of London Underground to a relatively short extension?

The truth is that on its present funding, London Underground Ltd. cannot keep up with the cross-pressures of the backlog of years of underinvestment in the system, together with increasing passenger demand. London Underground can now take on only the most essential engineering upgrades on the unseen parts of the system—signalling, track, bridges, embankments, and so on.

The rising backlog of renewals is highly visible even on the other parts of the system—the parts that passengers see. It would be an education for the Minister to see the appallingly decayed Bakerloo-Northern line interchange at the Elephant and Castle, or to witness the cave-like condition of many of the stations on the City extension of the Northern line.

It has been rightly said—I owe this quotation to the fascinating document published by the Centre for Policy Studies—that

"For many workers in London an underground station is the most dilapidated place they have to experience in their everyday lives."

No wonder so many of them prefer the modernity and convenience of the private car, and increasing car use will be the penalty for neglecting the underground.

This week the Department of the Environment's report, "Indicators of Sustainable Development for the United Kingdom", reminded us of the consequences of the continued supremacy of the great car economy in terms of higher energy consumption, congestion and declining air quality. The Government proclaim their commitment to reducing car dependency but systematically hack away at investment in our transport infrastructure—down 15 per cent. in real terms between 1991-92 and 1997-98. It is high time that the Government put their money where their mouth is, and they could make no better start than by significantly boosting their investment in the tube.

6.30 pm

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): It is always a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) because he and I played an important role together in the all-party friends of the Northern line group, which helped to get the Northern line trains that will come on stream next year.

Of course, the hon. Member for Streatham displayed the irresponsibility that people in opposition enjoy.

Ms Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I hope that the hon. Gentleman will soon enjoy being in opposition.

Mr. Marshall: I have no desire to enjoy that irresponsibility, and do not intend to this century.

The hon. Member for Streatham said that a greater percentage of Government expenditure should be devoted to London, but—naturally—his hon. Friends the shadow Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales say that there should be more Government expenditure in Scotland and Wales, those who come from the north-east want the Government to spend more in the north-east and those who come from the north-west say that more should go to that region.

Mr. Keith Hill: I come from London, so let us agree on that.

Mr. Marshall: We believe in a better deal for London, but the proposals that the hon. Gentleman advocates would not help London.

The hon. Member for Streatham spoke about an employment tax in London. Such a tax would help destroy jobs in London. London First may support the idea, but I remind the hon. Gentleman that the leading light behind London First is Lord Sheppard of Didgemere, from Grand Metropolitan. If one is part of a big multinational company, one is likely to be able to afford an employment tax in London, but if one asked small shopkeepers, who are struggling, or the small business man who employs two or three people, whether they wanted an employment tax in London, they would say no. Many official organisations that claim to be representatives of industry or commerce or farmers and so on are not representative of the opinions of many of those people.

Ms Glenda Jackson: My hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) did not refer to an employment tax.

[Ms Glenda Jackson]

He referred to the idea, which has been presented by the transport initiative of London First, of businesses agreeing to pay to improve London's transport. The London chamber of commerce and the Confederation of British Industry are participating in that London transport initiative. Were it not for the fact that I know interventions must be short, I should read the whole list.

Mr. Marshall: Most people would regard a payment made by industry to a central fund as a tax. It is all very well for the hon. Lady to indulge in semantics, but that is how most people would view it. If they looked at their budget and found that there was a payment "to improving London Transport", they would regard that as a tax, which would reduce their profitability and might put some of them in queer street.

The point that I was trying to make before the hon. Lady asked me to give way was that some of those organisations are not representative of individual companies. I am sure that the Whip on duty, my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Knapman), will have sympathy with the story that I am about to tell. In October 1990, when I was in Scotland, talking to some farmers, the farmers asked me, "Can you try to prevent us joining the exchange rate mechanism?" I said, "I have a lot of sympathy with your point of view"—as I suspect that my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud would—"but unfortunately the National Farmers Union, which seeks to represent the farmers of the country, is telling the Government that they should do it, and do it now."

Those farmers were right; the NFU was wrong. Often organisations such as the Confederation of British Industry, which are run by large companies, which say that they are representative of industry, are not representative of small firms, which lack the time or inclination to send their major directors to interminable meetings to express their views. London First is not representative of industry; it is representative of its members, and they are not representative of every employer in this great capital.

There is a tradition that, when one speaks in a debate, one declares one's interests. The first interest I wish to declare is that, like my hon. Friend the Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mr. Hogg), I am an adviser to the Confederation of Passenger Transport. There is an historic symmetry in that appointment because, when I was convenor of the municipal transport committee in Aberdeen, my socialist shadow was the then Councillor Norman Hogg, the father of my hon. Friend the Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth. I am also, as the hon. Member for Streatham knows, chairman of the all-party friends of the Northern line group—friends of the Northern line not as it is, but as it should be, and as it will be next year.

Importantly, I travel by the Northern line and other routes on the London Underground. I can boast that I have asked more questions about London Underground than any colleague and made more speeches about it than any colleague—sometimes at anti-social hours.

Interestingly, early in his speech the Minister spoke about London Buses, which demonstrates some of the advantages of the Government's policy of using private management in transport. When London Buses started a franchise programme under which routes were put out to tender, there were substantial savings—I believe of more than 10 per cent.—in running costs, Spanish practices were eliminated and efficiency became the name of the game. When London Buses was sold to the private sector, one of the advantages to London Underground was that part of the capital received was reinvested in the underground to improve the quality of service.

Reference was made to the history of London Regional Transport, and to the fact that, between 1969 and 1984, it was the responsibility of the Greater London council. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, who is on the Treasury Bench, was a member of that august body. I remember that when he gave a speech in the constituency of Ealing, Acton, someone asked, "What have you learnt since you became a member of the Greater London council?" and my right hon. Friend answered, "I have learnt not to admit that I am a member of the Greater London council."

That is understandable if one considers the way in which the Greater London council handled London Underground. London Underground's worst years—the locust years—were the Livingstone years, when emphasis was placed on cheap fares, not capital investment to improve the quality of service.

Ms Glenda Jackson: The hon. Gentleman is talking about the Fares Fair period of London Underground's history, when passenger numbers increased by 16 per cent. and road accidents—there is always a benefit—decreased by 3,500.

Mr. Marshall: Although of course the number of passengers increased, the problem with the policy was that, simultaneously, capital investment in maintaining and improving the service was held down. The Greater London council should have invested in improving the service, not in lowering fares. It is remarkable that Opposition Members who talk about the level of past investment—

Mr. Keith Hill: The hon. Gentleman asserted that investment in London Underground declined during the years of the Fares Fair scheme. My recollection is that that scheme operated from between approximately 1980 and 1984. He should therefore be interested to learn that, in 1980, investment in London Underground was £78 million. In 1981, it rose to £91 million; it decreased to £82 million in 1982; it increased to £110 million in 1983; and it ended up at £147 million in 1984. That does not sound like a reduction in investment in London Underground, as a penalty for the Fares Fair experiment.

Mr. Marshall: I was trying to say—I thought it was obvious even to some Labour Members—that the GLC clearly had a choice about how to spend money, and it chose to spend it keeping fares down rather than investing in the future. It is illogical that Labour Members, who are the spiritual successors to that body, should come forward in this debate and complain about past investment in London Underground, particularly as public transport in London is being transformed.

We have discussed the Jubilee line extension. I was somewhat surprised to hear the hon. Member for Streatham complain about that massive improvement in public transport in London, which will benefit not only the economies of the areas in which the line will be extended, but passengers across the capital because it will take some passengers away from present routes.

There have been improvements to public transport in docklands. Earlier in the debate, we heard about the position at Heathrow, and the fact that the Paddington-Heathrow link will cut that journey time by about 12 minutes. That is a £300 million investment that has been provided substantially by the British Airports Authority.

The Northern line will be transformed. I am sure we can get cross-party agreement on the fact that, for years, it was the misery line in London. The misery line will be transformed into the most modern line in London. Many of the trains currently on that line date back to 1959. That year was a particularly good vintage in political terms, and let us hope that the trains that are coming in 1997 will have an equally good political vintage.

Some hon. Members may have noticed the announcement in the press this morning about "London trams to return in £160 million deal".

We have been discussing the role of the private sector in funding new developments in London, and it is significant to examine who is funding most of that scheme. It includes groups such as Bombardier Eurorail, Sir Robert McAlpine, Amec Construction, the Royal Bank of Scotland and Centrewest, a bus operator. Three quarters of the project is being funded not by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his Department but directly by private enterprise. Surely that demonstrates that the private sector is willing to come in and produce a better service for our constituents in London.

It is appropriate at this stage, although in his absence, to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris), who has been the first Minister for Transport in London. He has been a very effective Minister and there is a feeling of regret on both sides of the House that he will not be seeking re-election at the next general election. I think that people would give him the advice that was given to another politician: resign, retire, return. Many of us hope that he will return to grace our debates and to prove once again what an effective operator he is as a Minister of the Crown.

We have discussed the LU Northern line on many occasions in the House. I have explained that the trains are very old and that they are graffiti-ridden. There is so much graffiti on the trains that some of it is now two, three or even five years old. There is nothing more miserable than standing at a station at 7.10 in the morning and seeing a miserable, grey train coming in. We can only look forward to the day next year when we will see bright red and blue trains coming in that will lift our spirits.

Mr. Stephen: They will probably be covered in graffiti.

Mr. Marshall: They certainly will not be covered in grafiti, as my hon. Friend has said, because the new trains will be much more graffiti-resistant. It will be very much easier to get graffiti off in the future.

Graffiti is not the only problem with the LU Northern line. The dot-matrix system, which is called an information system, all too often is a misinformation system. Stations are tatty and they need improvement. That is why I welcome the Northern line's £1 billion regeneration, which is, of course, due solely to the PFI.

Ms Short: The proposal to have public-private partnerships to get more investment into transport was proposed by the Labour party long before the Conservative party moved to pick up that policy.

Mr. Marshall: It is very amusing to hear the Labour party claiming parentage of the PFI, because it seems that, whenever it is proposed, Labour Members criticise it. Those hon. Members who were in the Chamber yesterday for Health questions will remember what happened. Did the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) welcome the PFI? Of course she did not; she criticised it. There was even an interruption by the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), who was, no doubt, seeking to re-establish her socialist credentials. She was critical of the PFI. It sticks in the gullets of most Conservative Members to hear Labour Members come along and claim parentage of the PFI, when they have been completely scathing about every attempt to get private finance into improving the health service, education or transport. They cannot have it both ways.

Ms Short: I wonder if the hon. Gentleman has talked to anyone who has been involved in bidding under the PFI? If he does, he will find that many companies that have been involved in PFI bids are very critical about how it is structured at present.

Mr. Marshall: I know that BT, once it decided that the Labour party was a soft touch, thought that it would be rather fun to negotiate with the Labour party. Last October, it turned out that the Labour party was a soft touch and that it gave BT everything that it wanted.

People recognise that if one is bidding under the PFI, it is the Government's duty to get the best possible terms for the taxpayer, for the consumer and for the future of this country. It is quite wrong for politicians to stand up, as the hon. Lady has done, and say, "We will be a soft touch. We will let bidders get what they want." Surely that is not what government is about. The Minister should not be about signing the cheque that GEC wants. I am surprised at the hon. Lady saying that a Labour Government would give big business what it wants, and that this wicked Tory Government are being too tough on big companies.

Ms Short: Obviously the hon. Gentleman has not talked to people who have bid under the PFI. If the public sector asks the private sector to carry inappropriate risk, one problem is that the capital is attained at very great expense to the public purse. If we reorganise the PFI to distribute risk properly—properly hold the risk that belongs in the public sector with the public sector and get the private sector to take appropriate risk—we will get cheaper capital, which will be cheaper for the public sector.

Mr. Marshall: I am surprised at the hon. Lady. She has come to the House and, in effect, said, "The Labour party would like to be a soft touch. We would like to give GEC a little more of what it wants, and we would like to take more of the risk." She is obviously listening to the moans of poor GEC.

The idea is that poor Lord Weinstock is having to take more of the risk than he wants. Of course Lord Weinstock will be allocated more of the risk than he wants—after all, he wants the public sector to take all of it and GEC to take none. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms Short), despite her left-wing credentials—I think she used to write for Tribune—has now revealed that she will visit poor Lord Weinstock in the other place to say, "When I am Secretary of State for Transport I will have a cosy party with you and Lord Prior, you can tell us the amount of risk that you want the Labour party to take, and we will take it." I never thought that I would hear the hon. Lady say, "I am the friend of GEC. These wicked Tories are the friend of the taxpayer. They want GEC to take the risk, but I would like the taxpayer to take it." I am amazed that the hon. Lady has come forward as the friend of the capitalist rather than of the taxpayer. Long may we witness conversions from the left wing of the Labour party—it is a badge of honour to be worn by the hon. Lady. I have made my point even if it took two or three interventions from the hon. Lady to do so.

The hon. Member for Ladywood is right that GEC has taken on risks for the Northern line which are currently borne by the taxpayer. She will also be aware that the principle governing the scheme into which GEC has entered is, "No train, no pay." On those days when a train comes along with the slogan "Not in service", which happens quite frequently at the moment, GEC will not be paid. Under the PFI, there is therefore every incentive for GEC to ensure that trains turn up. That is why it is currently investing £23 million in upgrading the Morden and Golders Green depots. That programme will safeguard the jobs of my constituents. Just as important, however, it will guarantee that those who travel on the Northern line will be given a good-quality service, which will enjoy decent maintenance. As my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London said earlier this week, half the current delays on the Northern line are caused by faulty maintenance.

I was somewhat surprised by the comments of the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), who said that ABB had withdrawn from the negotiations for the Northern line tender. The hon. Member for Ladywood may not be aware that I have spoken to representatives of that company many times and they told me that they submitted a tender. The company certainly did not retreat from the negotiations in the manner suggested by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North.

The Northern line is being regenerated because of the PFI. I have frequently discussed that line in the House and invited Ministers to travel on it. I was rather surprised by the hon. Member for Streatham, who asked how often the Minister for Transport in London had seen the Northern line at work. My hon. Friend has travelled on that line with me on a number of occasions and seen for himself the practical problems created by it.

We know that the Northern line's modernisation would not have occurred without the PFI and I believe that there is even greater scope for its application to other parts of London Underground.

Only this week we have witnessed the schizophrenic attitude of the Opposition to the PFI. The right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) welcome it, as does the hon. Member for Ladywood, who now says that she will be kinder to those private companies than the Government. We are aware, however, that the unofficial leader of the Opposition, the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), the hon. Member for Halifax and other Opposition Members have criticised the PFI time after time.

I am also surprised at the attitude of some hon. Members to the modernisation of the Northern line. I welcome that as a Member representing a constituency served by the Northern line and as a passenger on it. That is why I was surprised by the comments on Monday from the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate, (Ms Jackson). Instead of welcoming the proposed improvements, she concentrated solely on the short-term difficulties caused by the brief closure of parts of the route later in the year. I am sure that everyone understands that when a railway system is modernised, it is sometimes necessary to close the track in order to improve its quality so that, in future, that track will not have to be closed and trains can run more effectively on it.

Such modernisation reveals why we should look to the future. In the next Parliament I hope that measures will be taken to transfer London Underground to the private sector. It is illogical for certain hon. Members to say in speech after speech that London Underground has received inadequate investment and then to say that it should not be transferred to the private sector. They suggest that public ownership has failed London Underground, but argue that that means that it must not be transferred to the private sector. I am appalled that those hon. Members advance such an illogical argument.

I believe that the privatisation of London Underground would improve the quality of service and the efficiency of operation and increase levels of investment. That is in the interests of London, Londoners, all those who work in our great capital city and the many millions of tourists who come here for enjoyment. I hope that that privatisation will take place. I apologise to hon. Members for the length of my speech, in part due to the fact that I gave way every time I was asked to do so.

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): May I add my congratulations to the Minister on his speech? We all enjoyed his bravura and generosity. It seems that, as the weeks go by, the shackles of office slip ever further from his shoulders. His free spirit fills the Chamber and adds a greater dimension to it. I for one am sad at the thought of him not being with us in the next Parliament.

The subject of the debate, the London Regional Transport Bill, seems to have been shunted into a side turning somewhere along the line in the past hour or so. At first sight, the Bill seems to be an innocent, almost pedestrian affair, as the Minister suggested. It has a mere six clauses, and is designed to tidy up the London Regional Transport Act 1984. It will allow LRT to do a number of sensible things to facilitate PFI projects connected with London Underground's power supplies; the introduction of smart card technology in the ticketing system; the exploitation of London Underground's fibre-optic cable network; and the extension of the east London lines. Those are sensible, sound ideas.

Within that simple, three-page Bill, however, lies a potentially powerful weapon about which many hon. Members have already expressed concern. It is rather like a snake in the grass—the smaller the creature, the more lethal its venom. The terms of clause 3 are so vague and so widely drawn that they give Ministers potentially all-embracing powers to direct London Underground to do whatever those Ministers may wish. The Minister gave us a firm undertaking that that was not the Bill's intention, but, as he knows, and is so aptly demonstrating, undertakings, like Ministers, have a habit of coming and going.

In that context, the House will recall that the Railways Bill made no mention of the privatisation of Railtrack. On the basis of that legislation, however, the Government have found the means to pursue what I believe to be their ill-founded plans to privatise Railtrack without any further reference to the House. It would be unacceptable for the Bill to pass through the House in a form that would enable Ministers to privatise London Underground through a statutory instrument. I shall return to that later.

I shall deal with what is purported to be the Bill's main thrust: facilitating the PFI for capital projects to enhance London's passenger transport system. There is a danger of the Government being seduced by the idea that the PFI can be used to fund any public project or service, while hiving off all risks and responsibilities to private contractors. The concept of the PFI must be one of partnership between the public and private sectors.

If the PFI is to be a success, the Government must heed the warnings of the private sector, the banking sector and experts in financial management and the management of large assets. They are not contractors trying to make an extra bob, but people with responsible views on how best to finance and run the country's major institutions and engines. They argue that they suffer high costs from the tendering process.

Every negotiation for a PFI contract is treated as a unique contract. There is a desperate need for the Government to find ways of standardising the PFI process by introducing standard specifications and conditions, making the system more efficient, transparent and easily followed, and allowing negotiations and contracting to be made easier.

There must be a sensible distribution of risk. We have to recognise that, with the extended contract periods of the PFI arrangements, which can be for 20 or 30 years, there must be increased uncertainty about the responsibilities and the risks associated with them. With major project contracts, it has always been the case that there should be a clause to deal with force majeure. Over a period as long as 20 or 30 years, is not a change of Government or policy a force majeure that no contractor can foresee or take account of when assessing the risk? We must recognise that, when question marks are put into such contracts, the price immediately increases. The price to the taxpayer increases, not the profit to the contractor.

The message from the people, firms and organisations engaged in PFI contracts is that we need, through Government, to build and retain expertise in how to operate the PFI system. There is a clear case for taking the PFI out of the hands of the Treasury, which is understandably, and rightly, primarily concerned with cost-cutting and expenditure control. That is its function. The PFI's main contribution should be to increase investment, not to decrease the public sector borrowing requirement.

The Government appear to believe that public and private partnerships are an ingenious way of removing their more onerous responsibilities, while continually trying to place the majority of the risk on the private sector. It is hardly surprising that the companies that have become involved in the PFI understandably expect a higher return on investment to cover the higher risks. The Treasury has little understanding of the ethos of the private sector. There is a clear case—I would welcome a comment from the Minister—for considering a separate agency to deal with the PFI and build experience, expertise and confidence with the private sector.

It is worth remembering that the PFI was launched to provide additionality to public expenditure. It was to provide the means to fund projects that the public sector had difficulty in funding. In practice, it is being used more and more as a substitute for public expenditure. A good example is the channel tunnel rail link, which shows how Governments can abdicate their responsibility to provide timely financial backing for projects that are essential to the public good.

The Government are so anxious to grasp the short-term advantage of the PFI that they are failing to recognise and support the genuine opportunities to develop public and private sector partnerships to invest in London's transport system. Hon. Members have drawn the House's attention to the London First initiative, and there was some debate about the benefits of its proposals. It is important to bear it in mind that that is an initiative from the people of London to provide and develop an imaginative transport programme to take us to the year 2010, by combining public and private funding to develop a partnership and proposals for a transport infrastructure fund.

There was much debate about the assumed unfairness of big business imposing on small business a requirement for what some regard as a tax and what others might call a contribution to improving London's transport system. It is important to remember that London First's initiative talks about the business community being asked to decide whether it would support such a scheme through a surcharge on the non-domestic rate. That means the whole business community, not only the chambers of commerce or the CBI. That is a democratic process—something that we should recognise and encourage.

London First has proposed another initiative that the House and the Government should examine as a worthy way of helping to fund London's transport. It has proposals for raising revenue through congestion charging, with revenue being directed solely to improving London's transport system. Before hon. Members get into a state and say, "This is more taxation, more burdens on the taxpayer," both surcharges—or additional contributions through the business rate—and congestion charging are not merely ideas but in place and working very well.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I am sorry that I will not be able to stay for the whole of the hon. Gentleman's speech. Will he reflect on what level of congestion charging would have achieved what the changed traffic arrangements in the City did, or would have left Oxford street as it is now, with private cars banned and pedestrians still able to walk faster than taxis or buses? Are they to be charged?

Mr. Chidgey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for taking me back 25 years to when I was involved in the pedestrianisation of Oxford street. The reaction from businesses and major hotels to the horrendous effect that stopping cars from driving by and parking outside their front doors would have on their businesses was amazing. A quarter of a century later, we have found that freeing major London streets from cars improves both business and the quality of life.

[Mr. Chidgey]

The level of charging for congestion or for using valuable road space in city centres has been established in cities throughout the world, from Singapore to Oslo. Throughout the western world, there are examples of how we could regulate access charges to valuable and much sought after road space in city centres.

Those ideas are not new; they are in place. They have been tried and tested and found to work. As usual, we hide and cringe from any innovation and let the Treasury damp down any enthusiasm by claiming that any such expenditure or fund raising would count as part of the PSBR.

To return to the PFI, which is the skeleton of the Bill, the PFI's main contribution should be to increase investment, not to decrease the PSBR. We must generate public and private partnerships that are mutually beneficial. I put it to the Minister that the Government should try to use the PFI as a source of front-end expenditure. The Government should try to lever in private capital, at the same time recognising that they should assume many of the risks that are primarily their responsibility. Long-term investment in transport and other essential services is too important to be left to the vagaries of the electoral cycle. The PFI offers an opportunity to escape from short-termism, and, through its devolution, to afford people more control over the development of their communities.

The Bill offers an opportunity to address London's key transport issues. By definition, London is the hub of much of Britain's transport system. London's transport policy is a concern not just for Londoners, but for those who live in the south-east of England and across the United Kingdom. The powers in the Bill could be used to pursue the essential aims not only of transport in London but of the transport system as a whole. The essential aims of London transport should be to improve the transport services, to maximise co-ordination and integration of existing services, and to improve accessibility to transport services for all those who live or work in London or who travel through the city.

We must ensure that there are safe, affordable and efficient links within and between all London's communities and transport terminals. We must protect London's environment and avoid the imposition of further environmental burdens on the south-east. Improvements in London transport will contribute to securing a more dynamic, efficient and sustainable economy.

I believe that the most effective means of implementing an integrated transport policy for London—such as I am outlining—would be through the establishment of a strategic transport authority for London. It would have the power to co-ordinate transport needs, encourage and support integration of services across the region, and provide Londoners with an effective voice on transport and land-use planning. Does the Minister recognise those key aims and objectives for London's transport? What role does he envisage for London Regional Transport in achieving those aims and objectives, with the benefit of the powers that it will acquire under the Bill?

In addressing the future of London's underground and rail networks, it is clear that a key aim must be the development of a co-ordinated and integrated system. We should not see piecemeal development that is dictated by the drive to maximise profits for a particular operator in a particular area: rail and underground services must operate and be available to passengers as a complete network. Investment must be available in order to raise standards across the network and improve the reliability and frequency of services. Passengers' interests must be the prime consideration, and the underground, bus and rail networks must be marketed as a total service underpinned by the travelcard system.

There is much evidence of the dismal failure to meet those aims and objectives. The Minister recognises that neglect of investment in the London underground system has led to the closure of the Bakerloo line and Northern line tunnels. He claimed that that was inevitable because of the passage of time. However, I believe that postponing investment in maintenance has magnified the scale of the necessary repair works, with traumatic consequences for millions of people who travel, live and work in London.

I do not blame the Minister for that situation, and I thank him for his earlier comments in recognising my fellowship of the Institution of Civil Engineers. I congratulate him in return on being awarded a companionship of that institution.

Ms Glenda Jackson: Congratulations.

Mr. Chidgey: It is indeed a high and exclusive honour—unlike so many honours that Conservative Members attain for their services to this place. I am sure that the Minister will take pride in that award for many years to come—whatever other honours may come his way as a result of his ministerial position.

As a companion of the Institution of Civil Engineers, the Minister will move in different circles, and meet the great men of engineering who visualise and plan major projects. Through talking to them, he must know that there were other ways of dealing with the problems presented by the Bakerloo and Northern lines, rather than forcing their closure for 18 months in the capital city. I do not expect the Minister to respond to that point now, but he may do so in a few months, following further conversations with my friends and colleagues.

The postponement of the Thameslink project to 2006, and the fact that there is no clear commitment to crossrail—the interchange for Thameslink and crossrail has not been constructed at Farringdon—are examples of the failure to plan and introduce proper transport infrastructure for London. The Minister may not be aware that the inability to reach a decision and the delays on that project are jeopardising the key project design and planning team, which is threatened with redundancy. That would be a tremendous loss to the impetus and progress of the scheme, as the team's skills are not easily replaced. They must be retained, and the project must be seen to go forward.

Will the Bill promote and strengthen an integrated, co-ordinated public transport system for London, or will it result in a fragmented free-for-all? Will the powers granted under the Bill enable Ministers to pave the way for the privatisation of London Underground? The Minister said earlier that that was not his intention, and I accept his word, but time moves on. Does the Bill provide an opportunity for privatising London Underground and fragmenting what must be an essentially integrated transport system?

It is interesting to hear Conservative Members' comments about privatisation, but privatising London Underground piecemeal would clearly prejudice passengers' ability to transfer between the various lines at some 50 interchange stations in the network. The concept of passengers being unable to move between lines to complete their journeys is incomprehensible. Journeys across London would be made immeasurably more difficult, and the essential unified management of the station interchanges would be destroyed. Such unity is essential in order to maintain public safety in the event of an accident, such as the King's Cross tragedy.

I believe that the Bill must be redrafted to contain the clear and unequivocal statement that it will give Ministers no powers to privatise London Underground. Any such powers must be the subject of fresh, primary legislation—which the Liberal Democrats would oppose vigorously should it ever come before the House.

7.18 pm

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I am grateful to be called to speak in this important debate. I feel as though I have joined a secret society comprising those hon. Members who are fascinated by the London underground and who spend their evenings in the House—rather than in other areas of the Palace or in their constituencies in Scotland or in Leicestershire in my case—discussing this interesting subject.

I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London for introducing the Bill. It is largely—if not wholly—an uncontroversial measure, which I suspect could have been disposed of in short order. However, I understand hon. Members' enthusiasm in wishing to contribute to the deliberations this evening.

The Bill is uncontroversial partly because few Labour Members represent London constituencies—as do few Conservative Members, although my hon. Friend the Minister is a wonderful exception to that rule.

The discussions that the Minister and I have had about transport matters have related predominantly to the Market Harborough bypass scheme. I was extremely grateful to him for coming—no doubt via St. Pancras, which is on the underground system—to look at the consequences of the bypass scheme and to see the traffic-calming measures that have exercised residents of that wonderful town for a few years. The point I wish to draw out of the Minister's journey from St. Pancras to Market Harborough is the fact that beside the present St. Pancras main line and tube station will be the cross-channel transport link, which is a classic example of the private finance initiative—provision for which is contained in the Bill.

The clauses of the Bill are designed to allow the PFI to be introduced into the workings, management and capital structure of the London underground system. In my view, the biggest project will be at St. Pancras—the underground station will no doubt be integrated with the overground station as a consequence of the Bill and the PFI.

I draw hon. Members' attention to the statement that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport made on 29 February, in which he announced this project—which I believe to be the largest construction project in London for some time, if not ever. He stated:

"The main CTRL"—

I cannot remember what that stands for.

Mr. Norris: It stands for channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Garnier: I thank the Minister. He continued:

"terminus at St. Pancras will provide an excellent interchange for services to the midlands and the north along the midland main line and the east coast main line, and also with the Thameslink 2000 project which I announced on Tuesday. The new St. Pancras terminus will, of course, respect the architectural integrity of that magnificent building."

That is a point for the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson)—I hope that his book contains a picture of the wonderful structure of St. Pancras station. It is one of the architectural gems of London. It sits above the underground station at St. Pancras.

Mr. Wilson: I agree about the architectural merits of St. Pancras. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that, as the public purse has paid for every penny of the refurbishment of St. Pancras station, it should not now be given away to a private consortium without any financial consideration?

Mr. Garnier: The public should enjoy it—and they will. The travelling public will be able to use the facilities in that building and in the new building, which will be of great benefit to them. It is King's Cross and St. Pancras—it is the same place. The hon. Gentleman is perfectly right. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State continued:

"The Government will transfer certain assets to the promoter: European Passenger Services, free of capital debt; Union Railways, the Government-owned company which has developed the project thus far and supported us in promoting the hybrid Bill; and, lastly, the land and property needed for the project, in particular the railway lands at Kings Cross and Stratford, and surplus properties acquired in connection with previous rail link schemes.

The Government will also provide financial support with a present value of around £1.4 billion, compared with the overall construction cost of about £3 billion. That is an excellent investment for the nation"—

I agree with him—

"since we estimate the benefits of the project to be worth around £6 billion".—[Official Report, 29 February 1996; Vol. 272, c. 1000.]

That money will be spent in London, and will be indirectly, if not directly, spent on the underground system—in which the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North apparently has such a great interest.

Mr. Wilson: The problem for the Tories is that they do not know which faction to be part of at any given time. The hon. and learned Gentleman is taking the view that it is an excellent public investment—excellent value for the public purse—to put £1.4 billion of public money, plus a couple of billion pounds of assets, plus a £1.5 billion debt write-off, into this. Does that not put him at odds with Lord Parkinson, who, in 1989, vetoed the scheme on the ground that not one penny of public money should go into any of it?

Mr. Garnier: I am not as old as the hon. Gentleman and I cannot remember Lord Parkinson or anything that he may have said in the House. The hon. Gentleman gave a characteristically bravura performance—I always enjoy his contributions to the House. On another evening, much later than this, he spent about 45 minutes prolonging a debate on vehicle excise by giving us a Wilson's tour of the highlands and islands, which was fascinating.

[Mr. Garnier]

This evening, he has confined himself to half an hour and, at times, he managed to bring himself back to the terms of the Bill.

The Bill does not allow the so-called reasoned amendment that the Opposition has put down on the Order paper, which reads as follows:

"That this House declines to give a Second Reading to the London Regional Transport Bill because although the House welcomes the higher levels of investment in transport infrastructure provided in the Bill by the development of Private Finance Initiative projects by London Regional Transport, it does not believe that the privatisation of London Underground would be in the interests of London, and fears that this Bill contains powers which will be used to that end".

I have looked at the Bill to see whether that fear is justified. I shall refer to the explanatory and financial memorandum on the face of the Bill.

Hon. Members may be interested to know that the notes on clauses provided by the Department, the House of Commons Library brief and—if I can give away a top secret—the central office brief seem to say more or less the same thing: this is an uncontroversial Bill. There is not one shred of evidence to justify the Labour party's fears that this is a back-door privatising measure.

The second paragraph of the explanatory and financial memorandum states:

"The Bill empowers LRT to enter into agreements with contractors for the carrying on by the contractors of any activity which LRT does not have the power to carry on".

I shall compare that with the national health service: it cannot build hospitals, it does not always do the laundry, and it does not always provide the food—it buys those services from private companies. That is not privatisation: it is a sensible use of public money to enable public corporations—such as the national health service or London Regional Transport—to get the best of what is available in the private sector.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that according to the Evening Standard of 5 March, Jimmy Knapp, the leader of the Rail, Maritime and Transport Union, called the Bill privatisation by the back door? Does my hon. and learned Friend think that Mr. Knapp may have drafted the Labour party's amendment?

Mr. Garnier: I gather that, under new Labour, all the doors have been relabelled—so we cannot be sure whether Mr. Knapp knows what a back door is. I was seeking to disprove the soundness of the case put forward by the Labour party's amendment. The explanatory and financial memorandum continues:

"Clause 1 empowers LRT, subject to the Secretary of State's consent, to enter into certain agreements with contractors for the carrying on by the contractors of activities which LRT does not have the power to carry on.

Clause 2 makes provision, subject to the Secretary of State's consent, for LRT to acquire land".

I refer again to the national health service which, through trust boards and health authorities, can acquire land. That is not deemed to be privatisation by the back door, front door or through the roof.

The memorandum continues:

"Clause 3 enables the Secretary of State, by order, to provide that certain of LRT's statutory functions are exercisable by another person".

A whole host of nationally important functions are carried out on behalf of the Government or on behalf of public bodies by individuals who are not part of the Government machine or who are not direct employees of public bodies. There is no diminution in the quality of the oversight or of the service provided by those individuals.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): Would the hon. and learned Gentleman be happy if the train drivers did not work for London Transport? Would that be acceptable?

Mr. Garnier: What is important is that the driver of the train is qualified to do so. I ask the hon. Gentleman: would he be happy if a fully qualified brain surgeon performed an operation on his head, but happened not to be employed by the national health service? Of course he would. He would be interested in whether that specialist had the necessary skills and qualifications to perform the operation.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South): The hon. Gentleman does not need one.

Mr. Garnier: It is not for me to enter into personal banter with my hon. Friend, or to make comments about what is inside the head of the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew).

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wimbledon (Dr. Goodson-Wickes) is precluded from speaking in the debate, because he is the parliamentary private secretary to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, I want to pay tribute to him for the work that he has done on behalf of his constituents to ensure that the Government and London Transport are kept fully up to the mark with regard to the southern end of the Northern line, about which a great deal has been said this evening. He has pressed vehemently for improvements in rolling stock, particularly new arrangements through the PFI, which was discussed earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) and which has provided huge improvements to what used to be called the misery line, but which I understand can no longer be so called.

My hon. Friend the Minister and many other hon. Members this evening have described this wholly uncontroversial Bill as a technical measure. It removes legal obstacles which would otherwise prevent LT from getting on with what it should be getting on with. This is part of a range of initiatives that the Government and the Department have entered into during the past year or so in order to introduce private finance into these huge and most important publicly needed projects.

Listening to the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), I found it extremely difficult to decide whether he intended to vote for or against the motion, to abstain, or perhaps to go for a combination of all three. No doubt we shall discover later this evening.

I hope that, by the end of the evening, when members of the official Opposition have reached a conclusion and no doubt drawn into the Chamber to listen to their arguments all the other London Labour Members of Parliament who wish to hear the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North, they will have had a change of heart, having realised that their amendment is meaningless and contains the seeds of its own destruction; and that they will either go quietly away and abstain, or will enthusiastically join the Government in voting for the Second Reading.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): The hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier), at the behest of the Secretary of State for Transport, began his contribution to this evening's debate by referring to the channel tunnel rail link. The Secretary of State pointed out to him the relevant passages in Hansard when the Secretary of State made his announcement to the House. I am presupposing that, as the hon. and learned Gentleman had to have the initials CTRL translated for him.

Mr. Garnier: I am not a professional actor so I am not as good at learning my lines as other hon. Members may be. I should inform the hon. Lady that the Secretary of State did not put me up to speak about the channel tunnel—whatever it is called. What I did was, because I am a Leicestershire Member whose constituents use St. Pancras station, ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the details and the reference in Hansard since I knew that he had spoken about it on the occasion that I mentioned. I appreciate that there must be a degree of to-ing and fro-ing in a debate such as this, but I would not like the hon. Lady to advance her case on a false premise.

Ms Jackson: I am grateful for what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said, but clearly the Secretary of State is desperate to make his case since he left the Front Bench and went to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough. If the hon. and learned Gentleman was asking for information, I should have thought that it would have been more courteous for him to have gone to the Secretary of State.

However, that was the opening of the hon. and learned Gentleman's contribution. He referred more than once to St. Pancras station and to what has been handed over to the designated operator by the Government, which has been estimated to be £5.7 billion of the nation's assets in cash and kind and, if memory serves, he believed that that was a good exchange for the country.

Writing in The Guardian on Monday 4 March, Victor Keegan, in his economics notebook, the headline of which was, "Public taken for a ride on railways", said:

"Don't be deceived by claims that the fast rail link is a triumph for the Government's private sector finance initiative. As the Financial Times pointed out on Saturday, this scheme may even be costing the Exchequer more than the British Rail option which bit the dust in 1989", and would in fact have cost just £1.4 billion as opposed to the £5.7 billion the CTRL is now costing us. He goes on to say:

"There is no chance of the private sector extending the link to the north unless the Government, as usual, underwrites the whole risk while leaving the profits for someone else."

That is what is at the heart of the Opposition's concern about the Bill.

In common with, I believe, every other hon. Member who has spoken in the Chamber this afternoon, I congratulate the Minister for Transport in London on a sparkling and entertaining speech. We have come to expect the Minister to be invariably entertaining, but he excelled even his high standard this afternoon. He spoke for more than an hour and he was generous in allowing interventions. The fact that 99.9 per cent. of the time he managed to deflect attention away from the Bill is a great compliment to his abilities. In common with other hon. Members, I think that it is sad that the House will lose his presence if he is true to his word and does not stand again at the next election.

The hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) claimed to have spoken more often, asked more questions and made more speeches regarding the Northern line than any other hon. Member. It must be a bitter agony to him that after all those questions and speeches and after all that time, he managed to bring about absolutely no improvements on what has become known as the misery line without the aid of the all-party Northern line group which, by excessive pressure, managed to get the Government to move from what seemed an intransigent position to consider the proposals that at that time were being presented by ABB on the leasing of new rolling stock for the Northern line.

Here again, I must pay tribute to the Minister, who assisted the all-party Northern line group in bringing pressure to bear upon the Treasury and assisted in at least getting new rolling stock on one of the oldest sections of the oldest underground system in the world.

The hon. Member for Hendon, South was somewhat excessive when he suggested that the leasing of new rolling stock is somehow transforming the misery line into some modern, efficient and consistently reliable line. That is not what I and my constituents know it to be. We will indeed have new rolling stock, but that is about all that will be new. There will still be the agony of waiting to see if the trains will arrive because the track and signalling have yet to be modernised. All that is in the future. The plans that the Government have presented to us this afternoon via the Bill do not lead me to believe that we will be seeing those improvements in the near future.

One of the most charming aspects of the Minister's speech this afternoon was the way in which he presented London underground as being already almost perfect. His description bore no relation whatever to the London underground that I know and which anyone who has occasion to use it regularly will know to be the system for this, our great capital city.

We could undoubtedly argue all night and probably all day tomorrow about the root cause for London's underground system becoming, according, I believe, to the Evening Standard, the worst underground system in the world. Opposition Members have made strong representations that the basic root cause has been the failure to invest adequately in it during the past 16 years. A briefing put out by the Capital Transport Campaign in November 1995 speaks of broken promises and says:

"In 1991 the Government commissioned an investigation into London Underground by the Monopolies and Mergers"Commission—

This blamed "chronic underinvestment" for deficiencies in the levels of service—this was five years ago—

"and recommended that investment rise to around £700-750 million a year.

In response, Malcolm Rifkind (then Transport Secretary)"— he is now Foreign Secretary—

[Ms Jackson]

"said the Government was 'committed to providing the resources for both improving the existing underground and expanding the system'. He promised that investment in the existing railway would be over £700 million by 1993/94. Last year it was just £528 million.

In 1991—just before the general election—the Government also promised £2.1 billion over three years for the existing underground. In the Autumn Statement the following year it was slashed by £700 million. Last year the Chancellor cut the three-year figure back to just £1.2 billion."

The system has had reduced budgets and many broken promises from the Government on the investment that is desperately needed to make the London underground "a moderately modern metro", to quote the managing director of London Underground.

The infrastructure is in serious trouble. For example, London Underground has to remove more than 3 million gallons of water from the system every day. The pumps and the drainage systems were designed in the Victorian era. The problem of flooding was identified in an internal London Underground report in 1993, which stated that emergency investment in drainage systems—at a cost of £18 million—was required simply to keep the network operational. In the event, only £9 million was made available and current investment in the drainage system is running at £5 million a year.

I find it hard to believe—although I would be delighted to be proved wrong—that the Government's private finance initiative, as it is at the moment structured, would attract that level of investment to London's underground system. I regret to say that I have forgotten which of my colleagues made the point—it may have been my hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill)—but the drainage system is one of those hidden problems into which the private sector is always somewhat slow to put its money. The private sector tends to like to have its contribution publicly emblazoned and visible. Something as basic as modern pumping and drainage systems would be unlikely to attract the private part of the private finance initiative, given—as my hon. Friends have pointed out—that the system as devised at the moment by the Government is both cumbersome and expensive for those businesses which would be interested in entering a public and private partnership—we consider that the best way forward—to invest in the vital and necessary infrastructure of our capital city and the rest of the country.

The lack of investment has led to speed restrictions being imposed on a number of routes and, unless the problem is tackled in the next three years, whole sections of line face closure. We have already had advance warning from London Underground of major closures this year on four lines—the longest and, it could be argued, the most serious being the Bakerloo line, which is expected to be closed for between six and seven months. There are also speed restrictions on the East London line, between Surrey Quays and Wapping; on the Central line, between Stratford and the west end; on the Northern line, between Leicester Square and Moorgate—although it seems on some days that there are speed restrictions to the point at which no trains are running at all on the Northern line; and on the Piccadilly line, between Piccadilly and King's Cross. That is not the only area on the London Underground system that is in desperate need of major investment.

If we look at the supporting structures of the underground, we find that at Sloane Square station last year a supporting girder cracked and the platform had to be closed. There was no risk to passengers or staff on that occasion, but that girder was fitted in 1868. The problem of aging support structures is compounded by the age of the network. We have the oldest underground system in the world. The East London line was built in 1869, the Metropolitan line in 1863, and the Circle and Hammersmith lines in 1863.

The track on the network is now so old that the number of speed restrictions on the network has doubled over the past two years. London Transport has videos showing the track physically bending as trains run over it. I would hate Conservative Members to accuse me of scaremongering. It is not my intention to suggest that the bending of the track is necessarily a danger to the millions of people who use the underground system every day, but it significantly lengthens journey times and increases the deterioration of the track and the rolling stock. Renewal expenditure alone in 1994-95 was £56 million, but even that level of investment is insufficient to tackle the problem.

Most of the embankments—not an invisible part of the network—on which the track is built were built and designed in the Victorian era. The Victorian building techniques involved piling up mounds of earth that were then overlaid with the rail line. As a result, large sections of the network face problems of subsidence and land slippage. London Transport is engaged in a costly programme of reinforcing the embankments with steel girders to deal with that problem.

I return to the subject of that well-known misery line, the Northern line. Signalling on parts of the Northern line is pre-war. The cost of replacing the signalling on just a small section of the network will be £22 million.

That is enough of the depressing list, which I could lengthen with no great difficulty, to show that there is, and has been for a considerable time, a total lack of the necessary investment in what surely should be the central and supporting arm of London's transport system.

We have heard contributions from hon. Members on both sides of the House, and I regret that I do not know their constituencies in some cases. We heard about the enormous benefits that have been produced for the travelling public by the introduction by the Government of passenger and citizens charters. I know, from talking to my constituents, that charters have increased complaints and smoothed the line between the consumer and the provider of the service so that it is easier to make complaints, but they have not improved services.

Much was made during our debate on fares on the London underground that fare revenues could be used as part of London Transport's central investment structure, but we know that some fares have risen in real terms by 70 per cent. in the past 10 years. For many people, who have no other means of transport to and from home and work other than the underground, the increase in fares can be an increasing burden, especially as the Government have been assiduous in the past few years in ensuring that wage rises have been kept very low.

The point was made that there is already a way of stopping trains on the underground because a driver can close together two wires that run along the tube train tunnels. That is fine, but I have read about the possibility of totally unmanned underground trains without even a driver—although I cannot imagine that they are going to be any part of the Government's plans in the future. There is enough technological expertise around at the moment to allow trains to run without any staff on board at all. I would not want to travel on such trains, and in any case I cannot see it happening in the foreseeable future.

The last clause of the Bill has to do with reductions in staffing. That causes me some concern. One of the first ways of cutting costs in previous privatisations has always been to reduce staff numbers. I know that the Minister has said that there would be no overall reduction in staff numbers; staff employed by London Underground will simply move, he says, to the private business that is due to enter the two schemes to which he referred. I find that unsatisfactory. Whenever private businesses have taken over from public sector entities, in whole or in part, there have been staffing reductions, wage reductions and usually an extension of the hours that staff are used to working.

I am most concerned about the gradual erosion of LU manning levels and its impact on the safety of the travelling public—especially women. Perhaps the popular press like to dig up stories on this subject, but lately there seem to have been too many reports of attacks on women travelling on their own late at night on certain parts of the underground system.

I approach this issue with no small trepidation. Belsize Park station is one of the stations on my line. I had occasion to raise this matter with the managing director about a year ago. The station contains many long, empty and usually badly lit tunnels. There are no staff on duty late at night. People have to catch a lift which rides down a very long way—the line is deeply sunk in that part of north London—often to alight on a platform that is deserted. There are no staff in sight; there is no means of summoning anyone should an incident occur.

Environmental reasons are certainly paramount when it comes to attracting more people to the underground system—presupposing that London Underground can run a system that meets Londoners' genuine needs. That being so, however, we need to guarantee that everyone travelling on the underground is safe.

Mr. Norris: I acknowledge that the hon. Lady has been stalwart in defending the interests of women passengers, and she raises a serious point about their safety. I know that she will want to reinforce the fact that although there have been worrying incidents on the system, the underground's safety record has measurably improved over the past five years because of steps that London Transport has taken and paid for to make the system safer. LRT recognises that unless people feel safe on the system they will not use it. I know that the hon. Lady would not want to create the impression that passengers on the system are unsafe. Statistically they are safer on the system than in the streets up top.

Ms Jackson: I accept that, but I hope that the Minister will agree that I was describing one type of transport on the network at one particular time—night. Statistical improvements, moreover, mean nothing to a woman who may be raped when attempting to travel on the underground. Statistics meant nothing to one of my constituents whose son was killed in an accident on the underground.

Mr. Norris indicated assent.

Ms Jackson: The Minister knows who I am talking about. She will be convinced to her dying day that her son's life could have been saved if there had been a member of staff standing on the platform, or if there had been any means of halting the train or summoning help.

There is still room for a great deal of improvement. The most immediately recognisable and reassuring form of improvement would be an increase in staffing at certain hours on the underground.

Despite its pronouncements, London Underground has not done enough yet to make its services accessible to people with disabilities. I can understand the difficulties, but there is a need for major investment, and the Government's private finance initiative will not produce the investment necessary to modernise the system or make it accessible to all Londoners wanting to travel on it.

The PFI, as devised and structured by the Government, is the Government's way of opening the back door to privatising a service which I believe must remain in the public sector. The Opposition believe that the only way to provide the right amount of investment for this system and all our public transport systems is via a genuine public-private partnership. The Government's PFI is not the way forward.

We strongly urge Conservative Members to look at our reasoned amendment with open minds. We all agree that London needs a modern, integrated public transport system, not just for the benefit of the people who live here but for the millions of tourists who come to this great capital city of ours. We need such a system for the economic prosperity and for the well-being of this great city. If we do not sort out our transport problems, companies looking to invest here may go elsewhere. The City might conceivably lose its primacy as well. Information technology and the Internet make it quite possible for financiers, bankers and people who make money by moving it around to relocate their businesses in one of Europe's other capital cities. So a decent transport system for the capital is a vital economic and national necessity.

The arguments expressed in this debate have made it abundantly clear that the Government have not chosen the right way to proceed. I hope that Conservative Members will seriously look at our amendment and consider voting with us, thereby putting the interests of their constituents before those of the party Whips. I hope that they will join us in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. David Congdon (Croydon, North-East): I have listened carefully to the debate. I tried to understand exactly the arguments that the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) was advancing, but I am not sure that I am any the wiser in determining exactly where she and her right hon. and hon. Friends stand. The hon. Lady talked about a partnership between the public and private sectors. It was to be noted, however, that whenever the private sector was mentioned, the reference was disparaging. In those circumstances, I am not sure why the private sector would wish to invest.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister. Unfortunately, I was unable to listen to the whole of his speech. I heard, however, a tour de force on London's transport system. My only disappointment arose out of my hope that he would give us a potted history of each and every station on the network. I am sure that, on another occasion, before he leaves the House, he will do so. I am sure that such a presentation would be fascinating. It would enhance his contribution, which has already been excellent, to transport in our great capital.

Mr. Tim Smith: I am sure that the speech of my hon. Friend the Minister was a tour de force. Would not it have been a tour d'horizon if he had covered all the underground stations?

Mr. Congdon: That is true. I welcome my hon. Friend's comment.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate commented on problems that stem from a lack of investment in London Underground. Since the early 1990s, however, investment has increased significantly. When I listen to debates about the underground system and talk of a lack of investment, it seems to be suggested that problems have arisen only since 1979. I remind the hon. Lady that the Conservative party was in power for only four of the 15 years from 1964 to 1979. What were the levels of investment in the underground service during the dark years of Labour government? During those years there was little money in the kitty for anything and the then Chancellor of the Exchequer had to go running to the International Monetary Fund, begging bowl in hand.

That has been the pattern of investment in the London underground system. When the economic climate has become difficult, money has not been forthcoming. That is why the private finance initiative is so important, especially to a service that is as capital intensive as London Underground.

As a London Member, I am only too well aware of the importance of the underground system to Londoners; as a Member from a Croydon constituency, I am aware of how regrettable it is—I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will take due note of this—that the system never managed to penetrate beyond Crystal palace towards Croydon. Indeed, it never reached Crystal palace. Some say that that was because of geological reasons. I am not so sure.

I want to illustrate the importance of the underground system to Londoners. There being no underground stations in my constituency, I recognise how crucial the system is to the transport system as a whole in our great capital.

In transport debates, there is always an argument about whether people should use their cars and whether there should be a congestion tax. That is what we heard from the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey). It leads to a sterile debate about either public transport or the private car. There is a lack of understanding of the crucial role of each in a city such as London.

In the Croydon area, the car is crucial in getting to the city centre. The train is vital in travelling from Croydon into central London. The tube is vital in getting about central London. I have always believed that different transport systems have different roles to play. The crucial role of public transport is to get a large number of passengers from A to B, but such a system will never be able to satisfy the myriad peculiar journeys that many people make, especially outside peak travelling hours. The sooner some Opposition Members recognise the key role of the car, the better. They should then put public transport in its proper context.

In London, and especially in south London, my colleagues have not been arguing for more investment in the road network. Instead, they have been arguing for investment in the rail network, including the underground system. As London Members, we recognise the need to ensure that we have a first-class underground system that is able to meet Londoners' needs.

I am never too clear whether too much priority is given to grandiose projects at the expense of some basic infrastructure when it comes to investment in the underground system. The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate mentioned important, but unglamorous, issues such as signalling and track maintenance. London Transport needs to get the investment balance absolutely right between large projects, such as the Jubilee line extension or other major investments and extensions, and bread-and-butter improvements to the basic infrastructure.

I draw my hon. Friend the Minister's attention to the situation at Victoria station. It is a crucial station on the network used by Croydon residents. There are excellent rail links from East Croydon station to Victoria, but standing on the Victoria line platform during the morning rush hour is a pretty hazardous experience. There are difficulties if one tube train does not come in immediately after the other.

I understand that the main impediment to achieving a fast throughput of tube trains is the lack of very modern signalling that can introduce built-in intelligence into the system. More antiquated signalling systems tend, unfortunately, to be the norm on the network. It is surely important to be able to maximise the benefits of the massive investment in tunnels by ensuring that sufficient tube trains pass through the system, especially at peak times, so that any dangers to passengers may be avoided.

My plea is to ensure that the balance is right between grandiose projects and bread-and-butter projects. I understand, of course, London Transport management's pressing for big schemes, but more minor projects may be neglected.

I argue—this might be controversial, but I make no apology for that—that ensuring that track is absolutely right and that the signalling system is the most modern available should take precedence over modernising tube stations. I accept that it is important to have modernised stations, but I do not believe that that is as fundamental as having the most up-to-date signalling system and ensuring that track is improved.

There has been significant investment in the underground system. I have mentioned the Jubilee line extension. The PFI involving Northern line trains is another example. In a sense, it becomes false to distinguish funding between London Underground and British Rail. I welcome the recent massive commitments to London in the forms of Thameslink 2000 and the channel tunnel rail link. Those projects demonstrate that the Government are serious about directing large sums into public transport, which is vital to the life-blood of our great capital.

Given the history of capital investment being turned on and off like a tap depending on the state of the economy, surely Opposition Members should welcome the PFI with open arms. It provides an opportunity to secure a continuing high level of investment in a vital infrastructure. In a sense, of course, the Bill is a tidying-up measure to remove one or two anomalies in London Transport's powers. I am surprised, however, that it has not been welcomed by Opposition Members.

As I have said, I listened with care to the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate. It seems that the Opposition are concerned that the Bill might lead to the privatisation of London Underground. I have no problems with that. I do not care who runs the system as long as it is run well and provides a first-class service for Londoners. As I understand it, however, the Bill is not about privatisation. We may be able to return to that issue on another occasion because it is certainly worth considering.

I was intrigued by some of the proposals that are in train—pardon the pun—for London Underground. I was especially interested in the discussion about using cables alongside the network. The hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) talked about using cables for various activities. Putting fibre-optic cable alongside the underground track is an excellent suggestion. Surely that would be far better than digging up the road to lay the cables that the Labour party seems to consider so important to our infrastructure. If the Bill provides the possibility for such developments, it should be supported.

The most important aspect of the Bill, however, is its encouragement of the private finance initiative. I hope that many more projects will be possible, providing Londoners with a much improved public transport infrastructure. As I have said, Londoners depend on the existence of a first-class public transport system. We do not want more and more people to drive into the centre of town in the morning rush hour unless that is essential—and the quid pro quo, unless we resort to draconian measures, is sustained investment in the public transport infrastructure.

Unlike the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate, I do not think that the real terms increases in fares that have taken place constitute the most serious disincentive; I think that the main disincentive is delay.

Ms Glenda Jackson: May I point out that millions of Londoners have no means of travel other than public transport, which, in many instances, means the underground? For them, fares are of major significance. For example, 56 per cent. of those who live in Camden have no access to any form of private transport. The fact that the hon. Gentleman's party has kept wages down and allowed fares to rise has caused real difficulties for many of my constituents.

Mr. Congdon: With respect, I consider that argument nonsensical. If fares are kept artificially low, the net result is that Londoners—and others, but when the Greater London council was in control it was Londoners via their rates—end up subsidising wealthy tourists to use the underground. That is absurd. There is another net result that is equally significant. The Minister mentioned it earlier. If fares are kept low, London Transport cannot generate surplus revenue to reinvest in the capital infrastructure of the network.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): My hon. Friend has made a valuable point. Does he agree that considerable concessions are already available to those in need—pensioners and students, for example, who have their own travelcards? Most of those who pay for tickets at the normal rate are in work.

Mr. Congdon: My hon. Friend has made a good point. Such schemes are very helpful.

I do not accept that, when people are deciding whether to travel by road or rail—or by bicycle, perhaps—their choice is determined primarily by price, especially in the rush hour. I believe that it is determined primarily by the nature of their journey. For those who live near an underground or overground railway station that method of travel is very convenient, but it is inconvenient for those who live some way from a station and whose place of work is some way from the station at the other end. I believe that the key factor is convenience in relation to people's travelling patterns—and, as I have said, the incidence of delays is crucial.

A far better way of encouraging more people to use the network with the minimum of inconvenience is to invest in maintaining it to a high standard, ensuring that the signalling works properly and that the track does not cause problems. There would then be no excuse for delays. I mentioned Victoria underground station. The one problem with using that station is that it is not very pleasant to stand on the platform in a crush because there has been a delay as short as two or three minutes. We need investment in signalling, to ensure the maximum number of trains at peak times. I hope that investment via the PFI, over a certain period, will yield the improvements that we all want.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): If, as the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) suggested, users of the London underground were heavily subsidised, would that not be a monstrous injustice to residents of south and south-west London, where underground lines are extremely sparse because the railway network is the old British Rail southern region and, before that, Southern Railways? Nevertheless, people there have to pay their taxes and local taxes to subsidise the inhabitants of the hon. Lady's constituency. Is that not unjust? Surely we should have nothing to do with it.

Mr. Congdon: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. At the time of the GLC's Fares Fair policy I, as a Croydon resident, did not like having to subsidise other people's fares, and I am sure that many of my constituents would have felt the same.

Ms Jackson: It was something of a revelation to hear the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) talk about something other than military bands. May I ask him, and the hon. Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon), how people in Twickenham will benefit if the air that they breathe is thickly polluted with fumes from petrol-driven vehicles? I know that my constituents would much prefer cars to be taken off their roads. One of the problems is this way of looking at London as if it were a series of totally separate entities, rather than perceiving that the failure to meet its transport needs is one of the reasons why, in transport terms, it is in such a mess.

Mr. Congdon: I certainly accept that it is right to look at London's transport needs as a whole. As I have said, my constituency has no underground stations, but I do not object to the investment of large sums in London Underground. However, I take issue with what the hon. Lady said about her constituents' wanting to get cars off the road. That really means that people want to get other people's cars off the road, but to continue to drive their own.

[Mr. Congdon]

I am afraid that all the arguments about restraining cars, through bans or congestion taxes—as suggested by the hon. Member for Eastleigh—are dishonest in terms of the electorate. Most people with cars want to be able to use them. The challenge to transport policy is to ensure that, especially during rush hours, people have a realistic alternative and that they can be sure that, if they turn up at the station, they can expect a train to arrive and to take them to their destination on time without their having to leave two hours earlier than they would otherwise have done.

The best way of encouraging people to leave their cars at home is not to ban or restrict the use of cars, but to ensure that trains run reliably. That is why I support the privatisation of British Rail. It is why I support the private finance initiative and it is why I welcome the announcements of further investment in London's transport infrastructure that have been made in the past couple of weeks. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on his efforts to ensure that London has its fair share of transport money. As was pointed out at Question Time on Monday, the vast majority of his Department's spending on London goes to public transport rather than on roads. I have no problem with that and, particularly because I come from south London, I am happy to support the Bill.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon) as he is an old friend of mine and I agree with much of what he said. He made an especially important point when he said that, although the price of public transport is important, people are essentially looking for reliability in terms of a good public transport system. If it is published that a train will leave the station of departure at a certain time and reach the destination at a certain time, people want to know that on the whole that is likely to happen because they have appointments and meetings to get to and they are busy people.

My constituents have told me that they would not mind paying a bit more to travel in from Beaconsfield, Gerrards Cross and Denham on the Chiltern line to secure a bit of investment, a reliable service and decent trains. That important point demonstrates that, although price is important, a number of other factors are involved in assessing public transport.

Mr. Wilson: Does the hon. Gentleman think that, through public investment, the Chiltern line provides a decent service? If so, why does he want to give it away?

Mr. Smith: The service is not being given away. People in the present management are among the most enthusiastic about privatising services.

Mr. Wilson: They would be.

Mr. Smith: Of course—they know that they can provide an even better service if the shackles of public ownership are removed from them. I have discussed with Mr. Adrian Shooter, managing director of the Chiltern line, his plans for privatisation. The investment has been a success and we have a better service, but let us not be complacent about this. There is always room for improvement. On the Chiltern line in particular, there is tremendous room for improvement in using assets more effectively. We need an effective marketing campaign. Mr. Shooter believes that he will be able to conduct that campaign much more successfully in the private sector.

I do not know whether Mr. Shooter will win that franchise, but I hope that he does because the management has done a good job and would do an even better one if the company were in the private sector. Therefore, the privatisation of British Rail has my full support, I do not understand how anyone can fail to support it when public ownership has been so disastrous in the past 40 years.

Mr. Wilson: I am sorry to intervene again, but I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's argument. He says that the public service on the Chiltern line is disastrous—to use his word. He says that a public service, delivered within the public sector, paid for by the taxpayer and operated by Mr. Adrian Shooter et al, is disastrous. Is that his position? If not, he is proposing that the public sector should pay for the assets and that the profits should go to a private operator. Where is the long-term perspective in that?

Mr. Smith: I said no such thing. I said that, generally, since nationalisation, British Rail's history had been disastrous and most people would agree with that. In many ways, the Chiltern line is an exception to that rule. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah."] It is. Not many hon. Members can say perhaps, as I can, that most of the customers of the line in their constituency are satisfied with the service. Nevertheless, there is no room for complacency and improvements could and will be made if the service is privatised.

I better say a word about the Bill. I was pleased when, on 28 February, I discovered that the Government had decided to publish the London Regional Transport Bill because it is a model Bill. It will have no direct effect on public expenditure or on public sector manpower and it will not create any compliance costs for business. Those are three attractive characteristics.

On 28 February, I was serving on the Standing Committee considering the Finance Bill, which ran to some 200 clauses and about 30 schedules. Another tremendous virtue of this Bill is its brevity. It has six clauses. Into those six clauses, the Opposition have managed to read privatisation. I have considered those clauses carefully and I cannot find any reference to the privatisation of London Underground Ltd. I have therefore concluded that the fears referred to in the Opposition's so-called reasoned amendment are utterly unfounded.

My understanding of the Bill—on more than a cursory reading—is that it does something important for London Regional Transport. It removes commercial shackles that were inadvertently placed on it by the London Regional Transport Act 1984. The Bill has my full support because I am a strong supporter of the private finance initiative. All public sector bodies, including London Regional Transport, should make maximum use of it. There has been much talk in the House about how Conservative Members cannot provide any concrete examples of the PFI in practice, but I have two almost concrete examples—I say almost concrete because the M40 will be not concrete, but tarmac.

The first example is the widening of the M40 motorway between Denham and Loudwater in my constituency from three lanes in each direction to four in each direction. I am pleased that, because of my tireless efforts, a surface called porous asphalt will be laid on that motorway and much less noise will result. The important thing to note about the contract is that it will be the subject of a so-called DBFO contract. DBFO is a bit of PFI jargon. It stands for design, build, finance and operate.

The Department of Transport is considering tenders for that contract. Soon a contract will be awarded to one company to take over work on the whole of the M40 between Denham and, I believe, Warwick, to operate the whole motorway and to widen the first section. That substantial contract would not be taking place if we did not have the excellent PFI.

Mr. Congdon: Does my hon. Friend agree that in PFI projects it is important to ensure that risk is genuinely transferred to the private sector?

Mr. Smith: It most certainly is. That is one of the reasons why there has been some delay. Some critics of the PFI have said that it is not moving along quickly enough. I sympathise with that view and with the construction companies that have been expressing it, but the PFI is new and it is extremely important that the Government should ensure, as my hon. Friend says, that risk is fully transferred to the private sector. That may have been a slight sticking point in some of the negotiations. I understand that in the case to which I have referred the delay has been minimal and that we can expect construction to start later this year.

The second example is the PFI contract to extend Wycombe hospital. That excellent national health service contract was referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Budget day as an example of attracting private sector money into the health service. The Labour party immediately says that this is privatisation, but of course it is not—it is simply doing something intelligent. If we have finite resources, as we always will have for the health service, why not bring in private sector resources to supplement them with a capital project of some scale?

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North-East): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that even though that hospital project was mentioned in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech, still no contract has been signed to complete it?

Mr. Smith: I can confirm that only last week I received a letter from the chairman of the South Buckinghamshire NHS trust telling me that he was making good progress and that the project was on track. As it is one of the first PFI contracts in the health service, he is leading the way and he is having to ensure that he gets it right. As my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East would say, the chairman wants to ensure that the risk is transferred to the private sector. He tells me, however, that the project is on course and that we can expect an announcement reasonably soon. I am confident that it will go ahead.

The same applies to LRT. It, too, has a limited amount of cash to spend, so it is sensible to create opportunities for it to supplement whatever the Treasury feels able to make available through PFI contracts. I understand that the present legislation is such that there is some considerable doubt whether that is possible. That is why the Government have introduced the Bill and I welcome it for that reason.

As someone who represents a constituency on the periphery of London, but with large numbers of constituents who are commuters travelling not just on the Chiltern line, not just on the M40, but on the underground from Amersham, my perception is that the service has improved greatly over the past few years. There has been a tremendous amount of investment in London Underground. My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East referred to that in his speech and he was right. In a way, it is disappointing that so much money has had to be devoted to safety measures, but what higher priority is there than safety? After the King's Cross fire, it was essential that priority should be given to getting rid of the old wooden escalators and replacing them with modern non-wooden escalators. A great deal of money has been spent on doing that.

As I travel around the London underground system, I am constantly impressed by the quality and quantity of the improvements that have been made. I was at Angel tube station the other day—I had not been there for some time—and I was amazed by what I saw. There used to be a platform in the middle with a tunnel over the top and trains coming in on each side. People felt exposed standing on that platform. The station has now been transformed.

A great deal of work is being done at Bank and on the connection with the docklands light railway. The whole complex is substantial. London Underground has put up a helpful explanatory note about the complicated works. It is spending millions of pounds improving transport facilities for Londoners. I am a great supporter of London's underground. I always travel around London by tube. Anyone who takes a taxi from here to the City needs his head examined. One need only pop on the tube at Westminster to be at Blackfriars, Mansion House, Cannon Street or Monument in a matter of minutes. The same will be true when the Jubilee line is complete. Access to docklands will be transformed. We will be able to travel from here to Canary Wharf in 14 minutes.

The other great LRT success is the transformation in the bus services. The Public Accounts Committee recently examined the sale of the bus operating companies. The Department and London Transport excelled themselves. A report by the National Audit Office concluded "that the Department and London Transport achieved the sale objectives. No purchaser achieved more than a 25 per cent. share of the London bus market. The Department and London Transport completed the sale virtually on target and successfully promoted employee participation in the sale. Four of the ten companies were purchased by management and employee teams.

At £233 million, gross proceeds were substantially higher than expected. A high level of interest was generated by London Transport's marketing campaign and some bidders were more optimistic than expected about the prospects for their targeted business. London Transport, the Department and their respective advisers successfully devised a bidding process which took advantage of this. They generated substantial bidding competition and obtained final prices which were some £30 million higher than the eventual purchasers' initial indicative bids and some £70 million higher than the mean of all indicative bids."

That was excellent.

[Mr. Smith]

The PAC has examined many privatisations and many lessons have been learnt. The NAO report is excellent—indeed, a classic of its kind. The report concluded:

"Overall, the sale was managed effectively. London Transport and the Department took account of best practice from previous sales and the recommendations of the Committee of Public Accounts. For example, they set clear sale objectives, clearly defined responsibilities, established a project steering group and project director, introduced clawback arrangements on property and commissioned a benchmark evaluation."

My hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London did all that, and I congratulate him on his achievement. It was a very successful sale, as the NAO has confirmed.

What is more, London Transport's customers will benefit in the long run from the fact that those companies are now in the private sector and have a big incentive to improve and provide the best possible quality of service for their customers. At the end of the day, it is all about customer service—about providing quality of service whether on the underground or on the buses. The way to do that is by bringing in the private sector more and more, so that there is greater competition and better service. The Bill has my support.

8.35 pm

Mr. Stephen Timms (Newham, North-East): I apologise to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and the House, as although I was present at the beginning of the debate, I had to leave the Chamber to attend a meeting of the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee and therefore missed much of the earlier part of the debate.

It is a remarkable comment on the Government's management of the private finance initiative that we should be spending our second full day this week on rather hasty and brief Bills that have appeared out of nowhere, but which are required to reassure private sector finance sources before they provide funding for private finance initiatives.

Yesterday, we spent the day on the National Health Service (Residual Liabilities) Bill which, on my reading of it, is even more alarming than this Bill. The NHS Bill provides NHS trusts with security for borrowing potentially enormous sums outside the control of the Secretary of State. It will also have the effect of shifting the risk back from the private sector to the public sector—in direct contrast with what we heard a few moments ago about the requirement for the private sector to take over all the risk. The NHS Bill will achieve exactly the opposite, in an attempt to secure private finance for the national health service.

During recent weeks, the Select Committee has been taking evidence on the PFI from a large number of interested parties. It has become clear that the transport sector is a much more appropriate area than the health service for the application of private finance. The particular reason for that is that the construction of transport infrastructure or the acquisition of new rolling stock creates future revenue streams, typically fare income, that would not have been available otherwise. That can be used to release a sum of privately provided capital for application today in establishing infrastructure, without affecting public finance in any way.

That is not the case in the health service. When a new hospital is built new, small revenue streams may be created from charges for car parking, from the sale of refreshments in the cafeteria or from sales in the hospital shop—but that revenue is insignificant compared with the cost of building the hospital. Ultimately, the whole cost of the Wycombe hospital referred to by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) will be met from taxation. As capital provided under the PFI is more expensive than capital provided directly by the Government, there is every likelihood that hospitals built under the PFI will, in the long run, cost more than hospitals funded by conventional means.

The position is different with transport because there is the opportunity to use future fare revenues, which might attract significant private finance that would not otherwise have been available to the project without a heavy call on public funding.

I must take issue with the hon. Member for Beaconsfield about the M40. I am sceptical about the ability of the PFI to generate additional revenue in projects such as the widening of the M40. It will not lever any significant additional finance from the private sector. Ultimately, the whole cost of widening the M40 will be borne by the public sector in future payments in future years.

Mr. Tim Smith: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that, in effect, the cost will be spread over a number of years, perhaps 30. The point is, however, that the capital will be provided by the private sector now and if it were not, the widening would not take place at all.

Mr. Timms: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's point, which makes exactly my argument. We are not gaining anything new. We are just deferring payment to future years. Since those payments will have to be made for many years to come, there will in future years be fewer resources available for the investment in transport infrastructure that we all want around London and elsewhere.

When additional revenue is created—I am thinking particularly of the construction of railway lines or the acquisition of new rolling stock—the use of private finance is beneficial, but that is not so in the construction of new roads or the widening of motorways unless tolls are imposed. Although that is a different debate, it at least attracts additional revenue.

The principle of the use of private finance is much less contentious when applied to London Regional Transport than it is when applied to the subject of yesterday's debate. The Bill is more problematical because it raises the prospect of slipping towards privatisation—specifically of the underground—by stealth. I was present for the exchanges between the Minister and my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) about the extent to which the Bill is simply a technical measure. Unlike the hon. Member for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon), I certainly would not support the privatisation of London Underground. I do not think that it would benefit underground passengers, and I do not think that the vast majority of underground passengers believe that it would either. There are many reasons that one could give in support of that view. The underground's future depends and will always depend on substantial public sector support and, therefore, the case for privatisation is not very strong.

Mr. Congdon: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument carefully. Will he at least concede that the one thing that London Underground is able to do is generate a significant income stream because its operating revenue is more than its operating cost?

Mr. Timms: I entirely accept that. That very fact means that there is potential for the use of private finance in developing London's transport network, about which I shall make some specific points and cite some instances in which I think it will be particularly important.

Mr. Spearing: On creeping privatisation, is my hon. Friend aware that, in a later exchange, the Minister did not deny that there could be wholesale contractorisation, which would amount to privatisation in all but name of existing services, such as power supply, and new railways such as the Hackney-Chelsea line and the line from Whitechapel northwards? In effect, therefore, the Bill is, as it were, blood transfusion by PFI. As my hon. Friend has been learning about that, will he confirm that it gives powers to plan, finance, build and operate?

Mr. Timms: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I was not present for that exchange, but I entirely agree with him that splitting up the underground network in the way that he has implied would be a seriously retrograde step. It is most important that we maintain an integrated, publicly owned underground network.

Nobody can deny that there is a need for additional capital investment in London Transport at all levels, from the very small to the very large. Some of those requirements might be suitable for the application of private finance—some most certainly are not. I was elected in June 1994 and a couple of weeks later I met the District line management about the need to refurbish East Ham and Upton Park underground stations in my constituency. Exactly the same concerns relate to Plaistow station in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South. The stations are old and grim and have been neglected for a long time. They have the potential to be restored to a much more attractive condition. There is a lingering charm about their structures, the potential attractiveness of which I would not want to minimise. It would not cost a great deal to make them attractive again.

Those stations are also extremely heavily used. East Ham is one of the seven or eight most heavily used stations on the entire underground network. Indeed, the revenue that it generates for London Underground is also in the top seven or eight revenues generated by all stations in the whole system. Much less well used stations, which generate much less revenue, further down the line have been improved and refurbished, yet East Ham, Upton Park and Plaistow—indeed, the whole string of stations from there down to Aldgate East—have not been refurbished.

The then business manager of the District line attended the meeting to which I have referred. We met at the stations and he assured me that there would be substantial refurbishment in that financial year. Indeed, he even told me the identity of the contractor who had been selected to carry out the work. A few weeks later, however, that commitment was withdrawn. I was told that it had all been a misunderstanding, that there had never been a scheme for carrying out work on the stations and that we would have to wait considerably longer for it to be carried out. I was very upset and surprised by that turn of events.

I subsequently met the chairman of London Regional Transport and I am pleased to say that another good scheme has been proposed. This time I have seen the drawing so I know that the scheme exists to refurbish all the stations from East Ham westwards. In fact, some work has already begun. Closed circuit television has been installed and is operating at East Ham station. I commend the fact that at long last that work has been carried out. It is a considerable reassurance, especially to women using East Ham station and others who use it late at night, as many do.

The rub is that the bulk of the refurbishment scheme on those stations will have to await a decision of the London Regional Transport board, which I understand is to take place in the next month or so. The scheme will have to compete with others. It is necessary and I very much hope that it will be given the go-ahead, but the truth is that there is not enough capital going around even to carry out that essential maintenance. Until that capital is available, the fabric of the network will continue to decline, as it clearly has done in recent years. I do not think that in the particular instance that I have described—station refurbishment—private finance will help much. Elsewhere it may.

The best case that I have seen made for increased investment in London's transport network was made by London First, whose programme has already been mentioned in the debate. Its document, "London's Action Programme for Transport: 1995-2010", is an impressive, well-presented overall view of the needs of London's transport infrastructure. The Minister was present at its launch in the autumn.

I recently received London First's annual report, and I shall read one or two sentences from it, which show what that organisation says about its plan, its programme and the response that it has received so far from the Government. In the introduction the chairman, Lord Sheppard, says,

"London's Action Programme for Transport: 1995-2010, published by the London First Transport initiative on behalf of the London Pride Partnership in the autumn, is a landmark document"—

I agree with that—

"the first comprehensive and fully costed plan for London's transport needs in 20 years."

The fact that there has been nothing like it for 20 years is startling, but I think we know the reasons why such an important plan has not been drawn up for such a long time.

Lord Sheppard continues:

"The challenge for London First in 1996 is to show that, with full commitment, the plan can be made to work and to demonstrate that the benefits to London and the UK from doing so will far outweigh the modest extra investment required."

In his review, the chief executive, Stephen O'Brien, explains how the plan was drawn up. He says:

"The Programme is based upon realistic and positive assumptions about London's future and calls for an end to the short-termism which has characterised transport funding and development under successive administrations. It contains three main elements action to improve existing transport systems

a new infrastructure programme and an estimate of the funding required.

The total cost over 15 years is estimated at £23 billion. Of this, £11 billion would come from the public sector and, spread over the life of the programme, would not represent a higher average annual expenditure than at present.

It calls on the Government for immediate decisions on commitment to a consistent and adequate programme of investment in the Underground assurance of the funding necessary to accelerate the completion of the bus priority and cycle networks authorisation to start the statutory procedures for Thameslink 2000"— of course, we have made some headway with that in recent weeks—and

[Mr. Timms]

"firm commitment to proceed with CrossRail."

The chief executive's report goes on to say:

"The first test for the Programme was the November 1995 Budget which . . . failed to provide the level of funds called for in our Programme."

Mr. Norris: Surely the hon. Gentleman has not dealt with the statement in the London First report adequately. He correctly identified the sentence in which the total programme over 15 years was valued, and pointed to the extent of the public contribution that London First assesses might be necessary, but he neglected to mention the balance that London First acknowledges can be provided through various forms of private finance. Is not that figure as large as the figure that London First suggests should come from the public purse? Does not that fact make the point behind the Bill, which would facilitate that large proportion of private finance that London First itself says must be aggregated with the taxpayer's contribution?

Mr. Timms: Consistently throughout my speech I have said that I accept the need for private investment in the development of London's transport, so I agree with the Minister there. However, what I want to emphasise is the fact that London First says that last year's Budget was the first test of the programme and that it "failed to provide the level of funds called for in our Programme."

Lady Olga Maitland: I have been listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's reservations about the private finance initiative. He has said that he accepts it, but under something of a socialist scheme. Does he not agree that his party's proposals would make the PFI a sham, because it would be so restrictive that it would drive away investment, and thus would not achieve the real inward investment that we hope will come into the transport system. Labour's proposal simply would not work.

Mr. Timms: I do not agree with that at all. Indeed, as I said earlier, what we saw yesterday was an attempt to shift risk away from the private sector and back into the public sector. The word "sham" could well be used in that connection, to describe the attempts to use private finance in the health service.

I have said throughout the debate that we need private finance in the development of London's transport system, and the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) can rest assured that that will be successful under a Labour Government.

I have only a few minutes left, so I shall make my final point. I greatly welcome the recent announcement that the Government will support the proposal for an international passenger station at Stratford on the channel tunnel rail link—a project in which the Minister has taken a close interest for many years. I am delighted by the outcome of the Government's decision-making process. The announcement was the best news that east London has had for 50 years. It was also good news for the prospects for imaginative development of public transport in this country.

The hon. Member for Croydon, North-East was rather uncertain about the prospect of the completion of the Jubilee line, but I welcome it. The decision about Stratford highlights the need for a planned dispersal by London Regional Transport from the channel tunnel rail link.

St. Pancras is already overcrowded and it is not easy to travel from there to the most likely destinations. Crossrail would provide us with the opportunity for people to leave the channel tunnel trains at Stratford, get on to crossrail and travel to their destinations in central London, the west end, Heathrow and elsewhere by rail. Ideally, I would like to see a connection to crossrail from the channel tunnel rail link at Stratford—and an amendment has been tabled to the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill to facilitate that.

I emphasise the fact that when the Jubilee line is complete, if the Government simply maintain the level of investment now going into it and use it to build new rail infrastructure, that will be sufficient to build crossrail. I hope that when he replies to the debate the Minister will be able to say something about the prospects for crossrail in the light of the deliberations that I know are already under way.

I have no doubt that private finance will need to be secured to build crossrail, and I am happy with the idea. I hope that we can achieve real progress in giving the scheme the go-ahead quickly.

Finally, I endorse what my hon. Friends have said in the debate and what London First, too, has said: we need an adequate and consistent level of finance. We need both. Investment must be not only sufficient, but stable, consistent and predictable, so that LRT knows where it is and we can develop the transport infrastructure that London needs for the future.

8.57 pm

Mr. Nirj Joseph Deva (Brentford and Isleworth): Madam Deputy Speaker, I am fortunate indeed to catch your eye in this important debate. I am only sorry that so few Labour Members are listening to an important debate that affects the lives of Londoners.

Brentford and Isleworth, my constituency, is blessed with seven tube stations and two tube lines, which I estimate are used by about 8,000 of my 80,000 constituents daily. The tube is the life-blood of my constituents, who use it as a means of reaching the City and elsewhere, and part of their everyday life. I therefore find the Bill an important measure—but a marginal one—in the great improvements that must be made in London Underground.

I should say, as an aside, that often my constituents have written to ask that Turnham Green station be more frequently used by the tube lines, which sometimes do not stop there.

The private finance initiative is an important step in introducing private finance to the process of improving our transport infrastructure. The measure is essentially technical; it is not revolutionary or earth-shattering. It will allow London Transport to take full advantage of opportunities for increasing investment.

Much of the London Underground network is very old—Victorian—and needs substantial investment. Accordingly, the Government have increased investment to record levels in recent years—to £1 billion in 1995-96.

Much of that investment has been directed to upgrading the Central line, which is now nearly complete, and constructing the new Jubilee line.

The benefit of private finance is that the Government and London Transport will look to the private sector as a source of further substantial investment. The Labour party, however, appears totally unaware of the great changes in capital financing of infrastructure projects that are taking place throughout the world. Labour Members talk as though they are on another planet—another economic environment.

The useless, almost asinine, debate about whether finance should be private or public shows a failure to understand that there is no such thing as public finance. Public finance is drawn only from people in the private sector making enough returns to pay taxes so that the Exchequer can put that money back into the coffers—the investments—of the economy. Public finance is not created uniquely by any group of people—civil servants, Ministers and the like—creating enterprise for themselves. They simply use the private sector's money in a different form.

If we can enable the private sector to put its money directly into improving our infrastructure projects without the interference of Ministers, civil servants and even parliamentarians, so that the return on capital is fair and equitable, what is the sense of that asinine point that the Labour party keeps wheeling out?

I was fortunate to follow the excellent speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and the earnest speech by the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms), but I say to my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London that we must consider the private finance initiative in the light of the way in which private sector investment is improving the infrastructure of much of the globe.

The world is changing rapidly. One cannot keep capital at home. Capital is global and moves to find the right rates of return. No party—not even the Labour party—can prevent British capital from moving out of Britain to find a better rate of return elsewhere. We are competing with other countries for the capital that is here, which should be invested in our infrastructure projects. That is why, although I may sound rude when I say so, I find the Labour party's argument very muddled. Labour Members do not seem to know what they are talking about.

Today, even the World bank—that great instrument of international development—the International Finance Corporation and our Commonwealth Development Corporation are investors with the private sector in building roads, power stations and water systems with private capital in far-off places such as the Philippines, Indonesia, India and Malaysia. That private capital seeks the highest rate of return, provided that the risks are fair.

Against that competition, we must encourage the same capital sources to fund our infrastructure projects and to develop our infrastructure. Throughout the world, schemes such as "build, own and operate", "build, own and transfer", and "build, lease and transfer" are operating. In the past few years, £6,000 million has left this country to be invested in India alone. In the past five years, £30 billion has left this country to be spent on infrastructure projects around the world. We need that capital here to develop our infrastructure. If we are unable to give the best rate of return for that capital, it will not stay here.

I must say to my party and to the Opposition that cautious little measures such as the Bill, introduced drip by drip, ain't going to do the job. We need to be as bold and imaginative as other countries, which have taken such investment opportunities by the horns and attracted our capital, our insurance investment funds and our pension funds. That capital is now building roads, toll systems and many other things in those countries. We can move forward to attract private finance only by avoiding the muddled thinking that the Labour party has been peddling all evening and taking a clear, decisive view that we need to put such a private finance policy into operation as soon as possible.

Mr. Wilson: Given the hon. Gentleman's evangelical zeal about this matter and the £30 billion that he said has unnecessarily left Britain to fund public-private projects in other countries, he must surely be deeply ashamed at how late in the day it was before the Tory party embraced the PFI.

Mr. Deva: Not at all, because the Tory party has created the climate in which that capital could be accrued. The Tory party created the climate that has turned our country into a major investor in various projects around the world. Last year, this country accrued £36 billion in dividends from our overseas investments, both indirect and project investment. It was not our party that left behind a ramshackle state of affairs in 1979, and which created a climate that led investment to go abroad. Now the Tory party has created the climate for that investment to be made in this country.

With great respect, when the Labour party talks about understanding private finance, I laugh because it has not the slightest idea what it is talking about. It is clear tonight that Opposition Members still do not know what they are talking about in terms of private finance and capital project investment.

For that reason it is important that even this small Bill, which is not a revolutionary one, should not be opposed as it has been tonight. It should have gone through on the nod because it is part of the continuing progress that we must make to involve the private sector in the development of our infrastructure. I therefore support the Bill.

9.7 pm

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): First, may I say three cheers for this excellent little Bill? I am merely sorry that I was not in the Chamber when my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London opened the debate because I know from experience what a witty speaker he is. He has a constant twinkle in his eye and, more than that, he has always taken a great interest in some of the causes that I have put before him. I have taken constituents to see him who have been concerned about red routes in London and he has offered them a sympathetic ear. I also remember from a debate on roads that we had a shared concern about over-zealous local authorities putting in road humps, about which I have powerful and strong feelings.

The Bill is a significant and important one because as a traveller on London underground I rejoice in the fact that the Government have not only spent more than £1 billion on investment in the past financial year alone, but have recognised the importance of making sure that we have an underground system that is ready and capable of coping with travellers' needs way into the next century.

The truth is that good transport in London is not only important for residents and for those who work here, but important to those who travel here from all over the country; to those who invest here from overseas; to those who decide to base their business headquarters and companies in London and to the many tourists who come here. They come for many reasons but one is that they can get around our great city.

As a traveller, I feel safe on our London underground. I would not say that about the New York subway. I have travelled many, many miles on the London network, which covers 200 stations, because I know that it is reliable and gets me from A to B. I accept that it is sometimes slowed down by signalling problems but by and large, I know that I can set out at a certain time and get where I want to go. A good example of that, and one where timing is crucial, is getting out to Heathrow airport. The last thing that I would want to do is miss a plane. If I tried to go by car, I could face indescribable log jams that would cause frayed nerves. Travel on the underground means getting there on time and without a frazzled mind.

The efficacy of our underground means that it is safe, although there have been instances of handbag snatching. By and large, I do not feel at risk. Nor is there any danger to the safe management of the underground. It upsets me when Labour tries to suggest that if we bring in private investment—or come the day, on which I would rejoice, that the system is privatised—safety will go awry. That is not true. It did not happen with British Airways or Stagecoach. They have gone from success to success.

This is an effective Bill that is designed to bring investment and resources for projects that everyone accepts cannot not be paid for from the public purse. The question is how to bring the money in. The Labour party hops from one leg to the other. It says that it is in favour of the PFI, then it is not, then it is, then it is muddled and then it wants restrictions on investment. Companies will not play its game. They will go away and leave the taxpayer with the cost. That is another spending pledge by the Labour party that this country will not wear.

Under the Government's scheme in this effective, neat little Bill, funding will be provided to give us a thoroughly modern metro system with new and refurbished trains.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Lady, but I am tired of the burblings on the Opposition Front Bench.

Lady Olga Maitland: Burblings are about as much as the Labour party can produce.

Not only will the investment that I was describing give us new and refurbished trains on all lines, it will help us to provide more frequent services, faster journeys, less crowding, high-quality stations, greater capacity and a better general standard of services. It will help locally with other aspects of infrastructure such as reliable lifts and escalators and provide new opportunities all around.

Perhaps the most significant aspect of the Bill is that it enables projects that need big capital outlays and a broader perspective. I rejoice that the Bill could provide resources for better communications in the underground service. The use of fibre-optic technology will mean a better, faster, more efficient system for the underground service and better information services for passengers. In sum, it will be a communications service that takes us well into the next century.

I welcome the investment in the prestige ticketing system. Its technology will also take us well into the next century. I like the idea of a smart card system, which will undoubtedly modernise London Transport ticketing management; let alone the idea that it could be interactive with the bus service. The contractor would be responsible for selling and checking tickets, and basically assume all the responsibilities that London Underground does not need to handle. There must be considerable investment in order to ensure an efficient power supply and the Bill will allow that to occur.

I am encouraged by the fact that there is no shortage of prospective investors in any of the three areas. I understand that about 10 serious inquiries have been made to each sector and that, all told, potential investment could total £750 million—money that would otherwise come out of taxpayers' pockets, which is clearly what Labour Members favour. There is no doubt that the legislation will benefit all concerned.

I am sorry that Labour Members are being rather churlish about the Bill. I do not understand why they have tabled a reasoned amendment—I do not think that it is at all reasonable. They suggest that "privatisation" is a bogey word and that is irresponsible. Labour Members remain in the stone age while countries across the globe are following the British example and privatising their industries. The Labour party is out of touch: it has no credibility when it comes to economic management.

We are planning a transport system of which London can be proud. London is a respected world capital and we want to maintain that position by enhancing our existing facilities. I have no doubt that the Bill will provide a thoroughly decent and modern metro system. That is a real, not an elusive, goal and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on introducing the measure.

9.16 pm

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland), particularly in the light of her reference to the importance of London. London's prosperity as a tourist centre—not only because of the millennium, but year in, year out—is of tremendous value to the economy of the United Kingdom as a whole and affects the prosperity and the employment of the entire country. It is essential that the transport and economy of London are buttressed and placed in a flourishing position as soon as possible.

My hon. Friend spoke about less crowding on the London underground. At about 6.30 this evening I saw a very crowded Piccadilly line train. As a matter of fact, I have spent nearly all of today travelling to and from the funeral of a relative in Wales. For that reason, I apologise to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to the Minister and to the House for having missed most of the debate.

I was driving back to London along the M4 between Heathrow and London. As I came to the raised part of the motorway, I saw a Piccadilly line train—at that point the track is above ground—travelling along a viaduct about 10 or 12 stations and eight or nine miles out of central London. It was packed with people and I could see through the windows that the pressure upon the passengers travelling home from work, or perhaps in some cases to Heathrow, must have been hugely uncomfortable. It is very important that investment in the underground relates to capacity and to steps that will eliminate crowding in the long run.

Of course, it is true—as hon. Members have already said, including my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith)—that there has been a huge amount of investment in London Transport in recent years. We have had the Victoria line, and the Jubilee line is now well advanced and under construction—as we can see in the square outside the building every working day of our lives. It is very important that the Jubilee line is completed and goes out to Greenwich in time for the millennium exhibition—apart from its vital need to serve people in south-east London.

There is the prospect of crossrail; and on the way to Heathrow—not the underground, but a surface railway line—an extension of the line from Paddington, with its spur to Heathrow, in which my hon. Friend the Minister has been greatly involved in recent years. That will be of enormous benefit. But there is not, and has not been, enough investment. Hon. Members on both sides of the House are right to point out the need for more investment in London transport—and I do not mind whether it comes from public or from private sources, as long as it takes place and enhances the quality and the capacity of the London underground service.

I used to be a member of the Greater London council, about 25 years ago, and it used to control London transport. The Greater London council and the London county council before it were usually Labour-controlled—and they did not provide enough investment for it. The fact is that there has been a backlog in investment over the years, and this Bill will do something—even if it is only a marginal amount—to put matters right by enhancing the provision of investment in London transport, which is what we need and which both sides of the House ought to encourage.

Transport by the tube has always been uncomfortable. I can remember that in the Greater London council's county hall library there was a book called "Traffic and Theatre Rhymes" by Guy Boas, who I believe was a schoolmaster. One of the rhymes was called "The Underground" and it went as follows:

"The underground goes round and round and also to and fro

And men in blue look after you and tell you how to go

They never quite direct you right, although of course they know

The platform man has got a plan for dealing with the queue

He makes men wait behind a gate until their train is due

They watch their train depart again and then he lets them through".

That is an annoying reflection of officialdom on the London underground between the wars. There is another poem in the book "Traffic and Theatre Rhymes", which relates not to the underground but to trains generally. It is:

"When a puffer
Meets a buffer
One of them
Is bound to suffer
If the buffer
Then the puffer
Knows itself
To be the rougher
If the puffer
Then the buffer
Knows itself
To be the tougher
If the puffer
And the buffer
Both unhappily
Should suffer
Then the buffer
Knows the puffer-
Must be driven
By a duffer".

There are a lot of duffers in this place, and most of them are on Opposition Benches. I think that it is important in these matters constantly to seek to improve standards. I am glad to see that the Secretary of State has just arrived. When he was a member of the Greater London council about 25 years ago, he wrote a pamphlet, which I remember reading, about building up tourism in London. Although his pamphlet was mainly about hotel provision, it touched on the underground and on the railway system as well.

It has already been pointed out in this debate that approximately 25 per cent. of the passengers on the London underground are overseas visitors. As I have already said, the expansion of tourism is vital to the economy of London and the economy of Britain as a whole. If we are to encourage tourism, we must ensure that our transport facilities are not only efficient but pleasant.

Research by the Society of West End Theatre showed that when people decide to go to a play in the evening their choice is affected not only by whether they think that they will like the play itself, but by the whole idea of the outing—their refreshments, transport, parking provision and so on. If they do not like the transport, they will be put off from going to the play. The theatre is one of the things that pulls visitors into Britain and London as tourists. People will not come to London and Britain in such large numbers if the transport facilities are not satisfactory, pleasant and comfortable.

I would like to see sponsorship and the private finance initiative, on which I have heard my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State speak, extended not only to tickets and stations, but to the trains themselves. If, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield suggested, one was catching a tube from here to the City, one would get on a train which might have, say, a Tesco carriage, a Sainsbury's carriage and a Marks and Spencer carriage. One would then have companies whose names everyone knows vying with one another in order to promote facilities that are pleasant and attractive. Their good name would depend on the quality of the carriages and the comfort and convenience of passengers. They would have every incentive to ensure that the transport was more comfortable, more pleasant and less crowded than it is at the moment.

I would like to see that included in the Bill and I hope that when my hon. Friend the Minister replies, he will cover all those points. It is on the future quality of public transport in London that wealth, prosperity and employment in London so largely depend. I have great pleasure in supporting the Bill, but I should like to see it more widely drawn and that should be attended to in Committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Brian Wilson, with the leave of the House.

9.27 pm

Mr. Wilson: I was trying, on the back of an envelope, to compete with the poetic efforts of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel). I got as far as,

"The debate has concluded without rancour,

Although the last speaker was the hon. Member for Twickenham."

It was a little unsporting of the Tory Whips to keep the crème de la crème of Tory Back Benchers to the last. In the past half hour we have had a veritable banquet of elocution. It is a tribute to the hon. Member for Twickenham, and probably to a public school education, but I do not know anyone else who can make the words "go", "through", and "queue" rhyme.

The calibre of speeches that we have heard recently suggests that the subject is not taken immensely seriously by the Government. I pay tribute to the Minister, as has been done earlier, for at least giving it the courtesy of a long and full speech. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I do not over-egg the pudding, but it was not bad. By the standards of what we heard later, it was the performance of a maestro.

Recent speeches have also demonstrated that the standard of Tory central office brief is not what it used to be. We heard several speeches that were based on the patently false premise that the Opposition are opposing the principle of public-private co-operation in extending investment in the London underground system. That is the antithesis of the truth. As I said in my opening speech, we might well not have needed this debate if the Minister and I had been able to sort things out between us and accept each other's words as our bonds. The problem that muddied the waters in advance of the debate was the fact that the deputy leader of Tory party, I mean the Deputy Prime Minister—he has so many titles, but that is not one of them—produced the statement that he wanted privatisation of the underground in the next Tory manifesto. I hear cluckings of agreement from Conservative Members.

To be fair to the Tories, virtually every hon. Member except the Minister has said today that it is a pity that the Bill would not privatise the underground, because they are all in favour. Some have gone further and said that they want the same franchising system for the underground as is being introduced for the railways. Others obviously want to separate the trains from the tracks. Opposition suspicions are, therefore, obviously justified.

Today, we have had an opportunity to explore the argument and to put down markers against the privatisation of the London underground system. I have not the slightest doubt that that view will be shared by the vast majority of people, not only in London but throughout the country. Just as some 90 per cent. of public opinion is opposed to rail privatisation, so 90 per cent. of public opinion would be opposed to the privatisation of London Underground, for all the excellent reasons that have been adduced by Opposition Members.

The hon. Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva) gave us a little lesson in global economics and the way in which British capital is taking flight to build roads and railways everywhere in the world except Britain. That tells us more about the loyalties of British capital than about the Bill. If the hon. Member actually believes that if only the vehicle for public-private investment in infrastructure had existed, British capital would have been put into Britain instead, he must explain to us why the public-private initiative was launched only in 1994. Before then, contractors had plenty of business in this country and other parts of world on the basis that they were hired to do the job and were paid for the job. They performed a task—usually the construction phase of projects—and they were good at it.

Labour recognised quite some time before that there were possibilities in extending and harnessing the role of the private sector to bring capital in, not only to fulfil the contractor role, but to take some of the maintenance risk, as is only reasonable, and—on other less easy to define occasions—perhaps to take some operational risk. That principle has not been in dispute for some time in the Labour party, so it is a bit rich for the hon. Gentleman to give us lectures when the Government have been so belated in coming to that conclusion.

We had a more general discussion earlier about the merits of privatisation and some relevant examples were quoted. Since then, by pure coincidence, I have received a parliamentary reply, the contents of which I shall share briefly with the House. In preparation for the latest phase in the disposal of the family silver—Railtrack—I thought it would be a good idea to find out how much debt has been written off by the Government for each privatisation since 1979. I got the answer today. It is extraordinary.

Since 1979, £22.5 billion of debt has been written off by the Government to facilitate privatisation. We mentioned British Airways earlier. At today's prices, £347 million of debt was written off as a sweetener for the privatisation of British Airways. Frankly, if any business suddenly had £347 million of debt written off, it would find it an awful lot easier to make a profit—because it would not have to service the debt—than it did before the debt was cancelled.

It is quite a revelation to find that this Government, who plead parsimony on every other count, have written off a staggering £22.5488 billion in debt owed to the public purse to facilitate their privatisation programme. I wonder how much more debt will be written off to facilitate Railtrack's privatisation. If Conservative Members who have spoken today get their way, how much more will be written off to facilitate the privatisation of London Underground? Fortunately that will not happen because it cannot be done before the general election.

We often hear the great Tory masters and mistresses of finance talking about prudence with the public purse, and about how there is never enough money to spend on anything worth while, yet they are quite prepared to write off £22.5 billion of taxpayers' money to fulfil their political aim of privatisations that enrich those who have invested, but certainly not taxpayers. That is an extraordinary commentary on the values of the Government.

This has been an interesting debate which, although lighthearted at times, has had a serious purpose. It has given us the chance to discuss the underground system, and there have been knowledgeable speeches from hon. Members familiar with the subject. Of course one way of getting more money into the system is through the fare box. I know it is not fashionable nowadays to do so, but I want to pay tribute to the way the Greater London council operated public transport in London. At least some of its legacy survives, to the great benefit of the underground system.

In 1981, fares on the underground had reached their highest point in history. Owing to the introduction of the Fares Fair scheme, patronage of the underground soared to new heights. [Interruption.] If any Conservative Member wants to intervene and has the courage of his convictions, he can easily be accommodated.

Mr. Tim Smith: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way to me so enthusiastically. Holding fares down artificially meant that the taxpayers of London had to foot the bill for rich tourists—that was my point.

Mr. Wilson: Reasonably priced public transport certainly attracts tourists, just as it attracts me. The Tories are ideologically blind; they never can recognise that there is a balance to be struck. Lower fares lead to greater use. Of course there is a point below which fares cannot be taken, but if they are too high, people are driven away from the service. Once the Government of the day—unfortunately they are still the Government—stepped in and forced the abolition of the Fares Fair scheme, patronage of the underground fell to its lowest level since the dark days of war in 1943. The underground has had to recover from that low point ever since.

The hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) said, in her Madam Bountiful way, that the needy are already assisted by means of concessionary schemes. It is worth remembering that those schemes are paid for by the London boroughs—that is their political decision. They have had the political courage to do that because such a socially equalising charge makes it possible for people of various categories and income groups to use the underground system.

Even the existence of the travelcard is a legacy from the days of the GLC—and the Government cannot get rid of them, as part of their drive towards rail privatisation, because it would be so politically unpopular. The Tory idea running through these debates—that everything in the public sector is bad—is both bankrupt in terms of truth and dogmatically unreasonable. The electorate increasingly realise that. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith)—a good example of what I am talking about—cannot wait for the Chiltern line to be privatised. We heard a rant about the disastrous record of British Rail in the public sector. The Chiltern line attracts a great deal of interest in the private sector, unlike most British Rail franchises, because public investment has made it a first-class railway service that is run in the social interest. It is operated so that it can make a contribution to the overall finances of the railway.

If the Chiltern line, which has the potential to be profitable, is removed from the system and is converted into a profitable railway in the interests of private shareholders, that will be to the financial disadvantage of the rest of the network, much of which will still be in the public sector.

That is typical of the Government's approach to the public sector. It is all right, apparently, if the public sector provides moneys and creates assets. That having been done, the Government move in, write off the debt, sell the assets cheap and let the private sector milk the profits that have come from public sector finance.

I have referred to books that set out the history of the London underground system. I should explain that I am a great admirer of enterprise. Where would we be without the Victorians? The Victorians built the underground system, built the railways and created many wonderful public assets, which we still enjoy. Enterprise is a wonderful thing, as is vision. It is sad, however, that the Tories have diluted enterprise to the point at which they believe that it consists of stealing public assets and securing profits the taxpayer paid to create. That is the Tories' idea of enterprise.

Mr. Smith rose—

Mr. Wilson: I note that the hon. Gentleman wishes to intervene.

If someone has paid for something and another person takes it away without paying, what is a better word for that than stealing? It seems not to be an unreasonable word in the circumstances. It is surely not a moral transaction to take the Chiltern line, for example, it having been paid for by the taxpayer, and convert it so as to make private profit, without any recompense to the taxpayer. If that is set as an example of enterprise against what genuine entrepreneurs did, what a pathetic bunch the Tories are today. The sadness and the tragedy for the United Kingdom is that a Government who have been in office for 17 years cannot appreciate what constitutes enterprise.

The Government have had it so easy for so long. There have been public assets to rip off for so long. It is only when the well runs dry that, it is to be hoped, someone will get round to the idea that part of the role of politicians is to stimulate and engender genuine enterprise to ensure that there is investment, rather than to take assets created by entrepreneurs in the public sector and dress them up with a self-congratulatory term such as private enterprise.

Mr. Smith: If the hon. Gentleman is so keen on public ownership, will he tell us how Railtrack would be taken back into public ownership by Labour?

Mr. Wilson: All will be revealed in due course. The hon. Gentleman is obviously in the know. Will he tell me whether there will be a golden share? Is there to be a sale of 51 per cent. or 100 per cent.? Perhaps he will tell me if it will be possible to sell Railtrack at all. After all, it is clearly a high-risk investment in every sense of that term.

[Mr. Wilson]

I return to London Underground. We shall not vote against the Bill. Instead, we shall vote for the Opposition amendment, which is on the Order Paper to demonstrate our support for the public-private concept, on which we have led the way and with which we find no ideological difficulty. We are talking all the time to those with whom we shall work to make public-private partnership projects come to fruition. Indeed, that is not an issue of division within the House because, to some extent, the Tories have caught up with us.

How can Tory Members be satisfied with the Government's record? Throughout London, lawyers' offices are full of documents—they are piled to the ceiling—setting out public-private partnership projects that have never come within 100 miles of being fulfilled because of the terms that the Government have set. Lawyers who work on such projects tell us what they think of the Tories and their version of the private finance initiative: they will speak of the frustration that is caused by negotiating endlessly on projects that never come about. They do not believe that the present Government have any commitment to the PFI. Unless it can satisfy their ideology by transferring all the risk—including the operational risk—to the private sector, the Government are not interested.

Throughout the genuinely entrepreneurial sphere, there is a real thirst for a Labour Government who will work with the private sector to make public-private partnership projects work to the benefit of the national infrastructure, and specifically to the benefit of London Underground.

9.45 pm

Mr. Norris: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is with a considerable sense of relief that I utter the immortal words, "This has been an interesting debate." We heard excellent speeches from my hon. Friends the Members for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman), for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), for Croydon, North-East (Mr. Congdon), for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), for Brentford and Isleworth (Mr. Deva), for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) and for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), and from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier). We also heard extremely interesting speeches from my good friend the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) and from the hon. Members for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey), for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) and for Newham, North-East (Mr. Timms)—and, of course, from the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson). Many of them made extremely kind personal remarks—albeit with a faint whiff of those old-fashioned obituaries that I fear I shall have to accustom myself to in the House.

I am delighted to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet is present. He is a long-term supporter of London Transport. He made a germane point about Northern line trains: he said that it was extremely desirable for us to secure the new trains through the private finance initiative, at a gross contract cost of about £400 million, but expressed regret that they might not be delivered as quickly as we might have liked. I am advised that GEC Alsthom, which won the contract—

Ms Short: In Birmingham.

Mr. Norris: Indeed. I understand that GEC Alsthom is currently suffering from a delay in production. One of the key features of the contract that we have been able to negotiate with GEC Alsthom is that the delay will not simply result in further delay for London's taxpayers and passengers; GEC will have to pay a penalty to London taxpayers, in the form of a rebate of part of the price of the contract, in recognition of the fact that it was not prepared to start the contract on time.

I cast no aspersions in relation to possible reasons for the delay. No doubt there are perfectly good reasons for it. I merely make the point that it underlines the cardinal advantage of transferring that part of the risk to the private sector. For the first time, the contractor has a real stimulus to ensure that what is promised is delivered when it is asked for.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh was kind enough to refer to my election to the companionship of the Institution of Civil Engineers. I promised myself that I would get that into Hansard at least once before my retirement; I have done it now, so I can retire tonight a happy man. It was extremely kind of the hon. Gentleman to bother to mention it, and I was greatly honoured to receive it.

More to the point, I understood the hon. Gentleman's analysis and his points about a strategic London authority. I hope that he will accept that the creation in 1992 of a specific post in the Department of Transport to take a multi-modal overview of transport in the capital has been of value to London. The hon. Gentleman is right that it is impossible to consider these issues in a disaggregated way. We must have an integrated view of how services in the capital operate, but such a view does not imply that all services need be under one control or ownership. That is the wrong sort of integration. It leads to a sclerotic view of transport provision and to the sort of provision that for many years handicapped the development of the public transport service not only in London, but outside the capital.

I issue a word of caution to the hon. Gentleman. If he is saying, on behalf of his party, that he will fund crossrail, Thameslink 2000 and all the other expensive projects to which he referred, I should like him to say so and the House to be able to cost such a commitment. He asked me a simple question: does the Bill facilitate privatisation? I hope that, listening to the argument throughout the long debate, he has been convinced that the answer on that straightforward point is of course no.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North made the discreditable suggestion that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough might not be worth the fees that he is privileged to charge to his occasional clients. In an emergency, I would certainly turn to any hon. and learned Member who, with Madam Speaker herself in the Chair, could introduce the Market Harborough bypass and the channel tunnel rail link into a debate on London Regional Transport. He gave a brilliant exposition, stretching my credulity only when he asserted that he was too young to have known my noble Friend Lord Parkinson because that cannot conceivably have been the case.

My hon. and learned Friend touched a raw nerve in the Opposition by suggesting that the reasoned amendment might have been drafted by Mr. Jimmy Knapp rather than by the Labour party.

Ms Short: I drafted it.

Mr. Norris: If the hon. Lady says so, I accept that assertion.

My hon. and learned Friend touched on a point that is absolutely seminal to the debate. He pointed out how extraordinarily foolish it was to concentrate on who the employer of an individual might be, whatever function he was to discharge in the public service, without considering properly whether he was properly trained, qualified and equipped to do his job. That is what is important and Conservative Members have never lost sight of it because they are interested in practical solutions. It was significant that the Opposition should have drawn the distinction which led my hon. and learned Friend to make that point.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate, who represents the deepest station on the underground—192 ft down—said some kind personal words, but then lowered her normal high standards by asserting that the Evening Standard had referred to the system as the worst in the world. It was not the Evening Standard but, sadly, the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) in a petulant and intemperate outburst which was immediately contradicted by informed Members on both sides of the House.

The Healey and Baker survey of international world cities establishes the relative worth of a number of characteristics which determine the quality of life in great cities. It concludes that, among the major cities in every continent included in the survey, London had the best public transport system.

Ms Short: Better than Paris?

Mr. Norris: Better than Paris. I know that the hon. Lady has not been in her job long. I recommend that she obtain a copy of that survey, which could make extremely embarrassing reading for the Labour party, and I caution her not to make statements about the paucity of provision in London before reading that objective assessment of the quality of the system.

Mr. Wilson rose—

Mr. Norris: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue, if I may.

Ms Glenda Jackson rose—

Mr. Norris: I will give way to the hon. Lady as I am quoting her.

Ms Jackson: I am grateful to the Minister for pointing out my error. Does he agree that although the opinion did not begin in the Evening Standard, the newspaper certainly splashed it in banner headlines over that evening's edition, so it was clearly a view with which the newspaper probably agreed?

Mr. Norris: Stewart Steven, when he was editor of the Evening Standard, told me when I complained to him about the mild petulance of one of his editorials:

> "Steve, my entire readership is hanging from a strap on your system when they read my paper. If I tell them what I know to be the case, which is that it is the best system in the world, they will never believe me and, more to the point, they will never buy my paper."

I have always admired Mr. Steven—he is an excellent journalist and he was a superb editor of an always readable paper—but I let him make his headlines in his own way.

The important point is that I am determined to ensure that we base our opinions on objective evidence. I am not in the business of decrying London or its transport system because it is important to establish London not only as the finest city in the world, which it is beyond peradventure, but as the city with the best international links to and from it—that, too, was a conclusion of the survey—and the best transport links within it. That is the reality, and Labour Members would do well to remember it. They should also not be quite so free in their denigration of London. It ill behoves hon. Members, many of whom represent London seats, to degrade the reputation of what is in fact one of our greatest national assets.

I want to make a technical point. The hon. Lady mentioned pumping, and she was right: there is a huge operation on the underground which daily pumps out the millions of gallons of water which comes into the system, as it does into any subterranean structure. The hon. Lady said that because of the rising water table in London the problem is likely to become worse and then suggested that, because it would not be possible to stick an advertising hoarding down the side of such a pump, the private sector would somehow not be interested. She misses the point. There is every virtue in taking such an operation and ensuring that it is put out to public tender so that we can see whether the private sector might be able to perform that vital role on behalf of London Underground in a more efficient and less expensive way than London Transport is currently able to do. Hon. Members do not have to rely on my words, because that is exactly the attitude that London Transport takes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-East, in his interesting speech, referred to the subject of fares. I pay tribute to the former Greater London council, which was far-sighted in introducing the travelcard. My hon. Friend was right to say that that has been of lasting benefit to Londoners and I am delighted to confirm that, as ever, it remains central to our ticketing policy. I fear, however, that my hon. Friend was quite wrong in what he said about the consequences of the Fares Fair policy. I have never denigrated the ambitions of those who introduced that policy, who no doubt believed that such a policy would result in improved ridership and reduced congestion. It did the former, but not the latter. The tragedy is that the additional journeys made on the underground were by people who were not transferring from cars: they were simply additional riders.

My hon. Friend was right to say that the consequence of a great lowering of fares on the underground is that the major recipients are the millions of Londoners who already use the system. They will no doubt be grateful. However, if we are looking for an efficient use of public funds, that is not the way to go about it.

The Bill is a modest measure—a limited but important one, which while not affecting the fundamental role of London Transport will enable it more effectively to harness the talents, skills, enterprise and finance of the private sector in a way that any sensible Londoner will wish to encourage.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

PETITIONS

Tower Blocks (Southampton)

10.12 pm

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I wish to present to the House three petitions from the residents of three high-rise council blocks in Southampton. They asked me personally to bring them to the House because they feel that they are not being considered by Southampton city council and they were stunned by the council's decision not to remove asbestos from their blocks of flats but to paint over the asbestos. In the three blocks, there must be about 200 children. There are certainly nearly 400 signatures from the various families.

The danger of asbestos is well known to everyone. Therefore I ask the House—that means the Department of the Environment—to look into the matter. Southampton city council has admitted that the safety of its residents is always a prime concern, and has said that it will appoint an independent analyst in the near future. Whether that will happen or not, I do not know, but the whole structure of the housing committee and the debates that have taken place lead me to be concerned about the wishes of the tenants, who will have to remain in their accommodation while people in protective clothing go around trying to neutralise the asbestos. A threat is posed to the life of anyone who is in contact with that terrible fibre, which will obviously be in the air while the work is carried out.

The three blocks concerned are Sturminster house, Albion towers and Shirley towers, all in the city of Southampton. I well remember those blocks, because when I became chairman of the housing committee in Southampton, we decided that the construction of those blocks ought to be stopped. Unfortunately, they had been partly completed, so the work had to be finished.

The humble petition states:

That asbestos has been discovered in the structure of the buildings

That the City Council is proposing not to remove this asbestos, but only to seal it in its place;

That we fear for the health of ourselves and especially our children if this asbestos is not properly removed.

Wherefore your Petitioners humbly pray that your honourable House will take what measures lie in its power to ensure that we, and other residents of council-owned property, are given all possible protection.

I have three petitions and with your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to put them in the petition bag.

To lie upon the Table.

Royal Ordnance (Chorley)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

10.16 pm

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): It gives me great pleasure to highlight the need for an enterprise zone at Royal Ordnance, Chorley.

In the past 17 years, this Conservative Government have displayed a tremendous vision for the enterprise economy, which has shown itself in our economic performance, particularly in the past two years. Those Government policies have comprised the creation of urban development corporations and enterprise zones. They have ensured that new ideas have flourished and new enterprises have been set up around the country. We have prime examples of that success in the Metro centre in the north-east, by Newcastle, and the Merry Hill centre in the west midlands. I venture to suggest that there would have been nowhere near that investment and retail expansion in those areas without enterprise zones.

Similarly, just 20 miles from Chorley, the Central Manchester development corporation has revitalised huge areas of what was a decaying city, and the Trafford Park development corporation has done a marvellous job on a clapped-out old industrial park.

In the past two years, I have raised the need for an enterprise zone on a number of occasions—first with the Prime Minister, whose answer on 22 February was interesting. On that occasion, I said that I welcomed the latest plans for enterprise zones to be established in areas where coal mining was running down and labour opportunities were diminishing, and I called for those zones in areas such as Chorley.

The Prime Minister recognised that enterprise zones had been successful, and said:

"In areas that face particular difficulties because of substantial job losses, perhaps because of the collapse of a single employer or industry, we look across the board to see what help can be given. Enterprise zones are an important part of that, but not necessarily the whole of it."—[Official Report, 22 February 1994; Vol. 238, c. 143.]

The basis of tonight's debate is to examine the various alternatives open for the regeneration of the Royal Ordnance site at Chorley, which has suffered massive job losses.

The owner of the site, Royal Ordnance, is a wholly owned subsidiary of British Aerospace, which is a first-class employer in the defence industry throughout the north-west and the rest of the country.

The whole 900-acre site is contaminated by munitions. It was used for the filling of shells and all sorts of bombs and other ammunition for many years. Three quarters of the site is in Chorley borough council and one quarter in South Ribble borough council. I welcome the presence of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins), who wants to add a few comments at the end of my speech.

The site has always had direct rail access. It is directly between the M6 and M61 motorways, so, while it needs decontamination and much infrastructure, it is a strategic site that would have first-class communications.

Since the war, when there were 30,000 munitions workers on the site, there has been a dramatic fall in the amount of labour employed. It was down to 6,000 or 7,000 about 20 years ago, and there are now only 100 production workers. We have the headquarters of Royal Ordnance, and I welcome the fact that there are 350 white-collar workers on the site. They are located on the southern perimeter, on one of the roads.

Enterprise zones have been designated in the past few years in Nottinghamshire, Yorkshire and Durham. I am anxious, because of the peace dividend and the rundown of defence jobs, to fight the cause for enterprise zones in areas that have suffered from the dramatic fall in the number of defence jobs. That affects not only Chorley and the north-west but the whole country.

The advantages of enterprise zones are tremendous. There is a 10-year period without business rates and 100 per cent. capital allowance for people investing in the area; and they are basically planning-free zones, unless the use of toxic chemicals is involved. People generally have a free hand.

The sort of development that I, Royal Ordnance and my right hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble would like would involve mixed uses. We want a reasonable amount of residential development, but of the right sort—for buyers from our area, not for incomers. We want a business park that would include manufacturing, light industry and offices. It would have some retail content, but the main aim is not a retail investment such as the Metro Centre or Merry Hill.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Minister for Small Business, Industry and Energy has played a part in ensuring that we get Konver funding from Europe. That ensures that we can change from defence manufacture towards civil production, and get a commercial business centre started. So far, it has been only small fry. That is why we need the massive injection that we would get from an enterprise zone.

What are the alternatives to an enterprise zone? In our area, unemployment is below 5 per cent., and we have no chance of getting assisted area status. We would need an unemployment rate of 15 or 18 per cent. or even higher. I welcome the fact that we do not have that. I like to think that much of that results from my efforts and those of other Conservative Members in the area, who have kept unemployment in Lancashire lower than in the rest of the region or the nation.

We have put in single regeneration budget bids in the first two rounds. The Government office in Manchester gave us a no-no in each case. I am not hopeful about rounds three and four, and there will be less money available in the rounds to come.

English Partnerships has been helpful, but it has been charged with redeveloping brown-field sites throughout the United Kingdom. It has a massive task, which will need not hundreds of millions, but billions, of pounds to redevelop all available sites. It is spoilt for choice, but it has been very helpful. Some investigations are going on at the moment, and I applaud it for playing its part. Frankly, this site will not be developed for decades unless we have a designated enterprise zone.

I have already paid tribute to Trafford Park and Central Manchester. They have done wonders in the north-west. Royal Ordnance has put in for planning permission on a mixed-use basis, and it hopes that the two local authorities will play their part so that it can do full viability studies. I am not hopeful that we can see our way ahead.

Two years ago, I led a deputation from the two local authorities to meet the then Minister, who is now my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. He made constructive comments, but said two things. First, he said that it was not necessarily the right way ahead, and that we must examine all possible alternatives. The Minister had been advised by his civil servants that there was little or no chance of securing European Union approval.

Following the deputation, on 18 April my right hon. Friend wrote a letter in which he said:

"I promised to write to clarify the European Union position regarding the designation of Enterprise Zones. My officials have spoken with our representative in Brussels (UKREP) who confirm that the Commission's position remains that Enterprise Zones are extremely unlikely to be approved if located outside Assisted Areas. Of course, under the Treaty of Rome, the UK is able to notify the Commission of a proposal to designate a zone outside an Assisted Area, but the unambiguous advice from Brussels is that the Commission will reject any such proposal".

We have only to look at the events of the past week to see that the Commission always wants its own way.

My right hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble and I are here this evening to champion the cause of an enterprise zone. Article 92, section 3 of the treaty of Rome, under the heading "Aids Granted by States", says:

"The following may be considered to be compatible with the common market:

(b) aid to promote the execution of an important project of common European interest or to remedy a serious disturbance in the economy of a Member State".

That article could be applied to defence industries, not only in this country but in other member states. A submission could be made, and the European Union would then make a decision—and I would fight it all the way.

I ask that Royal Ordnance, as the landowner, and the two local authorities, which support the concept of an enterprise zone, be allowed to fill in the necessary forms and make out their case. We could then examine that and other alternatives to see what may be done.

I raised the matter in the Environment Select Committee hearing of 19 July 1995 with my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry). In answer to my query about the possibility of a designated enterprise zone within the European Union, he replied:

"There are really two aspects to this. The first is, does the European Union allow it; the answer is yes but the conditions are very severe and it takes an interminable time to deliver one . . . it is because there are a great deal of conditions to fulfil, there are activities which have got to be excluded from an enterprise zone and there are contracts which have got to be signed with umpteen people in order to deliver them. With the best will in the world, we are talking about years, not months, to get an enterprise zone from zero to operation. So that is the first answer. The second answer is there is a real issue about whether enterprise zones are the most effective answer; whether or not they do, to some extent, divert investment, while in this long period of getting it up and running whether, in fact, investment is deferred as well as distorted. So I have to tell you that my own view is that I do not say 'I never want to see another enterprise zone', but I would want to make sure I had explored every other avenue before I would say that an enterprise zone seemed to me the right route to go down."

I argue that it is the right route and that we should have the chance to bid for it. I am convinced that the process will take years, but the site has lain stagnant for 10 or 20 years, and something must be done: the blot on the landscape must be removed. I am sure that many jobs can be attracted to the area, and I look forward to being allowed to pursue the case for an enterprise zone.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) for allowing me to make a brief contribution to the debate. He has laboured long and hard—as long as he has been a Member of Parliament—to have the site's importance recognised. We had hoped that the British Aerospace takeover of Royal Ordnance would ensure the continuation of employment on the site, but that was not to be.

As my hon. Friend said, it is a substantial site, of which a small proportion is in my constituency. I have followed my hon. Friend's lead in going from pillar to post in putting the case for an enterprise zone. I was an Environment Minister when my hon. Friend led a delegation to meet Department of the Environment officials, and he understood that I was not able to be present on that occasion.

My hon. Friend the Minister will recall our travails in Committee when considering the Environment Agency legislation. We examined the problems of contaminated land and what could be done to retrieve such sites into the development cycle. This is a case in point: we are looking to attract industry to that substantial site and to create jobs.

While the South Ribble borough council and Chorley have some differences about a number of suitable sites in the area, this site could be used to create jobs and attract industry—particularly high-tech industry, which would help to recover some of the costs associated with remediating the contaminated land.

It would not be acceptable to house residents from, say, Preston on the site—as is being proposed by the county council and by others. We want to see a mixed development of industry—predominantly in a nice high-technology environment—on the site. If housing or recreational facilities could be put on the site as well, so be it. In essence, we are looking for industry and we are looking for jobs.

I ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment to do what he can to meet the concerns of my hon. Friend, who is pressing for enterprise zone status—and I have joined him in supporting the principle of wanting more industry on the site. I ask him to give an undertaking this evening to review the options and to consider what might be done in the best interests of Chorely and South Ribble. Having done that carefully, he could then advise us what can be done along the lines that we have been pressing.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Sir Paul Beresford): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) and to his right hon. assistant the Member for South Ribble (Mr. Atkins) for raising the issues surrounding the site. It is interesting and fascinating. Both my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend have been battling with this issue, with much energy, for a considerable time. I agree that we need to make every effort in this area, and in other areas like it, and use such sites productively. I applaud the point made by my right hon. Friend about the productive use of the site.

However, we have to accept that there is a scale to the task which means that it will inevitably have to have a slower track than has been followed in some other cases.

[Sir Paul Beresford]

As my hon. Friend has demonstrated, the Royal Ordnance site is complex and difficult: there are some 1,500 buildings of various types, roads, distribution areas, open spaces, test areas and dumping grounds. Hon. Members will appreciate that a site of this size—some 300 hectares: from my back of the envelope mathematics, approximately a square mile—is not only large but diverse. Therefore, there is not one single approach or means of tackling it.

I believe that an enterprise zone on such a complex site would be counter-productive—the area does not have high unemployment relative to some other areas. An enterprise zone, and an enterprise zone alone, would, to my mind, stifle investment in the area—while everyone in the industry waited to see whether it came forward, and while we tried to explain to Brussels why we should have such a site. It is quite clear from the answer that my hon. Friend has received that it is unlikely that we will obtain such permission.

In the early 1980s, a number of sites were designated as enterprise zones on an experimental basis, and they had a relatively high cost compared to some of the other methods. In December 1987, we announced that the enterprise zone scheme would not be extended unless there were exceptional circumstances—as was the case with the eight enterprise zones designated since that time. Each one was in response to a sudden major impact on industry caused by a closure of a traditional heavy industry—shipbuilding, steel making or coal mining. I concede that there is a parallel that one could make in this area from the Royal Ordnance.

This area of Chorley does not have a poor economy. In fact, it has a vibrant and wider economy—which would considerably complicate matters when we tried to get permission from Brussels. As my hon. Friend said, it has been made clear that a new enterprise zone, located outside an assisted area, would be resisted—to put it mildly.

I have, as my right hon. and hon. Friends know, asked the officials in the Department to work closely with the local authorities, and particularly with English Partnerships, to consider a range of options available for tackling the site.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley knows, English Partnerships has recognised the site's economic potential and significance. Substantial work has been done already to investigate the potential of the Royal Ordnance site, targeted specifically at prospects for its redevelopment and rejuvenation.

My right hon. and hon. Friends will be aware of the study carried out by the consultants at the end of 1994. That aimed to formulate a strategic framework for the complementary regeneration of several major brown-field sites in the area, including the Royal Ordnance site at Euxton. Its conclusion was that this was a flagship site of significant potential for a major role in the regeneration and economic growth of the region.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley may also know that, in December 1993, under the Konver I Community initiative, a grant of £446,400 was awarded to Chorley business and technology centre towards a project at the Royal Ordnance factory site. The grant covered four elements—preparatory work for a future scheme; surveys of the 60 hectares; a feasibility study for a soil bio-remediation centre; and creation of a manufacturing facility. I understand that the organisation has successfully provided workshop space on the Royal Ordnance site to assist small companies in need of new premises.

More recently, a working group has been set up to bring together the key local players, especially representatives from the two borough councils with a shared interest in the site. The site straddles the boundary between the two borough councils, Chorley and South Ribble, as has been explained. My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley will be aware of the two local plans for these, which propose a mixture of housing and employment areas and open spaces.

Based on those local plans, as they stand, the split is likely to be in the region of 10 per cent. for housing, 50 per cent. for employment and 40 per cent. for open space. That remains to be confirmed, as the local plans are still being debated, but I am sure that those provisional splits will go some way to reassuring my hon. Friend, and particularly my right hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble, that careful consideration is being given to achieving a balanced mix of uses.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley may be aware that an investigation of the site and building conditions has been undertaken in two phases, predominantly because of the size and the costs involved. The first phase, covering an area of 82 hectares, has been completed at a cost of £250,000, partially met by Konver assistance. The second phase, which is currently under way, will cost around £470,000. Again, part is to be met by Konver II, part by Royal Ordnance, and English Partnerships has agreed to contribute £118,000. That is substantial support, helping to speed up the process.

The important work is due to be completed by summer this year. English Partnerships and Royal Ordnance are in agreement that further progress is dependent on the findings and the recommendations. That is a sensible way forward. Once the site report is available, it will be possible for the various bodies involved to work out in more detail the joint approach. As I have said, there are more than 300 hectares to attack, and it is realistic to plan for phases over a number of years. There can be no quick fixes on a site as complex and as large as this.

Much is currently going on behind the scenes. Neither the private nor the public sector will invest in the site until we have a clear idea of what needs to be done to clean and clear the area. My right hon. Friend the Member for South Ribble will understand that, having piloted the Environment Act 1995 through some of its stages, predominantly its Committee stage.

I should like to suggest an alternative approach to my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley, who may wish to take it up with the local authorities. A part of the Royal Ordnance site could be designated as a simplified planning zone. That would have the effect of granting full planning permission for specified types of development, in advance of the precise development proposal being worked up. My hon. Friend may be aware that that is similar to the simplified planning procedures which operate within an enterprise zone, without all the long-drawn-out procedures.

The kinds of developments concerned, together with any conditions or limitations attached to them, are set out in the scheme which lasts for 10 years once adopted.

Developers are able to act in the knowledge that development specified in the scheme will be permitted, so they can go ahead without needing to go through the performance of a planning application. That removes one of the more bureaucratic drags on development that some local authorities impose.

To conclude, I must say that I am very impressed by the painstaking approach taken towards the planned development of the Royal Ordnance factory site. My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley will agree that our resources need to be used wisely, and that we need to ensure that we obtain the outcome we wish to see, and that we get a clean and attractive site as promptly as reasonably possible. That is why I think that the procedure we are adopting now is preferable to the long-drawn-out, somewhat hazardous approach of an enterprise zone, which my hon. Friend has suggested.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

CITY OF WESTMINSTER BILL [Lords]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the Promoters of the City of Westminster Bill [Lords] may, notwithstanding anything in the Standing Orders or practice of this House, proceed with the Bill in the present Session; and the Petition for the Bill shall be deemed to have been deposited and all Standing Orders applicable thereto shall be deemed to have been complied with;

That if the Bill is brought from the Lords in the present Session, the Agents for the Bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration signed by them stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill which was brought from the Lords in the last Session;

That, as soon as a certificate by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office, that such a declaration has been so deposited, has been laid upon the Table of the House, the Bill shall be read the first and second time and committed (and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read and committed) and shall be committed to the Chairman of Ways and Means, who shall make such Amendments thereto as were made by him in the last Session, and shall report the Bill as amended to the House forthwith, and the Bill, so amended, shall be ordered to lie upon the Table;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during any previous Session.

Hon. Members: Object.

To be considered again upon Wednesday 20 March at Seven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Magazines (Teenage Girls)

1. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what meetings he has held with the publishers of magazines for teenage girls to discuss a code of conduct for their publications; and if he will make a statement. [18982]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Tom Sackville): I recently met representatives of magazine publishers and retailers to discuss the widely expressed concerns about the suitability for young people of the material contained in some magazines for teenage girls.

The publishers and retailers agreed to set up a working party which would draw up guidelines to deal with this problem. I look forward to receiving its proposals.

Mr. Luff: On a day when the innocence of childhood is inevitably at the forefront of all our minds, may I thank my hon. Friend sincerely for the robust and tough position that he has taken in discussions with the publishers? May I urge him to continue in that vein? Does he agree that their claims merely to be offering information to young teenage girls are, at best, disingenuous, and that in reality they are using sex to boost sales?

Mr. Sackville: I thank my hon. Friend for what he said. The more that I have learnt about the subject since he introduced the Periodicals (Protection of Children) Bill, the more I have realised that, whatever agony aunts and others may say, the material in question is not merely a sex education service. Sex is being used to make money, unfortunately in this instance at the expense of the innocence of children and young people. I think that my hon. Friend did us all a service in introducing his Bill and highlighting another area in which standards of public decency and morality are falling.

Fire Service

2. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he plans to take to ensure that the fire service is adequately resourced. [18983]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): The financial provision for fire brigades is decided by fire authorities. They are obliged to set budgets which will enable them to comply with their statutory duties under the Fire Services Act 1947. Total finance available to local authorities for 1996-97 will increase by 3.3 per cent. over 1995-96.

Mr. Canavan: Is the Home Secretary aware that the Chief Fire Officers Association has taken the unprecedented step of writing to all Members complaining about a shortfall of over £80 million between the current expenditure of the fire service and the formal allocations as expressed in the revenue support grant? The Fire Brigades Union has consequently warned of a crisis whereby the fire brigades will be unable to meet their statutory minimum standards of firefighting, rescue and other emergency services. Will the Government intervene to ensure that the fire service is given adequate resources, bearing it in mind that Government negligence could be putting lives at risk?

Mr. Howard: The 3.3 per cent. increase in finance that will be available to local authorities in the next financial year is clearly sufficient to enable proper provision to be made for fire authorities and for the fire service. The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that the Audit Commission, in its report on the fire service, found that savings of up to £67 million a year—that is 5 per cent. of total expenditure on the service—could be saved if efficiency improvements were made.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: I recognise the increased funding to the fire services and the fact that there could be increased efficiency, but will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that there is a resourcing problem, based on the cost of future pension provision? The structure needs to be examined to ensure that more and more finance will go directly to help fighting fires rather than to paying for pensions. Will my right hon. and learned Friend consider that and return to the House with his response?

Mr. Howard: We have indeed considered that. It was as a consequence of the requirement to fund pensions that special extra provision was made for the financing of pensions in this year's settlement. Cheshire county council has a 3.1 per cent. increase in its overall budget in 1996-97 as compared to 1995-96, and I believe that that enables it to make provision for funding its fire service.

Nationality Legislation

3. Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to amend nationality legislation to allow the transmission of citizenship to the grandchildren of British citizens; and if he will make a statement. [18984]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): None. We remain of the view that, as a general rule, British citizenship should not be transmitted beyond the first generation born abroad.

Mr. MacShane: I am disappointed by that response. I am raising this issue on behalf of the many hundreds of thousands, if not now millions, of British citizens who work and live overseas. If they have children, those children are British, but if they, in turn, live abroad and have children, nationality will not be transmitted to the grandchildren of the first generation, save by grace and favour on the part of the Home Secretary. That situation is causing real concern. We have asylum problems, and there does have to be a cut-off, but the grandchildren of British citizens should be allowed to remain British.

Mr. Kirkhope: The position—as it was deemed right by the House in the 1970s, and supported by the Labour party in its Green Paper—is that citizenship should be a mixture of rights and duties, that there should be some commitment on the part of those who seek to acquire it and that there must be some concern and interest with the country of their choice. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I am not able to give him the assurances that he is seeking, but, as he knows, there are certain exceptions to the rule. If he has an individual case that he would like me to consider, I should be pleased to do so.

Sir Donald Thompson: None the less, will my hon. Friend ensure that people who work abroad are made aware of the position? My first grandson was born this week. His mother went to considerable trouble to come home from Spain to ensure that he was born here so that a problem would not arise when his—Edward Thompson's—children come to be born, perhaps somewhere else in the world. It is incumbent on us to ensure that British people working abroad should go to as much trouble as necessary to come here to have their children.

Mr. Kirkhope: I fully accept what my hon. Friend says. Certainly in his own family's case, the necessary actions were taken to ensure that citizenship would pass to the children. We look sympathetically at cases involving people who work—particularly in the interests of this country—abroad.

Doncaster and Buckley Hall Prisons

4. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on LEK Partnership's conclusions in respect of HMP Doncaster and HMP Buckley Hall and their public comparator group. [18985]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Miss Ann Widdecombe): The study by LEK evaluated the costs of private sector prisons with the most nearly comparable public sector prisons on 1993-94 data. The results showed that the cost per place was 21 per cent. lower for Doncaster and 26 per cent. lower for Buckley Hall than for comparable public sector prisons. The Prison Service has commissioned Coopers and Lybrand to update the study using 1994-95 data. I expect to have the findings by the end of this month.

Mr. Loyden: Does the Minister acknowledge, on the evidence that has been provided by her Department, that private prison costs—per year, per prisoner—are £200 more than costs for Prison Service accommodation? When will she realise that she should scrap the privatisation of prisons and return to the use of state prisons?

Miss Widdecombe: Let me try to help the hon. Gentleman out of his confusion. He is quite wrong in the interpretation that he has given to the House. The costs that he quotes for public sector prisons do not take account of significant costs that the Prison Service meets centrally, such as clothing, equipment, materials, uniforms and training. Furthermore, those figures, which were based on 1994-95 data, do not take account of the high start-up costs in the private sector.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is very strange that when private prisons, on a like-for-like basis, are cheaper and private escort agencies are very much cheaper than the service that is provided by the state, the Labour party still wants to have everything done by the state rather than by the private sector? May we have an assurance that the new prisons referred to by my right hon. and learned Friend a few weeks ago will be provided by the private sector and not by the state sector?

Miss Widdecombe: I can indeed confirm that the prisons that my right hon. and learned Friend announced will be financed through the private finance initiative. My hon. Friend is right to say that it is extraordinary that, when all the advantages lie with the private sector, the Opposition still say on ideological grounds that privatisation is not working. Privatisation was found to work by many studies and was recommended by General Learmont when he conducted his studies. People who have been to Blakenhurst, including Lord Longford, have praised that prison. There is uniform recognition that such prisons have added to the richness of prison life and are doing a good job at a decent cost—

Mr. Straw: Regimes.

Miss Widdecombe: Yes, regimes are part of the richness of prison life. The shadow Home Secretary clearly thinks it is funny when we talk about constructive activity. He thinks that education and work for prisoners is funny. That shows how serious the Opposition are about anything at all.

Ms Lynne: Is the Minister aware that there has been a catalogue of errors and blunders at Buckley Hall prison in Rochdale? It seems to have a far worse record than other category C prisons. For example, 10 prisoners have not returned from authorised leave, and one ex-inmate described it as a time-bomb ticking away. Will the Minister instigate a full inquiry into the running of Buckley Hall by Group 4?

Miss Widdecombe: Buckley Hall performs well in a number of spheres and should be praised for that, but the hon. Lady is right to draw attention to particular concerns that have been expressed, and that the Prison Service is now investigating.

Mr. George Howarth: I shall take this slowly, so that we all understand. Will the Minister confirm that she has argued, on previous occasions and again today, that the 13.3 per cent. cuts proposed in the Prison Service over the next three years can be made from savings resulting from privatisation? Indeed, the Home Secretary has argued the same case. Will the Minister now admit that the truth, which has been confirmed in parliamentary answers from her Department via the Prison Service, is that, when like is compared with like, it costs £200 a year more to keep a prisoner in a privatised prison? Will she admit that what she said previously and her earlier answer today are wrong, and will she now tell the House how she is going to make 13.3 per cent. cuts over the next three years when all the evidence is that privatised prisons are a dearer option?

Miss Widdecombe: First, we have never said that all those savings will come from the private sector alone. We expect efficiency savings to be made across the Prison Service as a whole. Secondly, the hon. Gentleman spoke very slowly, but I think that he was waiting for his own understanding to catch up with him. I made it abundantly clear in my answer to the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Mr. Loyden) that the particular figures that he quoted were not strictly comparable precisely because there are costs taken into account in one which are not taken into account in the other.

Police (New Technology)

6. Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how he intends to fund developments in new technology to free police officers from paperwork and administrative duties. [18987]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): The development of new technology for the police service is one of my highest priorities and resources are being provided accordingly. The private finance initiative has a major part to play in bringing forward new systems which will streamline the administrative burden on the police.

Mr. Tipping: Is this not a Government who have piled one lot of paperwork on top of another through successive Criminal Justice Acts? Is this not a Government who have cut the number of police officers by 186 between September 1992 and March 1995? Is this not a Government who plan to cut capital expenditure next year by £23 million? Are those not prime examples of the Government saying one thing but doing another?

Mr. Maclean: That was a prime example of an hon. Member being handed a question which he did not understand and reading it out verbatim. If he bothers to look at the facts, he will find that we are revolutionising police work by new systems—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] If the hon. Gentleman bothers to look at the facts, he will see that we are revolutionising police work by the introduction of the new national automated fingerprint identification system, NAFIS, costing £100 million; of the Phoenix police national computer, also at enormous cost; and of the new digital radio systems for the police, on which development work is proceeding apace, which will cost about £500 million. All in all, we have spent £750 million on police technology during the past five years and we expect to spend the same during the next five years.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on that detailed and helpful response to the original question. Does he accept that closed circuit television is also a new technology, the installation of which in town centres can be of immense benefit to the police in reducing and deterring crime? Will my right hon. Friend consider sympathetically an application that is shortly to be submitted to his Department by Macclesfield borough council and the Cheshire constabulary for the installation of closed circuit television in Macclesfield, a development that is widely supported by retailers, local people and their Member of Parliament?

Mr. Maclean: The people of Macclesfield have no better advocate for their CCTV system than my hon. Friend. We are not just sympathetic to CCTV technology; we have positively encouraged it, with the £5 million of taxpayers' money that we put into the scheme last year and the £15 million that we are putting into it this year. With the future promises of expenditure on CCTV, we believe that we can have a further 10,000 CCTV cameras around Britain.

Mr. Winterton: And in Macclesfield?

Mr. Maclean: We shall consider carefully all applications, including that from Macclesfield, and the hundreds of others that I expect to receive.

Immigration

7. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date he received from the Foreign Secretary his decision supporting India as a candidate for designation as a country where there is in general no serious risk of persecution. [18988]

Miss Widdecombe: It is not the practice to disclose ministerial correspondence between Departments, but I can confirm that the proposal to designate India and the other six countries, to which my right hon. and learned Friend referred on Second Reading of the Asylum and Immigration Bill, represents the joint view of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Madden: Is it not extraordinary that the Government are so reluctant to reveal when the Foreign Secretary confirmed that India was to be a candidate for designation and that the Home Office and the Foreign Office have still not published the information on which that decision has been taken? Bearing in mind the reports of Amnesty International and Asia Watch that systematic and serious human rights violations are taking place in virtually every state in the Indian union, a popular insurrection has been under way in Kashmir since 1990 and serious human rights violations take place on an almost daily basis in Punjab, is that not an extraordinary scenario, in which neither the Home Secretary nor the Foreign Secretary can say that this is a country where there is no general risk of persecution?

Miss Widdecombe: It has never been the case that where a country is declared to be generally safe, we say that there is therefore no risk whatever to any individual within that country. We have made it clear, and I should like to make it clear again, that individual applications for asylum will be treated on their merits and that it will not be the case that, just because an applicant comes from a designated country, the application will therefore be refused in every circumstance. Even at the moment, from those countries from which we refuse a high percentage of applications—98 to 99 per cent.—a small number still get through. We would not expect that position to change.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Will my hon. Friend confirm that, while those who have a good case for asylum—even though their country is on the designated list—will be received into Britain as, rightly, they always have been, many of my constituents with ties and family in India will greatly resent the inference of the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) that India is not a friendly, democratic country and one with which we should have good relations?

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and I can only echo what he said. The designated list is designed to enable us to deal with countries that produce a large number of applications, of which a large percentage are found to be without foundation, and which are generally recognised as safe. That does not—I say this again because I do not want any misunderstanding on this point—negate the individual claimant's right to have his or her claim fully and properly considered.

Mr. Khabra: I fully understand the concerns, rattlings and prejudice of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) about the Indian situation. Does the Minister agree that Pakistan's treatment of minorities is worse—the country that my hon. Friend blindly supports?

Miss Widdecombe: I can only repeat that if individuals from Pakistan, India or any other country on the list can make a case that shows that they individually have a well-founded fear of persecution, they will be looked after according to our time-honoured tradition of being a haven.

Crime Prevention Initiatives

8. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department is taking to improve the co-ordination and promotion of crime prevention initiatives. [18989]

Mr. Maclean: A new Crime Prevention Agency has been set up to promote the co-ordination of crime prevention strategy and the effective delivery of crime prevention initiatives on the ground where it really matters.

Mr. Bellingham: Does the Minister agree that, although it is essential that no effort is spared in catching and bringing criminals to justice, crime prevention is still very important? Is he aware that in King's Lynn a comprehensive CCTV scheme is now in place and that it has already had a remarkable impact in reducing crime? Will he join me in paying tribute to the borough council, the police and local business men who got the scheme off the ground? Further to the characteristically robust question that was asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), I suggest that he contacts the borough council in King's Lynn to find out how it is done.

Mr. Maclean: The last suggestion of my hon. Friend might be rather dangerous. Our hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) does not need to do that; he can get the Home Office guide, which we have helpfully produced so that all who wish to install CCTV can see how it is done. I believe that it quotes the example of King's Lynn, which is famous for its success in CCTV. Of course, CCTV is not only in King's Lynn but in Fakenham, Norwich, Breckland and the Breckland five towns of Thetford, Dereham, Attleborough, Swaffham and Watton.

We are not pushing ahead with just CCTV. Crime prevention is crucial. The Crime Prevention Agency is pushing ahead with initiatives on secured car parks and initiatives to reduce car crime, lorry theft and theft of heavy plant and equipment, and is looking at all aspects of technology in the fight against crime.

Mr. Cohen: Is it not time to tighten up with stringent mental health and suitability checks before any application for a gun licence is approved?

Mr. Maclean: We should first wait to find out the full facts before any hon. Member jumps to conclusions about what the solutions may be in future. All I can say, judging by the information that I have had so far—we should await the statement of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland today—and having looked at the recommendations of the Firearms Consultative Committee, is that I have not seen anything that could have prevented yesterday's tragedy. All of us, as legislators and politicians, should be humble enough to accept that some things may be beyond our ability to solve or control.

Dame Jill Knight: May I suggest to my right hon. Friend that on top of all the very important initiatives that have already been placed on record by the Home Secretary, it is also important to have one more try with the BBC, with those who produce films and videos and, in particular, those who license them, because there seems no doubt that they have a copy-cat effect in many cases? May I suggest to my right hon. Friend that the film "Natural Born Killers" should not just be temporarily placed back but be put in the waste bin for ever?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend has made a characteristically correct point, which the House should consider carefully. Comment overnight has tended to focus on weapons and their availability and use, but perhaps we should also look at the beginning of the cycle, and ask what makes someone want to commit such an act in the first place. I have read in history books that many people returned from the first and second world wars with a lot of weapons, but only in the past 20 years, during which films and television have shown violence of this nature, have such incidents taken place.

Again, however, it may be dangerous for us to speculate in that way until the facts have been fully established. For the moment, I prefer to console the bereaved, and to offer them our sincere condolences, and our prayer that they may one day discover peace.

Causes of Crime (Research)

9. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent research his Department has evaluated on the correlation between social and economic conditions and crime. [18990]

Mr. Howard: A wide range of Government and independent studies on that subject have been evaluated by my Department, including recently published Home Office research by Graham and Bowling into why some young people commit crime.

Mr. Prentice: Is there not a close and direct correlation between unemployment, especially youth unemployment, and crime, notably violent crime—a correlation that Conservative Members have consistently denied? If I am wrong about that, will the Home Secretary tell me why this year, for the first time, the police grant includes an element that specifically addresses youth unemployment?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken: research has not uncovered any link between unemployment levels and crime. However, this is one of the most arid arguments that it is possible to have. We recognise that unemployment is a social evil, whether or not it causes crime, and we pursue policies that bring unemployment down. The Labour party pursues policies—such as the introduction of the social chapter and the minimum wage—that increase unemployment. That can be seen from the figure for youth unemployment in France, of 27.7 per cent., and that for Spain, of 38.2 per cent., which is double the figure in this country.

Mrs. Peacock: Is it not outrageous that many people suggest that all those who are unemployed, and all those on low incomes, become criminals? That is an insult to the many law-abiding citizens who are unemployed, often through no fault of their own. Unemployed people should not all be put in the same category.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The vast majority of unemployed people are law-abiding citizens, and it casts a slur on them to suggest that unemployment is in any sense an excuse for crime.

Mr. Straw: While nothing could or should excuse the commission of crime, does the Home Secretary agree that high unemployment levels, especially among young people, contribute considerably to increasing the number of people who are tempted into a criminal life? Was not Lord Whitelaw—another Conservative Home Secretary—entirely correct when he said exactly that?

Mr. Howard: The question originally put by the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) was about research. Research has not uncovered any link between unemployment and crime—particularly violent crime, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I repeat: if the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is so keen to reduce unemployment, why does he not persuade his party to abandon its policies on the social chapter and the minimum wage—and, indeed, the policies that would consign 16 to 18-year-olds straight from school to the dole queue? Unlike the Government, the hon. Gentleman's party would not make training compulsory for 16 to 18-year-olds, and would encourage them to become unemployed.

Mr. Brazier: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, during the 1930s, when more than 20 per cent. of the work force was unemployed, crime was at almost its lowest ever point? In the context of his last answer, will he join me in congratulating Kent training and enterprise council on its current remarkable programme under which several hundred youngsters from the worst and most difficult conditions, many of them with criminal records, are given work experience courses to prepare them for training? It includes, where necessary, physically getting them out of bed in the morning.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is entirely right to draw attention to the levels of unemployment and crime in the 1930s. I am happy to join him in endorsing the excellent work that is being carried out by Kent training and enterprise council.

Mr. Alton: Where there are sink estates and deprived social conditions, does the Secretary of State agree—to return to the point made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight)—that the constant flow of violence via television and video contributes to the culture of violence?

As the House is soon to consider a broadcasting Bill, will the right hon. and learned Gentleman give parents the chance to have a V-chip inserted in their television sets so that they can sift out the violence that is being poured into their homes? What does he propose to do about James Ferman's decision—and that of the British Board of Film Classification—to license for home viewing, and therefore for access by children, a film as outrageous as the one to which the hon. Member for Edgbaston referred—"Natural Born Killers"—which glorifies violence, the killing, maiming or brutalising of 50 people and the amoral consequence of no one being held to account at the end of the film? People drive off into the sunset as if the matter were entirely neutral.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman knows that I have a great deal of sympathy for the general view with which he began his question. I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage is considering making the chip to which the hon. Gentleman referred available in this country. The hon. Gentleman asked about the British Board of Film Classification. He and I co-operated on strengthening the legislation that deals with such matters. It makes greater the ease and availability of judicial review for the board's decisions, and anyone who feels aggrieved by the decision to which the hon. Gentleman referred can take that avenue.

Police Patrolling

10. Sir Michael Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the recommendations of the Audit Commission in relation to police patrolling. [18991]

Mr. Maclean: I recognise the value to the public of effective patrols by the police. I therefore welcome the report and we and the police service will look carefully at its recommendations.

Sir Michael Shersby: Does my right hon. Friend agree with the Audit Commission's conclusion that traditional beat-style policing needs to be nurtured? Does he also agree that that type of policing is highly effective in dealing with street crime and vandalism, and that that view is widely shared by the public, not least my constituents in Uxbridge?

Mr. Maclean: That view is shared by the constituents of every hon. Member. Not only do the Government agree that beat patrolling has a valid role to play and should be nurtured, but we have taken positive steps to enhance it further. It is not just the extra 15,000 officers whom we have recruited since 1979 that is proof of our nurturing of the police service, or the extra 17,000 civilians who have released more bobbies for the beat, but the commitment to 5,000 more officers specifically to enhance the visible presence on the streets which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has promised and for which we have started to give out funding.

Mr. Michael: Does the Minister accept that the importance of patrolling is that it reinforces the traditional and mutual confidence between the police and the public? Does he accept that, to allow the police to concentrate on their job and to reassure the public, it is important to create a real partnership between the police, the local authority and the local community to fight crime, as advocated by the Labour party? Will he commend the local authorities that have joined local police to adopt such an approach and stop obstructing the legislative framework that they need and which was recommended by the Government's own Morgan report?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman should get into the latter part of the 20th century. The Morgan report is so old hat these days that local authorities and police partnerships are being created all over Britain without compulsion or regulation. The hon. Gentleman must decide. He is inconsistent. He asks me to acknowledge the tremendous success of partnerships and goes on to say that we must have statutory regulation to create partnerships. It is illogical nonsense. We do not need legislation because, throughout the country, partnerships are being created by voluntary means. People come together to help the police. They know that that is in their best interests. That is our policy, and it is working.

Burglars (Custodial Sentences)

11. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of burglars are given a custodial sentence; and what is the average length of time spent in prison by such offenders. [18992]

Mr. Howard: On the basis of a recent sample, a custodial sentence is imposed on 67 per cent. of people convicted of domestic burglary in the Crown court and on 22 per cent. of people convicted in magistrates courts. Average sentence lengths were 16.8 months in the Crown court and 3.9 months in the magistrates courts. Roughly half the sentence passed is spent in prison.

Mr. Congdon: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that those figures illustrate the need for courts not only to give longer sentences, but to give exceptionally long sentences to repeat offenders? May I urge him to press on with his proposals to introduce minimum sentences for repeat offenders and to reject the views of the judiciary?

Mr. Howard: I agree with my hon. Friend that the public need greater protection from persistent burglars' activities. By and large, the sentences passed by the courts on persistent burglars are inadequate. That is why there is a strong case for the introduction of minimum mandatory sentences for such burglars.

Mr. Simpson: What is the success rate of such sentences, compared with non-custodial sentences, in deterring future criminal behaviour? When does the Home Secretary plan to come before the House with a serious programme of commitments to reparation schemes in the community? Why does he insist on withdrawing funding from preventive schemes that have a record of working?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman may be surprised to hear that the recidivism rate for people leaving prison is lower than that for people who have community sentences passed on them or who have probation orders made in respect of them. When one takes into account the fact that people sentenced to prison tend to be the most serious offenders, sentenced for the most serious offences, that is a surprising fact and not, I suspect, the answer that he thought he would receive.

Mr. Butterfill: Is not burglary a crime in respect of which there is a much higher repeat offending level? In those circumstances, is not it clear that the present sentencing level is an inadequate deterrent?

Mr. Howard: I agree with my hon. Friend that the public are especially at risk from persistent, prolific burglars. It is in relation to those persistent offenders that the case for minimum mandatory sentences is strongest.

Carl Bridgewater

12. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his oral answer of 15 February, Official Report, column 1126, when it was first disclosed that two unidentified fingerprints were found on the bicycle belonging to Carl Bridgewater; and if he will make a statement. [18993]

Mr. Kirkhope: The solicitors knew in November 1988, if not before, that there were two unidentified fingerprints. Papers disclosed by the Crown Prosecution Service on 22 December 1994 included the information that those prints were on the bicycle.

Mr. Mullin: I still do not think that the Minister is facing up to the facts. It was 16 years, not nine—although nine is long enough—before unidentified fingerprints were disclosed in the Carl Bridgewater case. Who knows? As the Minister is probably aware, today is the fifth anniversary of the release of the Birmingham Six. Many people regard the Carl Bridgewater case as a litmus test of whether we have learnt any lessons from the mistakes of the past. The progress so far has not been promising.

Mr. Kirkhope: I am sorry, but I dispute that. The hon. Gentleman must know that, following the provisional conclusions of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary that this matter should not be referred back, the solicitors for the applicants were asked to make further representations. They have done so in part and we await hearing from them as to any other representations that they wish to make before a final decision is taken.

Probation Service

13. Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact of his removal of all training requirements on the provision of an effective probation service. [18994]

Mr. Sackville: The opportunity has now been provided to establish, with the profession, a flexible training scheme designed to meet the needs of a modern probation service.

Mr. Berry: Does the Minister recognise that the lack of appropriate training puts both probation officers and the public at risk? Which professional associations support his view on this matter?

Mr. Sackville: I am very glad to tell the hon. Gentleman that my noble Friend Baroness Blatch has written to representatives of the management, of the profession and of higher education and expects to meet them shortly to establish exactly the sort of flexible training scheme that the probation service needs. The work of the probation service is much too important for these sort of party points.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Does my hon. Friend agree that the new arrangements will facilitate the right people coming into the probation service, such as those coming out of the armed forces or the police, who will do a far better job than people who are merely social workers?

Mr. Sackville: My hon. Friend is right to suggest that the disciplines required are criminology, psychology and a whole host of others, including some training in sociology. To tell highly qualified people who apply to join the service, "You are fine, but now you have to go and do two years' social work training," is not the way to get the right people into the profession.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Booth: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 March. [19012]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Booth: Will my right hon. Friend join me and others in the House in expressing our outrage and horror at the appalling deaths and killings in Dunblane yesterday?

The Prime Minister: Yesterday was an event of almost unimaginable horror. We can only begin to guess at the impact it will have upon the families and the whole community. I know that the whole House will wish to join me in extending our sympathy to the families of the children and their teacher who were killed and to the children and the other teachers who were injured in yesterday's attack. Many questions will have to be addressed and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will make a fuller statement at the end of Question Time.

Mr. Blair: May I agree with what the Prime Minister has said and simply add this: Britain today is a nation in mourning. Our senses are in a state of shock, bewildered at the sheer horror of what happened. Not war, nor a catastrophe of nature, nor human error was this, but a massacre of innocents without cause and without reason. How many parents last night will have clutched their own children to them, looking at them differently and imagining the pain which, for others, is all too real?

Politics is silent today. We grieve. We hope that this dark shadow can in time be lifted. We stand in solidarity with the community of Dunblane and we pay our respects.

The Prime Minister: Sometimes, after a tragedy, there is little we can say that we feel will bring comfort to the people concerned. After yesterday's tragedy, I believe that that is a feeling that everyone in this House will understand. Words seem inadequate; I feel that today.

The right hon. Gentleman's words will find a echo in the heart of every parent in the House and right across the country. What happened yesterday cannot be understood and must not be forgotten. It was an act of wickedness beyond imagination and I do not believe that anyone can be unmoved by that, either now or at any time in the future. What we must now do is look to the interests of the children, their families and the others who were injured and see what external help can be given—perhaps by this House, but by others as well—to try to play some part in putting that community together again.

Q2. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 March. [19013]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Evennett: In the wake of the appalling tragedy in Dunblane yesterday, will my right hon. Friend urge the media to exercise the maximum possible restraint to allow that community to grieve in private?

The Prime Minister: I certainly join my hon. Friend in that request. There is a code of practice on privacy for such occasions. I hope very much that that code of practice will be rigorously observed on this occasion.

Q3. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 March. [19014]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wigley: As someone who, before entering the House, lived in the borough of Merthyr Tydfil not far from Aberfan, may I convey the sympathy of Wales to the people of Dunblane and to all the families who have suffered loss? Does the Prime Minister accept that playing with guns can at times mean playing with lives? It should always be a certainty that neither personal indulgences nor vested interests come before assuring the safety of communities and the avoiding of tragedies such as the tragedy that happened yesterday.

The Prime Minister: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's early words will be well received everywhere. On the subject of gun control, clearly my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary will wish to consider the implications of the incident for any future changes in firearms control. There is of course a Firearms Consultative Committee that, as a statutory body, constantly keeps legislation under review. Its purpose is to review the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988. I know that it issued a statement this morning saying that it does not propose to express a view on the matter in advance of the conclusions of the fatal accident inquiry, but that it will want to consider the implications for future firearms legislation or practice.

Q4. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 March. [19015]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thompson: Speaking as a former teacher and in the aftermath of the awful tragedy yesterday, may I ask my right hon. Friend to reinforce the tributes that are rightly paid to head teachers and teachers who put the welfare and safety of their children above all else?

The Prime Minister: It is not very many weeks ago that the House and the country were mourning the death of another teacher, Mr. Lawrence, who was murdered outside his school by being stabbed to death. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has told me, both last night and this morning, of the courage of teachers at the school. I particularly single out the courage and performance of the headmaster, Mr. Taylor, who had appalling circumstances to deal with yesterday, but, I am informed, dealt with them with the greatest possible courage in every respect. I am happy to join my hon. Friend, himself a former head teacher, in that tribute.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: Dunblane is a small, close-knit community and no doubt that closeness will stand it in good stead as it grieves over the appalling slaughter of innocent children and their dedicated teacher. Will the Prime Minister convey to the people of Dunblane that their grieving is shared by the whole country; every parent in the land is grieving with them? In particular, will he convey to the people of Dunblane the horror and sadness of my constituents and Londoners across our capital city who feel today that they are part of that small, close-knit community?

The Prime Minister: I shall happily convey the hon. Lady's thoughts when I have the opportunity of visiting Dunblane tomorrow. She speaks for the attitude of every parent in the country. For a small number of parents, yesterday was a day of horror that they could never have imagined. The thought has flitted across the minds of every other parent in the country that it might have been their son or their daughter on that occasion.

Q5. Mr. Butler: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 March. [19016]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Butler: In common with many colleagues in the House, I went home last night to see my own children for exactly the reasons given by the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). I associate myself with everything that has been said. May I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on his sense of priorities, which led him to take a day out this week to attend the conference against terrorism in Egypt? Terrorism so often—and deliberately—causes the sort of grief, slaughter and horror that was caused by one evil mad man yesterday. May I urge my right hon. Friend to do all that he can to play a full part in the international war against that most evil of activities?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I think that the summit in Sharm el-Sheikh was a very useful and worthwhile occasion. It was the first time that I can recall when so many Heads of Government from different parts of the world met specifically to deal with the problems of terrorism and how to curtail and defeat it. The summit not only condemned terrorism in very strong terms but, more practically, laid the foundations for a programme of international co-operation in anti-terrorist activities. I think that everyone will welcome that.

The first meeting to follow yesterday's summit will take place within the next fortnight, and I hope that we shall see practical and worthwhile co-operation that will make the terrorist's life much more difficult than it has been hitherto. That is the determination of the Governments who met yesterday, and I look forward to seeing it carried into practice.

Q6. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 14 March. [19017]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Further to the Prime Minister's answer to a previous question, I too share the grief of the mourning families in Dunblane. Does he share my concern that journalists and other pundits have spent much time, recently, blaming Israel for its attitude to the Hamas terrorists, just as they blamed the Prime Minister for holding back the peace in Northern Ireland, when they should put responsibility on the terrorists who continue the terror?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I agree, without qualification, with everything that he has said.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the rule of law should always prevail in a democracy? On this day, above all others, as we discuss the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989, does he agree that the House should agree unanimously to the measures? Does he agree also that terrorism and violence by the gun or by the bomb should be rooted out wherever they occur?

The Prime Minister: I think that that would be the unanimous view in dealing very severely with terrorists. The Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 has proved indispensable as part of our armoury against terrorism. It is vital that its powers are continued by the House.

Mr. Norman Hogg: The Prime Minister's decision to visit Dunblane will be deeply appreciated by everyone in Scotland. Does he accept my assurance that we shall all co-operate to give the fullest support to that community in whatever action is necessary in view of this tragic and terrible event?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for those remarks. I hope that everyone will understand that I visit Dunblane as a representative of the House: it is in that spirit that I conduct my visit.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the terrible tragedy will focus the prayers of the nation on mothering Sunday this weekend? Does he agree that it would be a proper mark of respect if people observed a period of silence on Sunday to remember the children and their teacher and to pray together as a nation?

The Prime Minister: I believe that, now and up to and beyond Sunday, many people will remember the events at Dunblane. Perhaps it would be particularly appropriate if the churches were just a little more crowded on Sunday.

Sir David Steel: As one who was married in Dunblane cathedral and who therefore regards it as a place of particular happiness and serenity cruelly shattered, I support the Prime Minister's decision to visit Dunblane tomorrow on behalf of the House. I add the thanks of the House to the Secretary of State for Scotland and the shadow Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), for the way in which they represented the interests of the House yesterday to that grieving community.

Although I do not suggest that anything could have prevented the madness of yesterday, will the Prime Minister ask his relevant ministerial colleagues to look again at the report of the Firearms Consultative Committee and see whether further steps can be taken in response to its recommendations without relating it to yesterday's episode?

The Prime Minister: As to the right hon. Gentleman's second point, those matters will need to be examined, and I assure him that we shall do so with an open mind. On his first point, I echo the tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) who, together, visited Dunblane yesterday. That was appropriate, and I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he did on that occasion.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: While we contemplate this horror, is it not wonderful that the love of children has brought the House together? I pray that it will do so more often.

The Prime Minister: Sometimes our political disputes, whether they involve great or small matters, seem very petty beside human matters. I think that this is one such occasion.

Madam Speaker: I think that we will take the statement now.

Dunblane Primary School (Shooting)

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): It is with profound sadness that I have to report on the tragic event that took place at Dunblane, which is in my constituency, yesterday. Hon. Members will understand the deep shock and distress afflicting the people of Dunblane, and our first thoughts must be with the families of those who were killed and injured. Our deepest sympathies go out to them at this terrible time.

The House will appreciate that police inquiries into the matter are continuing; therefore, I shall confine my remarks to the facts surrounding the incident, so far as they have been established.

At approximately 9.15 am yesterday, an armed man, identified by the police as Thomas Hamilton, entered Dunblane primary school and opened fire on children and staff who were in the school gymnasium. Fifteen of the children who were shot and their teacher died within the school. One child died later in hospital. Three adults and 12 other children were wounded. The gunman shot himself and died within the school.

As soon as I was informed of this dreadful event, accompanied by the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), I went to Dunblane, where we were joined by my hon. Friend the Scottish Education Minister, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson). What we witnessed there encompassed both the worst and the best of which humanity is capable. In contrast to the stark evil of the crime, doctors, teachers, police, ambulance personnel and other caring professions, Church leaders and volunteers worked unsparingly to save life and console the bereaved.

In particular, I want to pay the highest possible tribute to Mr. Ron Taylor, headmaster of Dunblane primary school, for his heroic efforts to save the lives of his dying pupils in circumstances too harrowing to be recounted in detail. Hon. Members will wish to join me also in a tribute to Mrs. Gwen Mayor, the dedicated teacher who was gunned down in the midst of her charges. Mrs. Mayor was an exceptionally gifted teacher, who had given 10 years' service to the school, and our heartfelt sympathy goes out to her husband Rodney and their two daughters.

I would also like to extend the sympathy of the House to Aileen Harikl, the PE teacher, and to the teaching assistants, Mary Blake and Gwen Tweddle, who were all injured. Our teachers carry the immeasurable responsibility of moulding the character of the next generation. In this tragic case, a teacher lost her life in the course of fulfilling that responsibility.

I would also like to pay tribute to the chief constable of central Scotland, William Wilson, and his officers, to the procurator fiscal at Stirling, and to the medical teams supervised by Dr. Jack Beattie, as well as the staff in the hospitals at Stirling, Falkirk and Yorkhill, who carried out their duties superbly in the most distressing circumstances. All the public services involved deserve the praise of the House, and our recognition of the trauma that will continue to live with them.

The Lord Advocate and I believe that this terrible tragedy should be thoroughly and fully investigated. We believe that it is desirable and necessary that an inquiry should be undertaken by a Senator of the College of Justice—a senior Scottish judge. Lord Cullen, who conducted the public inquiry into the Piper Alpha disaster, has agreed to undertake that responsibility. The Lord Advocate plans to meet him and the Lord President of the Court of Session tomorrow to discuss the procedures that the inquiry should follow.

Her Majesty the Queen yesterday sent her condolences to all those affected by this unspeakable deed. The Queen and the Princess Royal have both expressed a wish to visit Dunblane as soon as circumstances make that appropriate, and I can tell the House that they will be going there on Monday.

Hon. Members will share my sense of the inadequacy of any attempt we make in this House to offer consolation to the families devastated by this vile crime. The cold-blooded slaughter of tiny children is beyond atrocity. I know that I speak for the whole House when I say to the stricken families of Dunblane: "Our deepest sympathy and our prayers are with you and for you. You have the support of countless people around the world in your grief."

Tomorrow night, the people of Dunblane will be holding a vigil for their dead, their injured and their bereaved. I know that I speak for the whole House when I say that the prayers and thoughts of all hon. Members will be with them. The whole nation mourns.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his statement, and for his consideration and kindness in inviting me to join him in Dunblane yesterday. I agree with every word that the right hon. Gentleman said. I warmly welcome the fact that Her Majesty the Queen will visit the town next Monday.

There will not be a single person in this country who would not have wakened this morning hoping beyond hope that yesterday was just a bad dream; so there will be nobody today who will not experience huge sadness and dismay on realising that it did all happen.

One does not need to have lived in the town of Dunblane or to have seen three children go through Dunblane primary school to share the grief, horror and sheer desolation that our town feels today—one just has to be a fellow human being. It was that worst of all possible nightmares that any parent can think of—and for it to happen to so many of the littlest and most innocent makes the tragedy one of unspeakable misery.

I have to say that Dunblane today is worse than yesterday in its mourning, and tomorrow will probably be worse still, as the enormity of the massacre comes home in the shape of real children gone, real families afflicted, and a whole community scarred and tortured.

I join the Secretary of State's tributes to headmaster Ron Taylor, whose composure and self-control—which we witnessed yesterday—in the face of the most traumatic events was an inspiration. To act with speed and calmness as tiny pupils die in one's arms cannot be described as ordinary professionalism—it was heroism. The staff of the school also deserve great praise and thanks. We deeply mourn Gwen Mayor, the truly dedicated teacher who died with her charges in the gymnasium.

The Secretary and I met, spoke to and thanked—and I do so again—members of the emergency services, police, ambulance staff and medical teams from a supremely dedicated health service, who acted with superlative dedication and skill, even when their own emotions were tested to the limit. We must be so grateful for the caring services of the local councils, Church leaders and members of the whole community, who poured in to help.

Naturally, there are questions to be asked—with the nation, let alone the local community, needing answers. The worst service that we can do to the infant victims is to rush to instant judgment. Therefore, I strongly welcome the decision to appoint a High Court judge of the calibre of Lord Cullen to investigate all the circumstances of yesterday.

Those of us who met and distrusted Thomas Hamilton—I argued with him in my own home—in truth could have had no inkling to guide us to his final act of wantonness. Of course, we expect a thorough examination of and any necessary action on the present gun laws, which enabled such a man to own such a lethal armoury. School security, too, will need looking at, but we should not pretend to ourselves that even a fortress would have kept an armed, crazed, suicidal killer at bay. That is not for today.

Today, the nation stands beside and with a community devastated by a unique and terrible act of evil. We here, and all of us who would root out the sickness that spawns such an awful act, stand together in mourning and sympathy with those whose loss today is beyond repair.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his welcome for the inquiry to be headed by Lord Cullen. I fully understand the hon. Gentleman's comments about Thomas Hamilton. I, too, had some contact with him, as his constituency Member of Parliament, and I agree that there could have been no inkling that he would be capable of such a terrible act.

I entirely endorse the hon. Gentleman's point about not rushing to judgment, and of course he is right to highlight questions such as gun law and the security of schools, which will need to be considered in the context of the findings of the inquiry. I will ensure that the Lord Advocate does everything possible to ensure that the inquiry is conducted speedily, so that those matters can be quickly laid to rest.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): The whole House shares the grief of the people of Dunblane at this horrible massacre. Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Dumfries and Galloway regional council has considerable expertise in counselling and support, following the Lockerbie air disaster, and is very anxious to help in any way if it can?

Will my right hon. Friend accept that I am glad that he has set up an inquiry by Lord Cullen? I hope that it reports as soon as possible, so that action can be taken subsequently.

Mr. Forsyth: I am most grateful to my right hon. Friend for the offer of assistance. May I use this opportunity to thank all the local authorities which offered help and support, including Strathclyde, which provided tremendous support through the police, and the many authorities which have offered expert support with counselling, which has been taken up by the community? I will certainly try to ensure that my right hon. Friend's request is met.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): The Secretary of State will be aware of my long association with the district in which the community of Dunblane lies. When I spoke to my friends in Dunblane about attempting to make a statement here, they said, "How can one put into words the silent scream that went through the community of Dunblane yesterday?" Like the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson), I have often shared in the joys of that dynamic community in the past. I am certain that I speak for everyone in the House when I say that we attempt to reach out to the people of Dunblane to offer to share some of the burden that has now been laid upon them.

In particular, I ask the House to send our condolences to families who have lost children and grandchildren, to the family and colleagues of the teacher who was murdered yesterday, and to the community which, as one of my friends from Dunblane said, has had the heart and soul torn from it in this terrible and violent tragedy.

I have been in constant contact with my friends and former colleagues in Dunblane yesterday and today, and they are already deeply touched by the messages sent by many people from all round the country, including those in Aberfan who have faxed messages to them.

Will the Secretary of State pass on to the Prime Minister the community's thanks that he will visit the town tomorrow, in a non-political, all-party manner, to carry the wishes of the House to them for a speedy recovery from this terrible tragedy?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman and I are sparring partners of old, but today we are united in our grief. I am sure that the people of Dunblane will appreciate his words today. In the Scottish Office, we have received telegrams and messages from all over the world. This is a tragedy that has struck a chord with parents everywhere, and the hon. Gentleman's remarks will be much appreciated by the people of Dunblane.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): Will my right hon. Friend accept the great concern and good wishes of my constituents, from whom, over the past 24 hours, I have taken a number of calls? One of them, Mrs. Ray of Ayr, has asked me to suggest to the House that we stand for one minute's silence. Whether that is possible under the rules of the House, I am not sure; if not, perhaps what the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) suggested might be considered at a later date.

Mr. Forsyth: I am sure that all of us will find our own ways of recognising this tragedy—some in prayer, some by keeping silences, some by contemplating what has happened. I believe that the message from this House could not be clearer to the people of this country: we all share the grief that the parents who have lost children in Dunblane feel, and in their grieving we stand as one with them.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The moving expressions of tribute by the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) could not be bettered. They have spoken for the whole House, and I will not elaborate on them. I merely hope that what cannot be said will itself speak volumes. Many of us cannot put into words what we actually feel.

I welcome the appointment of such a distinguished judge as Lord Cullen. Can the Secretary of State confirm that his inquiry will have a wider remit than a fatal accident inquiry would? Obviously, we want the investigation to be as thorough as possible. Will it be possible to commence the inquiry in the not too distant future?

The Secretary of State has said that anything we say will be inadequate, but will he relay to his constituents on behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends and of the people of the United Kingdom the thought that, although our words may be inadequate, we shall give the people of Dunblane what we can in terms of our love, support and prayers?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's last sentiment. The hon. Gentleman is a lawyer, and as such he has the advantage of me, but he will know that, under Scots law, there has to be a fatal accident inquiry, usually led by the sheriff in the area concerned. The Lord Advocate and I felt that the circumstances surrounding this tragedy were so serious that it was right to have a senior and distinguished judge of Lord Cullen's rank to carry out the inquiry. We were extremely grateful to him for agreeing to do it so promptly.

If the House will permit me to, I should like to make a further statement on how the inquiry will be carried out once the Lord Advocate has had an opportunity to discuss with Lord Cullen his views on the matter, which are an important aspect of any consideration.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): Great grief is never great at talking; it is not words, but tears and a sob and a heartbreak. This House has today reflected that more than I have ever seen in the many years I have sat in it. When I heard about the tragedy, I thought of the text of scripture that says:

"Rachel weeping for her children refused to be comforted . . . because they were not."

Today I think of those who weep for their children and cannot be comforted because they are not. That text comes from Old Testament prophecy and it holds out a great hope.

Over against the wickedness of this crime I hear the words of the Saviour, who said:

"Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not: for of such is the Kingdom of God."

I trust that that faith and that hope will cast a beautiful rainbow over this terrible valley of tears.

I would associate the people of Northern Ireland in sympathy with the people of Dunblane. We have walked our valleys; we too have known the anguish; we too have felt the pain. Deep today calls unto deep from Northern Ireland to those who sorrow in Scotland.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks. If there is one hope for the future, it lies in the nature of the community of Dunblane. It is a strong, God-fearing community, well served by voluntary organisations. I am sure that they will rally round to meet this tragedy; but nothing we can say or do, or they can do in Dunblane, can remove what was done yesterday. I hope that there will never be another day when this House has to contemplate such an act.

Sir James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): As one who had the privilege of visiting Dunblane only a few months ago, may I associate my hon. Friends with what has been said already? As the Prime Minister rightly said, at such a time words can be extremely inadequate. But we would all want the grieving families and all who have suffered to know that they will be very much in our thoughts and prayers in the coming days and weeks.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. Yesterday, the hon. Member for Hamilton and I found that we could not find adequate words. We could only show solidarity with the community by being there and showing the people that we felt for them, as the hon. Gentleman and the House have done this afternoon.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): My right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) have told the House that it and the country have united in horror and grief at what happened. On a practical point, is my right hon. Friend able to assure the House that he will tell us as soon as possible what the approximate timetable will be for the welcome inquiry by Lord Cullen?

Mr. Forsyth: Yes, I am happy to give my hon. Friend that assurance. I am sure that he will understand that it is necessary for us to consult Lord Cullen before being in a position to do what my hon. Friend asks.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): May I convey the deep sorrow of the Scottish all-party children's group for the families and people of Dunblane? It is not that long since all the parties in this place co-operated in legislating for children in Scotland. The group very much welcomes the Secretary of State's promptness in instigating an inquiry, and Lord Cullen's acceptance of the task. I can only say now that I am sure that we shall all co-operate in any necessary future legislation or action that seems to be helpful following any of Lord Cullen's recommendations.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Lady. I am aware of the interest that she takes in matters involving children's policy. I must say that it is hard to think of legislation that we could pass that would in its implementation act against the sort of irrational act of madness which we saw carried out yesterday.

Mr. Sam Galbraith (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): I have three young daughters of primary school age, and my heart goes out to those who have been devastated by what happened yesterday. The Secretary of State will probably not be aware that that man Thomas Hamilton was running a youth club for primary children in Bishopbriggs in my constituency. I would be grateful if the Secretary of State were to ensure that Lord Cullen's inquiry will examine Hamilton's activities in my constituency.

Mr. Forsyth: I am sure that all Members, including me, will want to make available to the inquiry any information they have. I am sure that the proper place or stage at which these matters should be examined is during Lord Cullen's inquiry. I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing the matter to my attention.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Although my constituency is a long way away from Dunblane, the loss of my 12-year-old daughter 15 years ago makes me feel extremely close. May I ask my right hon. Friend to convey yet another message to his bereaved constituents? It is simply this: "Although you will feel utterly alone, you are not. All of us who have been through a similar hell are willing you on and praying for you. There is hope—really, there is. Although, as the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) said, it will go on getting worse every day and you, the people of Dunblane, will never get over it, please believe me that it really is just possible to rebuild a life of some sort."

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for those words of comfort, which are based on his own tragic experience. The Leader of the Opposition said that every family with children must have had such thoughts last night; such thoughts went through my mind. I am sure that my hon. Friend's experience will provide some comfort. It is difficult for people with children to imagine what it must be like to have to cope with the loss of a child.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus, East): May I ask the Secretary of State to convey our heartfelt condolences to the people of Dunblane; their sorrow is shared by all of us. Will he, please, thank the emergency services, teachers, police and the health and other organisations for the outstanding work they have done? I welcome the inquiry, and I ask that it also examines the general issues of gun legislation and school security. I hope that the inquiry will be able to get to the truth of the matter. I thank the Secretary of State personally for the way in which he has conveyed the feelings of the House to the people in his constituency.

Mr. Forsyth: Clearly, it will be a matter for Lord Cullen to decide which issues he will want to examine in the context of this incident, but I am sure that the points made by the hon. Gentleman about the rules governing gun control and the issue of school security will feature among them. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has pointed out, those matters are kept under constant review, and the Firearms Consultative Committee, which has been established for that purpose, has said today that it will want to take full account of any issues arising from the inquiry, and any recommendations following from it.

I do not wish in any way to pre-empt any of the inquiry's conclusions, but, having been to the school yesterday, I think that it is very hard to see how it would have been possible to have security around the school that would have prevented a man armed with four guns from being able to carry out that terrible deed, which we now know he did.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): Will the Secretary of State convey to the people of Dunblane the sincere condolences of the people in Dundee? Some years ago, an armed gunman broke into St. John's high school in my constituency, and Mrs. Nanette Hanson, a teacher there, lost her life protecting her pupils. So—in a small way compared with the horrifying scale of what happened yesterday in Dunblane—the people of Dundee have experienced the actions of a deranged gunman. In that experience, we are with the people of Dunblane in their hour of sorrow.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The loss of a teacher's life yesterday in protecting the children in her charge, as in the case of the hon. Gentleman's constituent, perhaps underlines very graphically the debt we owe to the teaching profession, which serves us so well throughout the United Kingdom.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): May I tell the Secretary of State that some of my constituents have told me that this is a moment for commiseration and deep condolences for the families in Dunblane; hence, my constituents appreciate the decision to postpone tomorrow's meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee. May I tell him how much I welcome his promise of a statement to the House on the terms of reference of Lord Cullen's inquiry? Will he give serious thought to the idea of giving a statement to the next meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee on the licensing of firearms, and the criteria by which they are issued?

Mr. Forsyth: I said that I would inform the House. I am not sure whether it is necessary to make a statement to the House about the terms, but I shall certainly be happy to discuss that matter with the hon. Gentleman.

As for making a statement to the next Scottish Grand Committee on the issue of firearms, it might be more appropriate to allow the inquiry to get under way—I hope that it will be conducted speedily. Once we have the inquiry's conclusions, we will be in a position to decide what, if any, action should be taken. I think that the hon. Member for Hamilton's words—that we should not rush too quickly to judgment at this time, of all times—are very wise, and I am sure that all hon. Members will think them worthy of being heeded.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): May I thank the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) for speaking so sympathetically and eloquently for all of us in the House and in Scotland? I add my voice to those of my colleagues and others who would welcome Lord Cullen examining the question of firearms and their use. If he is not to do so, we would welcome some other examination of the issue.

There have been a number of other incidents and, although they were not as serious and tragic as this one, firearms are a cause for concern. I hope that the Secretary of State will include their use in the terms of reference of Lord Cullen's inquiry, or give rapid further consideration to how the law can be changed. I know that this incident might not have been prevented, but it might make similar situations less likely in future.

Mr. Forsyth: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The Firearms Consultative Committee keeps the legislation under review. I shall certainly ensure that the hon. Gentleman's comments are drawn to its attention. As I said, it has said that it will wish to examine such matters in the light of the inquiry's findings, but I shall certainly make sure that the committee is aware of what the hon. Gentleman has just said.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): As the Member of Parliament representing a neighbouring constituency, may I join in the expression of sympathy for the parents, relatives and friends of the victims of this horrific massacre? As a former teacher in Central region, may I also pay tribute to the heroism of the class teacher, Mrs. Gwen Mayor, and the head teacher, Mr. Ron Taylor?

[Mr. Dennis Canavan]

Without prejudging the findings of Lord Cullen's inquiry, could the Secretary of State please tell the House at this stage whether the perpetrator of this evil crime did in fact have a firearms certificate? If so, will he ensure that Lord Cullen's inquiry will be a full investigation of how on earth an infamous character such as Thomas Hamilton could apparently obtain a firearms certificate that apparently enabled him to carry four lethal handguns and how, according to some reports, he was apparently running a gun club at some stage?

Mr. Forsyth: I confirm that it is my understanding that Mr. Hamilton had a firearms licence for the weapons concerned. It is also my understanding that he had no criminal convictions, and that he had had licences for many years. The hon. Gentleman began his question by asking me not to prejudge the findings of Lord Cullen's inquiry; he will therefore forgive me if I do not draw conclusions, which I felt that he was beginning to do.

Lord Cullen was responsible for the inquiry following the Piper Alpha disaster, and I think it is common ground that he did a thorough and excellent job in inquiring into the circumstances of that disaster and making recommendations. I am sure that the same skills and abilities will be deployed in considering all the issues that concern the hon. Gentleman. I think that we would do well to wait until he has produced his findings before reaching any conclusions.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: I think that we should come to a close. But I believe that we have not heard from anyone representing Wales.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): The reason I waited until the end was that I thought Scottish Members and others should have preference. Some of the constituencies of Wales were directly involved with the disaster at Aberfan, so perhaps we can share even more closely the feelings that have been expressed this afternoon.

Given our experience with parents who suffered the loss of their children, and in view of the remarks expressed this afternoon about the reaction of parents, might I ask the Government to ensure that there is adequate finance for counselling, because many people in the area will need a great deal? I plead with the Government to ensure that ready money is available immediately, so that counselling can start straight away.

The experience that the Government could gain from people who were or who still are involved in counselling in Aberfan could give the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State a great deal of assistance in helping the grieving parents.

Mr. Forsyth: Not just the parents, but the children in the school as well, who will have been traumatised by this experience.

Of course resources will be made available. Yesterday, when the hon. Member for Hamilton and I were in Dunblane, we had an opportunity to discuss these matters with the local authorities and others. They have been overwhelmed by offers of support and help, and of course we shall ensure that the resources are available for that.

All the evidence is that the counselling has already begun, and people are doing everything they can to lend help and support. But, if I may say so, I think that it is a mistake to believe that counselling can wipe things away or undo the harm that has been done. It is an important prop. It is an aid. When we visited the school yesterday, people were already very much involved in that.

I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his offer of Celtic support from Wales. We Scots and the Welsh have much in common and the hon. Gentleman's words will be very much appreciated in Scotland.

Madam Speaker: I wish to call one more hon. Member. Mr. Martyn Jones.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South-West): As a lay member of the Firearms Consultative Committee, which by pure chance met this morning, I wish to convey its great concern over this incredibly evil act. We have heard so many hon. Members in the Chamber expressing views that, in truth, are inexpressible.

I am pleased, as I know is the Firearms Consultative Committee, that a full inquiry is being instituted. If there is any chance that something has gone wrong in administration, or if the committee could suggest further legislation, will Government time be given for that at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. Forsyth: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I cannot commit legislation without having a specific proposal, and without the support and agreement of my right hon. Friends. But what I can say is that the committee is there in order to keep the firearms legislation under review, and I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and I would consider carefully any proposals that are put forward in the light of consideration of the circumstances and any recommendations which might come from the inquiry.

Business of the House

4.8 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): I would like to make a statement about the business for next week.

MONDAY 18 MARCH—Opposition Day (7th allotted day). Until 7 o'clock, there will be a debate entitled "The Government's Threatened Withdrawal of Employment Rights", followed by a debate on the proposed privatisation of HMSO. Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

Motion relating to the Education (School Premises) Regulations.

TUESDAY 19 MARCH—Remaining stages of the Nursery Education and Grant-Maintained Schools Bill.

WEDNESDAY 20 MARCH—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Second Reading of the Reserve Forces Bill [Lords].

Motion on the Food Protection (Emergency Prohibitions) (Oil and Chemical Pollution of Fish and Plants) Order.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at 7 o'clock.

THURSDAY 21 MARCH—Debate on the forthcoming intergovernmental conference on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 22 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Committee B will meet at 10.30 am on Wednesday 20 March to consider European Community document No. COM(95)541 relating to co-operation with Gulf states.

The House might also find it helpful to know that, on a provisional basis, I anticipate that the business for the following week will be as follows:

MONDAY 25 MARCH—Second Reading of the Family Law Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 26 MARCH—Opposition Day (8th allotted day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

WEDNESDAY 27 MARCH—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Progress on remaining stages of the Finance Bill.

THURSDAY 28 MARCH—Until about 7 o'clock, conclusion of remaining stages of the Finance Bill.

FRIDAY 29 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

[Wednesday 20 March:

European Standing Committee B—European Community document: COM(95)541, Co-operation with Gulf States. Relevant European Legislation Report: HC 51-vi (1995-96).]

Mrs. Ann Taylor (Dewsbury): I thank the Leader of the House for that information and for arranging yesterday's brief statement. I also thank him for today's statement on the Dunblane incident. I am sure that he will ensure that the House is kept informed of any developments following the inquiry into that incident. I assure him that if the inquiry concludes that changes in legislation are required, Opposition Members will do all that we can to facilitate the passage of any legislation that is judged necessary.

I come now to next week's business. Is the Leader of the House willing to reconsider, even at this late stage, the decision for next Thursday's debate to take place on a motion for the Adjournment? It appears that the Government persist in hiding behind a procedural device rather than presenting the House with a substantive motion, which could be amended and which could ensure that the Government were left in no doubt whatever about the feelings of the House on the vital issues that surround discussions on the intergovernmental conference.

On a different issue, will the Leader of the House find Government time for a debate on cold weather payments, and in particular the refusal of the Department of Social Security to provide basic information about the number of claimants who have received one, two, three or four payments this winter? If such simple information cannot be provided, how can our constituents have any confidence whatever in the system? If that confidence is not there, surely the House should debate the matter.

Will the Leader of the House find time to debate today's report of the parliamentary ombudsman on the efficiency—or lack of it—of the Child Support Agency, and specifically his proposal for an independent complaints adjudicator; a proposal which was first made in May this year and which he repeated today? He has made it clear that the CSA's performance is still far from adequate, and many hon. Members must have had the same experience as me, of not being able to obtain proper replies from the CSA unless parliamentary questions are tabled. As the ombudsman has stated that the CSA accounts for one third of all the complaints that he receives about all Government Departments, surely the Leader of the House must acknowledge that the time is drawing near when another debate would be appropriate.

Finally, I remind the Leader of the House of our request for a statement when the Dearing report on the education of 16 to 19-year-olds is published. It would be appropriate to have a statement in the House as well as outside.

Mr. Newton: I thank the hon. Lady for what she said about Dunblane, and any action that might be required in the light of the inquiry announced just now by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. I was grateful to her, and others, for the co-operation between the usual channels that enabled us to make our own short statements yesterday, and to agree on an appropriate way of handling this awful matter.

I note the hon. Lady's request in regard to the debate on the intergovernmental conference, but precedents have been set for some little time. Wide-ranging debates in advance of European Council meetings have taken place on motions for the Adjournment, and I consider that course appropriate in relation to Turin—particularly as the debate is intended to deal with the IGC as a whole, to which the White Paper is relevant, rather than being limited to the subject of the White Paper as such.

I cannot promise a debate on cold weather payments, but I shall certainly bring the hon. Lady's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

The parliamentary ombudsman's report on the Child Support Agency deals with 195 cases; the agency is currently dealing with over 1 million. That is not to minimise the problems that arise when any individual case goes wrong, but merely to put the position into perspective. As the hon. Lady knows, the difficulties in the workings of the CSA have frequently been acknowledged, and a good deal of action has been taken—with considerable success—to improve the situation. As for the hon. Lady's specific question, the CSA is examining the practicalities of introducing an independent complaints examiner, and Ministers are considering a number of options.

I think that I can safely tell the hon. Lady that I, too, think that a statement to the House about the Dearing report would be appropriate. I hope that it will be possible for such a statement to be made before the end of the month.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many Conservative Members believe that his decision to hold Thursday's debate on Europe on a motion for the Adjournment was right? Is it not sensible to have a debate of that kind at this stage, while keeping open the possibility of a longer and more substantial debate, perhaps on a substantive motion, at a later stage, when the House is aware of the outcome—if any—of the intergovernmental conference?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his supportive remarks.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I welcome the fact that the Leader of the House was able to tell us, on a provisional basis, the business for the second week. That is convenient for all hon. Members.

May I express a degree of disappointment that the Government's statement about small businesses was not made in the House? Will the right hon. Gentleman use his good offices and encourage his colleagues, when they make important statements, to make them in the House?

I do not think that it was appropriate for the right hon. Gentleman, in his response to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), to compare the IGC with Council meetings. This is an intergovernmental conference, not a Council meeting. Precedents that have applied to Adjournment debates in the past do not apply in this instance.

Mr. Newton: It certainly is a Council meeting, albeit a meeting of a special European Council. The hon. Gentleman will find that over a long period there have been various precedents, but I do not want to haggle with him, especially this afternoon. The bottom line is that I consider an Adjournment debate appropriate at this juncture, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Forman) for agreeing with that view.

I always try to take account of the sensitivities of the House in relation to statements on policy, and I note what the hon. Gentleman said about that. As for his opening remarks, let me simply say that I am grateful for them.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I agree with what has been said in favour of holding the debate on the IGC White Paper on the Adjournment. It is clear that all parties in the House are divided on the issue. Is it not better for us to hear all the disparate views on this important subject than to debate it on a party political basis, playing arithmetic to find ways of embarrassing the Prime Minister?

Mr. Newton: I am not sure that I want, on this particular afternoon, to engage in arguments about the reason for holding the debate in this way. I believe, however, that the issue is wide ranging, and that it is appropriate for the House to debate it on an Adjournment motion—which can easily be arranged—rather than trying to tie it down in a restrictive way.

Ms Ann Coffey (Stockport): Does the Leader of the House share my dismay at learning that the Stockport scanner appeal continued to raise money long after it had reached its target, and in so doing, I think misled the people of Stockport, who continued to give generously? That raises some important issues about how charities raising money for national health service equipment operate. Will the Leader of the House arrange a debate on the matter?

Mr. Newton: I am not sure that I could undertake to find time for such a debate. The hon. Lady might care to think of it as an appropriate subject for a Wednesday morning. I know that she will understand when I say that I am not able to comment on the circumstances. I think I am right in saying that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is responsible for the charity commissioners, and he is on the Bench with me.

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many Conservative Members who have had a long-standing interest in European matters, sometimes controversially, are delighted by the form of the motion that he and the Government have tabled, on the intergovernmental conference? The matters are so complex and wide that it is right for them to be presented in a way that allows wide debate.

Mr. Newton: I am beginning to find positively heart-warming the amount of support from behind me, and I grateful for that.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May we have a debate on the national lottery? I am getting many letters at the moment, and a great deal of concern is being expressed in the newspapers about the possibility of a second draw each week. I notice that no fewer than seven scratchcards are now available. Some serious matters are being raised and I do not recall us being made aware in any way of Camelot's great possibilities to continue to make its own money. It seems that Peter Davis, the Director General of Oflot, is prepared to let Camelot print its own money. Indeed, at the moment he seems to be providing the printing presses. The House ought to have another look. Can the Leader of the House offer the possibility of an early debate?

Mr. Newton: All that I can do is note the hon. Gentleman's request and say that, as I understand it, Camelot has not submitted an application for a mid-week draw to the regulator. If it does, the Director General of Oflot will carefully consider its merits.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Can my right hon. Friend find time as soon as possible for a full-day debate on energy policy, so that we are able to look not only at the benefits of the privatisation of gas and electricity, but at alternative sources of energy? I have two issues in mind, the first of which is the siting of windmills. They are unbelievably ugly and we must be extremely careful about where they are sited. The second issue is the burning of secondary fuels. Castle Cement in my constituency is currently burning a fuel called Cemfuel and there is great cause for concern in my constituency about that. I have told Ministers that I intend to seek a meeting with them. It would be useful for the House to debate the whole question of energy policy, and I know that hon. Members in all parts of the House are interested in many issues relating to it.

Mr. Newton: That is another request which I shall most certainly note, although I cannot make a promise this afternoon.

Ms Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen): There was a question on the Order Paper today for Home Office questions about the possibility of the Government introducing identity cards. Unfortunately, the right hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) did not appear to ask his question. I remind the Leader of the House of a report a year ago in The Observer under the heading, "Major plays ID card to trump Blair". The report said:

"John Major . . . promised the introduction of compulsory identity cards to help 'deter crime and make it more likely that we will catch criminals'."

The article continued:

"A Number 10 source said it was a question of how they were to be introduced—not whether."

Will the Leader of the House make a statement about that?

Mr. Newton: As that is a frustrated question from Home Office Question Time and as my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is on the Front Bench beside me, I shall leave him to respond in due course, in whatever way he feels is appropriate.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 611, which was tabled by the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) and which I have also signed. It states:

[That this House, while recognising the value of wind turbines in producing renewable energy, is alarmed at the spread of these structures in areas of attractive landscape, particularly the up-lands of Cumbria and Lancashire; and urges the Secretary of State for the Environment to respond to the Countryside Commission's suggestion that PPG 22 be revised and strengthened to prevent the permanent defacing of many of this country's most attractive areas.]

The hon. Gentleman draws particular attention to Cumbria and Lancashire, but I assure my right hon. Friend that the impact of those infernal machines is felt increasingly throughout the United Kingdom's beautiful countryside, and that often those machines are energy sinks. They rarely provide net energy and are much more expensive. Every electricity consumer is paying a levy, which subsidises inefficient energy generation that helps to desecrate our remaining beautiful countryside.

Mr. Newton: I shall bring my hon. Friend's remarks, along with those of my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice (Lewisham, East): I was shocked at the complacency of the Leader of the House in his response to my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) about the Child Support Agency and a possible debate on the ombudsman's report. It was rather like the complacency this morning of Miss Chant on the "Today" programme. I do not, however, believe the Leader of the House to be a complacent person. I remind him that that is not the ombudsman's first report about the CSA. As a member of the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration, I urge the Leader of the House to think again about the possibility of a debate. The fact that only 195 cases were mentioned in the report does not mean that nothing else was wrong with the CSA, but means that those were the worst examples that the ombudsman wished to bring to our attention.

Mr. Newton: I should greatly regret it if my remarks sounded complacent, which they were not intended to be, and I am grateful to the hon. Lady for acknowledging that she does not regard me as complacent on those matters. I should like to make two other points. First, I understand that, of 20 cases in the report chosen as examples, 14 began in 1993, so they go back to a significantly earlier stage. Secondly, a recent report by the Social Security Select Committee said:

"The agency is now on a surer footing and a whole range of indicators suggest that improvements are being made."

I am not in any way complacent, but it is reasonable to expect some acknowledgement of the efforts to bring about improvements.

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): The Leader of the House said that the Family Law Bill would have its Second Reading in this Chamber on Monday week. What attitude do the Government intend to take to the decision in the other place to support pension splitting? Does he not agree that that is an important move in the right direction, to ensure that women's rights are protected and promoted?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady will know that the Government always carefully consider comments and changes made in another place. That consideration is continuing and I am not in a position to reveal its outcome this afternoon.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Southend, East) rose—

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test) rose—

Madam Speaker: It is my practice to call only Members who have heard the statement. I do not know whether the two hon. Gentlemen who want to be called did so. Were they in the Chamber when the Leader of the House made his statement? [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] In that case, obviously, I cannot ask Members to question a statement that they have not heard.

SCOTTISH GRAND COMMITTEE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 94H(1) (Scottish Grand Committee (Sittings)),

That the Order of the House [11th December] be further amended by leaving out paragraph 6, and the sitting of the Scottish Grand Committee in Glasgow City Chambers to-morrow be thereby discharged.—[Mr. Bates.]

Question agreed to.

Prevention and Suppression of Terrorism

[Relevant document: the memorandum relating to this instrument contained in the Eleventh Report from the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments (House of Commons Paper No. 34-xi of Session 1995-96).]

4.28 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): I beg to move,

That the draft Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (Continuance) Order 1996, which was laid before this House on 22nd February, be approved.

Madam Speaker: I understand that with this it will be convenient to discuss the following motion:

That the draft Prevention of Terrorism (Exclusion Orders) Regulations 1996, which were laid before this House on 22nd February, be approved.

I have put a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

Mr. Howard: The first item—the order—renews the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 for a further 12 months. The second—the regulations—makes some minor amendments to schedule 2 to the Act which will bring the procedures under which exclusion orders are made into line with European Community law following the judgment given in the Gallagher case.

On the renewal of the PTA, I should like to begin by thanking Mr. John Rowe QC, who has once again conducted the annual review of the legislation and whose report informs our discussions today. His clear conclusion, following wide consultation and an entirely independent scrutiny of the operation of the Act in 1995, is that it should be renewed—and in its entirety—for a further 12 months. Before explaining why the Government have decided to accept his recommendation, I should like to say something about the background to this debate.

Since the first Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act in 1974, successive Home Secretaries have come before the House to argue the case for renewal. Not one has undertaken that task without feeling both sorrow and anger that such measures are, and continue to be, necessary to protect and defend the citizens of this country from those who are prepared to engage in acts of terror—to kill and to maim by bomb and by bullet. The sadness I feel today must be at least the equal of that felt on any such occasion over the past 20 years.

This is the third year in which I have asked the House to renew the Act. On each occasion, the backdrop to the debate has been different. On the first occasion, in 1994, the IRA's campaign was in full flood. Indeed, as the House may recall, I was just winding up the debate when news reached me of the mortars that had fallen on Heathrow airport less than an hour before. I appealed then to the whole House to unite with the Government so as to send a signal to those responsible for that campaign that the House was united, that it was "determined to face them down and to make available to the police the powers that they need to fight terrorism."—[Official Report, 9 March 1994; Vol. 239, c. 335.]

To my regret, the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), who now leads the Opposition and was then his party's spokesman on home affairs, rejected that call. The Labour party voted against the Government and against the continuation of the powers in the Act.

Last year, I brought a renewal order to the House against the backdrop of a cessation of violence by the IRA and a subsequent ceasefire by loyalist paramilitaries. I was able to point to the hope felt by many in Great Britain and Northern Ireland that the threat from terrorism would recede. At that time, for the first time for many years, the people of Northern Ireland were able to go about their daily business without fear of violence from republican or loyalist paramilitaries. For the first time for many years, there was no imminent threat of IRA violence in the towns and cities of Great Britain.

I argued, nevertheless, for the renewal of the Act because the terrorists had retained their structure, their organisation and their arsenals intact. They had retained the capacity to strike whenever they chose. It would have been irresponsible for any Government, in such circumstances, to have dismantled their defences and allowed the powers in the Act to lapse. Again I invited the Labour party to support the Government, but Labour Members again voted against the Act's renewal. They opposed the renewal because, the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) told the House, they considered the power to make exclusion orders a form of internal exile; because the Act provides for the deciding voice in any decision to extend detention under the PTA to be that of the Secretary of State, not a judge; and because there was, in their view, a need for a general and comprehensive review of anti-terrorist legislation then in force.

The Labour party has now, I understand, decided to change its position to abstention because one of those points has fallen to the ground with the Government's announcement of the inquiry by Lord Lloyd of Berwick. The other points that were raised last year are apparently less crucial than they were. I am pleased to see some change in the position of the Labour party even if, as I shall explain later, I do not believe that it goes anything like far enough.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): It would have helped if the Home Secretary had started with a different tone and recognised the total condemnation of terrorism by both sides of the House. He did not do that in his opening remarks.

The Government's position has changed, too, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows it. The number of exclusion orders and of people detained have been dropping consistently for some years. That does not mean that the principle of exclusion is all right, but it does mean that the Government are at last recognising what Lord Colville and many in the House have argued—that the use of the powers needed to be phased out. The Government have cut their use and, for that, I am grateful.

Mr. Howard: I am coming very precisely to the use of the powers and the fact that it has indeed been possible to use them on fewer occasions than in the past. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he said.

Since the ceasefire, the Government have, as the House knows, spared no effort to consolidate the 1994 cessation of violence into a lasting peace.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Home Secretary acknowledge that political prisoners played a very considerable role in persuading paramilitaries in both communities to bring about the cessation of violence? How does he explain the total absence of generosity and imagination, which the Government promised if a cessation of violence came about? Why has Patrick Kelly still not been repatriated to the Republic of Ireland? Why are four life sentence prisoners serving parole in the United Kingdom rather than being returned to the Republic of Ireland? Why are republican prisoners in Belmarsh prison treated so differently from others in the Prison Service? Why has he not shown the generosity and imagination that the Government said would be shown to political prisoners who played such a tremendous part in bringing about the cessation of violence?

Mr. Howard: There are no political prisoners in this country. The prisoners to whom I believe the hon. Gentleman has referred have been convicted of crimes against the ordinary law of this country, such as murder, attempted murder, conspiracy to murder and other very serious violent crimes. They are treated in exactly the same way as others who have been convicted of similar crimes and who pose similar risks of escape.

Mr. Madden indicated dissent.

Mr. Howard: Since the hon. Gentleman shakes his head, it may be appropriate to remind the House that, after the ceasefire was announced, IRA prisoners who had been convicted of most serious offences attempted to escape from Whitemoor prison. One shot at and wounded a prison officer during the escape attempt. That is the reality behind the hon. Gentleman's question. He does not serve any purpose by trying to mislead the House or the country with the kind of language that he used.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): I note that the Home Secretary says that all convicted prisoners are treated in the same way. Does that apply to someone who is convicted of murder? I speak of Private Lee Clegg. Will the Home Secretary give his opinion on whether Private Clegg was a political prisoner or got political parole in circumstances when others did not?

Mr. Howard: No, the procedures that were applied in that case were identical to those that are applied in every other case. The ordinary law of the land was followed. The country will take note of Opposition Members' reactions to the unchallengeable observations that I have made.

I was dealing with the question of the ceasefire and the actions that the Government have taken since then to attempt to consolidate the cessation of violence into a lasting peace.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Speaking as a member of the Cabinet that sent in the troops in 1969 and as a member of the Cabinet following the Birmingham bombing when the Act was introduced, may I ask whether the Home Secretary has reflected on the fact that, over the whole of that period, a ceasefire was never achieved by the PTA? The work of Albert Reynolds, the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and Mr. Adams secured the ceasefire. The Act, with all its risks to civil liberty, has played no part whatever in dealing with the problem of violence in Northern Ireland. All-party talks are the only way in which to deal with the situation.

Mr. Howard: I attempt to be accurate in my claims. I have never claimed that the prevention of terrorism Act was responsible for the ceasefire. It is not the purpose of the prevention of terrorism Act to achieve a ceasefire: its purpose is to protect the lives of innocent people in this country, to protect those who have been the victims of the bomb and the bullet for many years and to try to ensure that others do not find themselves in a similar plight.

In the months that followed the declaration of the ceasefires, we were able to scale down the more visible and inconvenient aspects of security. In Northern Ireland, soldiers were taken off the streets and all border crossing points were reopened. The number of house searches carried out under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991 was reduced by 75 per cent., and the number of those arrested under section 14 of the prevention of terrorism Act also fell markedly. New investment and new jobs poured into Northern Ireland. Tourism was on the increase.

The number of detentions under the PTA in the United Kingdom for 1995 was 70 per cent. down on the figure for 1994. We constantly sought to move the peace process forward. We talked to all the parties, including Sinn Fein, at ministerial and official level, but the response to our continued requests for some gesture from the terrorists of their peaceful intent went unanswered until the evening of 9 February.

The answer was the devastating explosion at South Quay. As ever, the IRA's intent appears to have been to kill or to maim as many people as possible. The IRA's warning was imprecise and its transmission was bungled. It is with profound regret that I remind the House that two people were killed in that blast and many others were injured, some very seriously. My sympathies are very much with them and with their families. Since then, there have been further incidents, further injuries and another death.

My deepest thanks go to the emergency services whose courageous response has done much to limit the carnage planned by the IRA. No new ceasefire has been declared. I remind the House that the most recent bomb exploded without warning—despite the fact that a firm date had been set for the all-party talks, which is what the terrorists profess that they want. Instead, we are told that the IRA is offering another 25 years of bloodshed. The loyalist paramilitaries have indicated that, if there are further IRA outrages, they will match them blow for blow. That is the bleak backdrop to our debate today.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Although my right hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right to stress that the Canary wharf incident, and events since then, reinforce the need to renew the Act, did not Mr. Rowe recommend its renewal even while the ceasefire continued? Events at Canary wharf have merely reinforced the need for the measure.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. He expresses Mr. Rowe's recommendation and the Government's position with absolute accuracy.

The powers in the PTA are a necessary part of our armoury in the fight against terrorism. That is why we continue to argue for their renewal, and it is why I do so again today.

As Mr. Rowe's report makes clear, the powers to make exclusion orders deter people from carrying out terrorist acts and deprive the groups to which they belong of some of their experienced operators. The powers to detain, to extend detention under the Act, and to stop, examine and search those coming into or leaving Great Britain or Northern Ireland are equally vital weapons in our armoury. Of the 477 detained under the Act in 1995, 19 were held in connection with international terrorism and the remainder were held in relation to Northern Irish terrorism. Some 121 of those—about 25 per cent.—were subsequently charged with an offence. Of great importance, too, are the powers of the police to investigate terrorist finances and to obtain explanation orders in relation to funds and other information found.

I am aware that the exclusion order provisions are regarded as one of the most contentious parts of the legislation. There are some who, while wholly convinced of the need for other parts of the legislation, are concerned about denying British citizens access to part of their own country. As one who remains proud to call himself a Unionist, I appreciate their misgivings and I have some sympathy with them, but when faced with terrorists who will stop at nothing to achieve their ends—who strike at our most fundamental human rights—we have to accept some measures which, in normal circumstances, we would not countenance.

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): I support much of what the Home Secretary has said. However, can he explain why the citizens of one part of the United Kingdom must put up with someone walking their streets who is not fit to walk the streets of London because he is assumed to be a bomber or a terrorist? Why should the citizens of Northern Ireland tolerate that?

Mr. Howard: I know that the hon. Lady's view of such matters is different from that of some Labour Members who have intervened in the debate so far. She will know that there are many reasons for that power, one of which—I shall confine myself to only one reason in answering her question—is that, in many circumstances, it can be significantly easier to keep such people under surveillance in one part of the United Kingdom as opposed to another. That is an important way in which terrorism can be fought and combated.

Mr. Rowe's report on the operation of the Act in 1995 points out the need for the exceptional powers. He confirms that the paramilitaries have maintained their command structure and organisation throughout the past 18 months, and that murder, assault, intimidation and coercion have been planned, and carried out, in their name and under their direction. That is why he has concluded that the provisions are still needed and that the Act should therefore be renewed. His report was submitted to me before the IRA's ceasefire came to an end—as my hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) said. Mr. Rowe's views must carry even greater force in the changed circumstances in which we now find ourselves.

As hon. Members know, the Government agree with Mr. Rowe's conclusion: it would be sheer folly to allow any of the provisions in the Act to lapse now. If any confirmation were needed, the events of the past few weeks surely put the continuing need for the Act beyond doubt.

Of course, the provisions are not used solely to counter Northern Irish terrorism. Some of the powers can be, and are, used to counter the threat of international terrorism.

Mr. Rowe's report comments on that. The most recent examples are the charges on explosive offences, after detention and extension of detention under the PTA, of those held in connection with the car bombs outside the Israeli embassy and Balfour house in July 1994. In 1995, several Algerians suspected of involvement in terrorist acts were detained under the PTA. One of those detained is currently being held following an extradition request from France. I decided to deport one of the others on national security grounds—in the event, he decided to make a voluntary departure from the United Kingdom and I understand that he was subsequently arrested in France.

Only last week, after I had met the French Interior Minister, he told the press that France owed the successful halt to the Algerian Armed Islamic Group—the GIA—terrorist campaign, in part, to France's co-operation with the United Kingdom. Co-operation between democratic countries is essential if we are to fight terrorism effectively. Last night, a further suspect was arrested in London under an international arrest warrant produced by the French authorities.

Mr. Rowe concludes that, whatever happens in Northern Ireland, there is always likely to be terrorism of an international kind; that the manifestations of it are increasing; and that the need for the Act in order to counter them therefore remains.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): Does that mean that the prevention of terrorism Act, or its basic principles, will remain in place even if a permanent peace is established in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Howard: That is precisely why the Government set up the inquiry that is being undertaken by Lord Lloyd of Berwick, which I should like now to consider.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland announced to the House on 9 January, Lord Lloyd agreed to lead an inquiry to consider whether—and, if so, what—specific counter-terrorist legislation would be required if and when a lasting peace is established in Northern Ireland. His review is under way. Both the PTA and the emergency provisions Act will be examined in the consideration of what may or may not be needed in future. We shall consider his conclusions when his inquiry has been completed. I understand that he hopes to report before the autumn.

The Government's first priority must be to protect the public. To do that, we have to give the police the powers that they need to combat terrorism effectively. The PTA is needed to help prevent the terrorist from taking action and restocking his armoury and to deprive him of funds and a place to hide. I believe that the Act must be renewed for the full period of 12 months that is allowed. I therefore commend the first order to the House.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The Home Secretary mentioned the work of the police. Will he enlarge on how, in future, national elements to which he has referred elsewhere, such as a national crime squad and a national criminal intelligence service, will be related to the existing mechanism by which police forces co-operate to fight terrorism through national joint units? A reply from the Minister of State suggests to me that the national joint units will still be in limbo, so it would be helpful to know how the police will be given the structure for the necessary national co-operation.

Mr. Howard: The right hon. Gentleman is anticipating the debate that we shall no doubt have when we produce detailed proposals for the national crime squad. The point to which he has referred is clearly relevant to the establishment of that squad, but we shall deal with it at the time. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will understand that I prefer not to anticipate that debate.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Did the Home Secretary see the "Dispatches" programme on Channel 4 last night, in which it was proved that British companies have been involved in the sale of weapons of terror to despotic regimes abroad and that those weapons are used to torture political prisoners? Will the Home Secretary join me in calling for a full investigation to make sure that that does not happen?

Mr. Howard: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Lady, but I did not watch Channel 4 "Dispatches" last night, so I cannot comment on the allegations that were made in it. I am sure, however, that the hon. Lady will take the matter up with whichever of my right hon. Friends is appropriate.

The second item before the House amends the procedures in the PTA that govern the making of exclusion orders. When the European Court of Justice delivered its judgment in the Gallagher case on 30 November, I made it clear in an oral answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) that the judgment did not affect our powers to exclude, but made a limited criticism of the procedures. I said then that we could adapt our procedures without difficulty, and the order does no more than make the necessary changes in the way in which the procedures are carried out.

The power to make exclusion orders may be used only to counter the threat from Northern Irish terrorism and, as Mr. Rowe points out in his report, it has proved a valuable tool over the years in disrupting terrorist plans. Particular individuals can be barred from entering Northern Ireland, Great Britain or the United Kingdom where the Secretary of State is satisfied that they would take advantage of their presence there to commission, prepare or instigate acts of terrorism in connection with the affairs of Northern Ireland. The use of that power not only hampers terrorists' ability to travel but, because their identity and activities are known to the security forces, it limits their overall usefulness to the terrorist organisation to which they belong. Once an organisation becomes aware that the activities of an individual have become known in that way, his usefulness necessarily diminishes.

It has been argued that keeping people under observation would be more effective than exclusion and less of an infringement of their liberties, but the resource implications of mounting a surveillance operation in every case would be enormous and in most cases it is not a realistic proposition.

Others suggest that the process of exclusion is arbitrary and unfair, but Mr. Rowe's report makes it quite clear that it is not. Before any order is made, a considered report is sent to the relevant Department. Mr. Rowe refers to the further scrutiny of the case for exclusion by officials and by the Secretary of State. That scrutiny is robust. Mr. Rowe found that each participant in the process during the year under review.

"approached the task with fairness"

[Mr. Howard]

There are currently 33 orders in force. As the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) pointed out, that is the lowest number since the power was introduced in 1974. I cannot rule out the possibility that further orders will be made. As now, each case will be considered carefully on its merits.

The need for the exclusion power is proven. It is effective. It is an essential weapon in the counter-terrorist armoury and it would be irresponsible to relinquish it.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Am I right in my interpretation of new regulation 5A(1) of the regulations—that a person may be detained without charge and without suspicion of committing an offence for an indefinite period and, in any event, for more than seven days without any charge being brought against him?

Mr. Howard: I am coming to the detailed provisions of the second order, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the detention powers in it are no greater than the present ones, although the timing is different.

As the House will know, we have already made it clear that certain changes will be made to the procedures governing the making of exclusion orders to bring them into line with European Community law following the ruling of the European Court of Justice last November in the Gallagher case. Those changes are set out in the second order. The regulations are to be made under section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972, which makes special provision to facilitate the amending of legislation to bring United Kingdom law into line with European Community law.

Under the present arrangements, the law requires that where an exclusion order is made, the person affected must be notified of that fact if he is in any part of the United Kingdom. If he wishes to make representations against the order, he has seven days from the date of notification in which to do so, or 14 days if he is outside the jurisdiction from which the order excludes him. Independent advice must be sought once representations are made. An independent adviser is nominated to consider the representations made and the case for exclusion, and to advise the Secretary of State accordingly. His report is taken into account in any decision to confirm or revoke the order.

The House will recall that the European Court found no fault with the substance of the power to exclude when it ruled on the Gallagher case. Its judgment simply requires the Secretary of State to obtain independent advice in every case where he is considering whether to make an exclusion order before the decision is made, rather than shortly after, as he is required to do now if representations are made.

The procedures set out in the regulations, therefore, require the Secretary of State to serve written notice on any person in the United Kingdom against whom he is considering making an exclusion order, to refer the matter for advice to one or more independent persons nominated by him to give advice on such matters and to take into account the advice that he subsequently receives when making his decision. A person who is being served with such a notice may make written representations setting out his objections and can ask to be interviewed by the independent adviser before the latter reports to the Secretary of State.

Historically, persons detained under the Act have often been at an advanced stage of planning a terrorist operation. The decision to arrest them will have been taken either because surveillance has been compromised or because there is uncertainty as to the exact timing of a terrorist attack. That can sometimes mean that the individual is detained before sufficient evidence is available to secure a criminal conviction. In such cases, it is often the case that the police apply for an exclusion order.

Those people can be dangerous, committed terrorists involved in an operation at an advanced stage of planning. It would not be right to release them back into the community pending the procurement and consideration of independent advice.

Mr. Mallon: Will the Home Secretary explain who will appoint the independent advisers?

Mr. Howard: The Secretary of State will appoint them. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman gestures, and the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) laughs. If the exclusion order is to be maintained, what other procedures would they like to see in place? Are they prepared to accept that persons whom I have just described as dangerous, committed terrorists are to be allowed to continue to travel free to commit their acts of terrorism at the expense of innocent people in this United Kingdom of ours? That is the alternative.

Mr. McNamara: My understanding is that, when the Home Secretary informs an individual that he is considering making an order, that person may then be detained with no charge made against him and with no recourse to the court. The individual may make representations within seven days. According to the order, there follows an indefinite period during which an adviser appointed by the Secretary of State will examine the evidence—which the detainee will never be able to see, know the substance of or argue against, and neither will he have the benefit of any legal help. Subsequently, a report will go to the Secretary of State who, without any time limit being imposed, can choose how long it will be before he decides whether to confirm or revoke his proposal. Under that procedure, an individual may be held almost indefinitely—there is no time limit and he or she does not have the normal protection of the law. Secondly—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. The hon. Gentleman has already taken a minute. One question of that length is sufficient at this stage.

Mr. Howard: Detention in the circumstances that the hon. Gentleman described will be an option entirely for the detainee. There is a simple way in which that person can avoid detention.

Mr. McNamara indicated dissent.

Mr. Howard: If the hon. Gentleman will restrain himself for just a moment, I may explain that the prospective detainee can escape detention by complying with the terms of the exclusion order. If the individual is prepared to return to Northern Ireland or Great Britain, as the case may be, he will not be detained. If the individual is not prepared to comply and is in the advanced stages of planning or committing a terrorist operation, it is clearly essential that detention powers are available. The hon. Gentleman's summary omitted that regulation 5(2) requires the decision on exclusion to be made as soon as reasonably practicable.

Mr. McNamara: We have seen examples of that before from the Home Secretary.

Mr. Howard: I have not given way again to the hon. Gentleman. If he is fortunate to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, no doubt he will make his further points at that time.

I have explained why there is currently a power to detain individuals during the time that an exclusion order is being considered—which is why the new regulations contain a similar power of detention. Under the new procedures it will be possible, if the individual concerned is within the part of the United Kingdom from which consideration is being given to excluding him, to detain him for the period between the serving of the notice and the final decision being taken.

The power to detain is not always used now. It may not always be used in future. Sometimes, the individual is permitted to leave the jurisdiction pending consideration of the case against him. That will be possible in future, but no sensible Government would deny themselves the power to detain murderous criminals while exclusion is under consideration. We will certainly not do so.

All the necessary procedures will be carried out as swiftly as possible but, as will be seen from the regulations, the time it takes for any individual to be interviewed is partly dictated by that person. Individuals will have seven days from the date of the notice, if they are inside the jurisdiction from which consideration is being given to excluding them, in which to make their representations and request an interview.

I began by emphasising our abhorrence at the resumption of the IRA campaign. For 18 months, peace seemed as close as it has ever been in the last 25 years, but the terrorists have returned to the path of murder. The bombs in London serve no purpose. The overwhelming majority of people on both sides of the Irish sea want peace. The IRA has shattered those hopes but the door to peace remains open, and both this Government and the Irish Government continue to explore ways of making progress towards the goal of a comprehensive political settlement in Northern Ireland.

The events of last month have shown yet again that we cannot afford to drop our guard. I do not propose to do so. For the past 12 years, the Labour party has voted against renewal of the PTA. For the two years before that, Labour Members abstained. Before that, they voted for the Act. Now they are doing no more than proposing to return to the position that they adopted when Michael Foot was their leader.

I hope that, even at this late stage, the hon. Member for Blackburn and his hon. Friends will reflect on the matter and support the legislation. Abstention is not enough. Indecision will not do. Governments cannot shrink from deciding whether to take the measures necessary to protect the public from terrorism. We continue to need the emergency powers in the 1989 Act and the order and regulations before the House will give those powers. Once again, I ask the whole House to support them.

5.5 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): Terrorism is a modern plague. It randomly destroys the lives of innocent people, and it wrecks families and communities—but terrorism is rarely used randomly. Its aim, almost always, is to disrupt the political process. Some acts of terrorism take place in authoritarian regimes, but they are used as often to undermine democratic countries and the processes by which they seek through peaceful means to resolve conflicts that arise between different peoples or interest groups. The threat to the international community from terrorism is so great that yesterday a summit on that subject alone was held in Egypt.

There is no more appalling example of the immediate and wider consequences that terrorism can bring than the recent bombings of innocent bus passengers in Israel. Although that country is 3,000 miles away, we are all affected by such terrorism. We are directly affected if terrorist organisations also intend to base some of their operations in the United Kingdom or seek support here.

The middle east peace process has been rendered fragile by the resumption of extreme terrorism by Hamas. In the UK, the process to achieve peace in Ireland has been placed under enormous strain by the Provisional IRA's unilateral decision to end its ceasefire and begin a bombing campaign on the mainland. Innocent lives have been lost. Many more people have been physically injured or have suffered great psychological damage. Employment has been disrupted, and millions of pounds' worth of damage has been done to homes, offices and businesses. I join the Home Secretary in condemning those atrocities today, as we did when they occurred.

The police and security forces have again found themselves in the dangerous front line of the fight against terrorism. I place on record our gratitude for their work and the debt that we owe for their bravery and dedication. Fortunately, the disruption caused by the ending of the ceasefire has not aborted the peace process but has strengthened the resolve of all political parties represented in the House and of the Irish Government to work even harder to achieve lasting peace, and the huge benefits that it would bring.

The reality of terrorism, whether international or emanating from within the British Isles, means that special measures must be in place the better to combat terrorism. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition made his views clear when he spoke in the renewal order debate two years ago:

> "It is not in dispute, and never has been, that we need anti-terrorist legislation . . . We in the House share a total and complete abhorrence of terrorism and a desire to defeat it."—[Official Report, 9 March 1994; Vol. 239, c. 300.]

That sentiment has been repeated by me and by my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam), shadow Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, who also said in the emergency provisions Bill debate two months ago that > "there must be effective counter-terrorist legislation."—[Official Report, 9 January 1996; Vol. 269, c. 42.]

We have also striven hard to ensure that, in order to deal effectively with terrorism—by the security measures needed to fight it and the political processes required to undermine support for it—there is bipartisan agreement across the House. We have achieved such a position on the peace process. Both the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland have readily acknowledged that the peace process has been immeasurably strengthened by our support for it. I pay tribute to the indefatigable work of my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar and her team in that regard. I wish to put it on record that my hon. Friends the Members for Redcar and for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) would have been here, but for the fact that they are in the United States following their duties in the Northern Ireland team.

For at least five years we have also sought means by which there could be all-party agreement on the measures necessary to combat terrorism. In practice, there has been little argument between the parties about four of the six operational parts of what is now the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989—those relating to proscribed organisations, to financial assistance for terrorism and to powers relating to the investigation of terrorist activities, searches for munitions and the control of explosives factories, magazines and stores. There has, however, been argument about the use of certain of the powers relating to arrests, detentions and port controls, and overwhelming objections to the principle of exclusion orders.

Five years ago, my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), then shadow Home Secretary, made proposals for what he described as a "fundamental re-examination" of the prevention of terrorism Acts to achieve on anti-terrorist legislation. Those were turned down.

Two years ago, the late John Smith, with my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), made a further sustained effort to achieve that demonstration of common purpose. Private discussions to achieve that common purpose were held with Ministers, but those private discussions were aborted when their details were leaked. That leak did not come from the Opposition.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): Can the hon. Gentleman confirm that the original exclusion order was brought in by a Labour Government and was supported by the Labour party until 1983? The hon. Gentleman is using weasel words to cover up the differences in his party. Does he agree with comments in The Guardian that his argument is entirely inconsistent? By abstaining on the order, he reveals himself as still soft on terrorism.

Mr. Straw: I confirm the first part of what the hon. Gentleman said, which is a matter of fact. I advise him never to take too much notice of what The Guardian says, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn)—had he remained in his place—would also advise him. As I will explain, there are good reasons for the position that the Labour party took earlier in this decade and in the 1980s.

Despite the way in which discussions into which we had entered in good faith were aborted as a result of the leaking of details about them—not by the Opposition, as I have said—my right hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield, in the debate two years ago, repeated the offer

"that has been made to the Government . . . to try to reach a consensus on the issue, take it out of the political divide and resolve it properly."

He continued:

"One way to achieve that would be to undertake a full and independent review of the judicial process"— of the PTA—

"under a senior respected figure".—[Official Report, 9 March 1994; Vol. 239, c. 300-309.]

Last year, in the more encouraging climate of the ceasefire, my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar and I renewed those efforts to secure the establishment of such a review. Again, the approaches were not reciprocated by the Government by the time of the debate, which took place almost exactly a year ago. This time last year, I said:

"Three things . . . are in dispute: the power to make exclusion orders, which are a form of internal exile; the absence of a judicial element in decisions to extend detention; and, above all . . . the need for a general and comprehensive review of anti-terrorist legislation."

"Had such a review been announced, and had it been able to take into account our concerns in relation to the first two matters that I raised, we should not have voted against the order tonight".

I repeated that point, so that there was no doubt about it, on two other occasions in my speech.

I regret that it has taken so long for the review we sought to be announced and for the foundations to be laid—as the review will achieve—for bipartisan agreement. The review we sought has now been announced and it follows directly from what I said last year that we should not vote against the measures tonight. Indeed, that was the reason why we did not vote against the Third Reading of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill on 19 February 1996, despite the fact that it contained measures to reintroduce internment in principle.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): But did not the hon. Gentleman and his party vote against the Second Reading of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill on the very day the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland announced a review? Is he not therefore talking absolute nonsense when he says that the reason for the change in his position today, for an all-party approach, is that we have announced a review?

Mr. Straw: No is the answer to that question. What I have said is entirely consistent with what I said last year:

"Had such a review been announced, and had it been able to take into account our concerns in relation to the first two matters that I raised, we should not have voted against the order tonight".—[Official Report, 8 March 1995; Vol. 256, c. 357.]

Sir Ivan Lawrence: You voted against the emergency provisions Bill.

Mr. Straw: We did not vote against the emergency provisions Bill. We voted for a reasoned amendment which we had tabled and we did not vote against the Third Reading. The hon. and learned Gentleman needs to get his facts right before he asks further questions.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman has accused my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) of not getting his facts right, so let us make it clear what the record shows. Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that, on the day my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland announced the general review and after that review had been announced, the Opposition voted against the Second Reading of the Bill? The hon. Gentleman does not seem to know what his party did on that occasion, but I can tell him that it voted against the Second Reading of that Bill.

Mr. Straw: We voted for a reasoned amendment, as I understand it. I was not actually present and I did not vote either way on that occasion. I know that, on 19 February on the Third Reading of the Bill, there was no vote at all in the House.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): The hon. Gentleman may have been gratified to hear the BBC glorifying his party's apparent change of heart, after 13 years, about voting against the order tonight. The story that the BBC should have reported is that, in spite of the recent bombing and the breakdown of the ceasefire, the Opposition are still not prepared to support these measures. Where is the consistency in anything that the hon. Gentleman has said so far?

Mr. Straw: I have explained, on more than one occasion, that we have sought a bipartisan agreement on measures for the prevention of terrorism, as we have given bipartisan support for the peace process. But there is a difference. We have been able to achieve bipartisan support for the peace process because we have been able to have effective, constructive discussions with the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about that process. No such discussions have been remotely possible with the Home Secretary, who appears to believe that bipartisan agreement can arise only when a proposition is laid on the table and we have to take it or leave it.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman has made some allegations about me, so perhaps I may put another question to him. He attaches enormous importance to the review, which he says is the reason why his party has changed its position, and he is relying on it in his increasingly desperate attempt to preserve some semblance of unity in his party's position. Is the hon. Gentleman aware—I made it perfectly clear in my earlier remarks—that the review that we have asked Lord Lloyd to undertake is a review of the powers that will be needed if and when there is a permanent peace in Northern Ireland? It is a review of the powers that we will need against international terrorism or any other domestic terrorism, but specifically not Irish terrorism because it is predicated on the basis that there will be peace in Northern Ireland. The review has, therefore, precious little to do with the subject matter of today's debate.

Mr. Straw: That is entirely wrong. The terms of reference of the Lloyd review refer to the future need for specific counter-terrorism legislation in the United Kingdom if the cessation of violence leads to a lasting peace. I made exactly that point this time last year when I called for a review. I said that the review should be established on the Government's working assumption that the cessation of violence led to a lasting peace. So the review that has been established is the review that we sought—whether my hon. Friends like it or not.

Mr. McNamara: My hon. Friend has agreed with the Secretary of State that the review is predicated on a cessation of violence in Northern Ireland, and upon its continuation. Lord Lloyd is not looking at the situation since the breakdown of the ceasefire. The whole premise of the review has in one sense been knocked away by the IRA restarting its activities. So what Lord Lloyd is doing is of no relevance to the renewal of the prevention of terrorism Act—a point that I have made in the past to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Straw: When we called for a review last year we said that it should be established by a High Court judge or someone of similar standing, and that it should be carried out on the Government's working assumption that the ceasefire had led to a permanent cessation of violence. It is our judgment that the terms of reference of the Lloyd review meet the conditions that I specified last year. What I said then is clear for anyone to see. Despite the fact that the PIRA has abandoned the cessation of violence, the Lloyd review continues and he has invited my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar and me, among many others, to give evidence.

Mr. Mallon: Just to help us make up our minds, may I point out that there have been numerous reviews down the years? Lord Jellicoe, Lord Shackleton, Sir Cyril Phillips, Lord Gardiner, Lord Colville, Sir George Baker and John Rowe have all carried out reviews, but none of them dealt with the central points that the hon. Gentleman has identified and their recommendations were not adopted by Government. How can anyone therefore place any faith in the Lloyd review or believe that it will come up with the type of conclusions that I would like to see?

Mr. Straw: I can only repeat what I have already said. We proposed last year that the review be established on the basis of the Government's working assumption that the cessation of violence was permanent. My statement was made in good faith when the ceasefire was holding. Despite the fact that it has broken down—we hope only temporarily—the review is still going forward and we intend to give evidence to it. It remains the firm hope of every Member of the House that the ceasefire will return, that the PIRA will end its bombing campaign and that the reviews can then take place in the circumstances that we and the Government expected when they were first announced.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does not wish to mislead the House. Now that his hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) has been able to refresh his memory from the Hansard report of the debate on the Northern Ireland Bill, held on 9 January 1996—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is for hon. Members themselves to decide whether they have misled the House, not for other Members to pontificate at length before even reaching what may or may not have been a point of order.

Sir Ivan Lawrence rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have made that quite clear. Mr. Straw.

Mr. Straw: I think I can help the hon. and learned Gentleman. I was misinformed about our position on

[Mr. Straw]

Second Reading. We did vote against Second Reading, and I apologise to the House for that error. In the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Redcar made it clear that we welcomed the establishment of the Lloyd review and that we would seek further changes to the EPA in Committee. She also said that we would not vote against Third Reading, and that we did not do.

Although the Act which the House is invited tonight to review dates from 1989, the original Act dates from autumn 1974. It passed through all its stages in this House and the other place in the near record time of 48 hours, following the carnage of the Birmingham pub bombings. The then Home Secretary justified the need for the legislation on the ground that the country faced a highly exceptional situation and a clear and present danger. The powers, Roy Jenkins told the House, were draconian and unprecedented in peacetime. In consequence, Parliament required what have amounted to annual audits of the use of the Act's powers, and that it be subject to annual renewal.

It was also to the great credit of the Labour Government that two more fundamental reviews of the provisions of the Act were conducted by the distinguished figures of Lord Gardiner and then Lord Shackleton. By contrast, until the Lloyd review was announced only one other fundamental review of the Act's provisions has been held under this Administration—the one by Viscount Colville in 1987. That review had been preceded by mounting disquiet, dating back many years in this House and outside it, at the way in which some of the PTA powers were being used, especially those relating to examinations at ports, detentions and their extension, and exclusions from the mainland or from Northern Ireland.

Many complaints were made by my right hon. and hon. Friends on behalf of constituents with family connections in Ireland whose travel to and from different parts of the same kingdom were subject to the hazards and humiliations of unjustified stops and detentions. It was also said that the other powers in the Act were used unjustifiably.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman a little more with the events of 9 January this year. The hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) said:

"We will vote twice against the legislation today, as we did in 1991. It is important to be consistent."—[Official Report, 9 January 1996; Vol. 269, c. 47.]

Did she consult him before using those words?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend referred to the position that we took in 1991. She also made it clear that we welcomed the establishment of the Lloyd review and would not vote against Third Reading.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and many others used to make the point that this sort of experience of the use of the powers, and the sense of injustice that it engendered, perversely assisted recruitment to terrorist organisations and helped to feed the lie peddled so assiduously in the United States that British justice was no justice when it came to the treatment of Irish people. The results of those concerns and of the Colville review have been that the powers in the Act have been more sparingly and judiciously used in recent years, as we heard from the Secretary of State. The number of detentions fell from 857 in 1979 to one sixth of that number, 145, in 1993, the last full year before the ceasefire came into effect.

Just 8 per cent. of those detained in 1980 were charged with any offence. By 1993 the proportion had risen to 20 per cent. If I heard the Secretary of State aright, I believe that it is now up to 25 per cent. Those figures are salutary. Far from the much more limited use of the Act's powers undermining the fight against terrorism, they have strengthened that fight with a much higher arrest rate and with the removal of some of the grounds for complaint about the injustice of the Act.

As I spelt out last year, however, there are still concerns about the absence of a judicial element in decisions to extend detention and about the very principle of exclusion orders. Under the normal criminal law in England and Wales, a suspect may be arrested and detained by police for up to 36 hours, and that detention may then be extended by a further two and a half days, making four days in all. In contrast, under the PTA, the initial detention period is 48 hours. That detention may be extended for a further five days by the Secretary of State, and not by any judicial figure. It is in the nature of powers needed to deal with terrorism that swift decisions may have to be made, and that the basis of such decisions may be intelligence or other evidence that would be inadmissible in a court of law. These considerations strengthen rather than weaken the case for decisions to extend detention to be made with the utmost fairness and to be seen to be fair. In our view, that must require a judicial element.

The current situation is unsatisfactory. That was recognised seven years ago by the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), the then Home Secretary. He said that the Government continued to look "for a judicial mechanism." Perhaps I have missed something in the argument, but I do not begin to understand why that search has produced a blank.

The argument advanced in this year's audit by Mr. John Rowe is unconvincing. He has recited the circumstances in which a judge would work. He tells us that the suspect could not be given all the detail of the evidence against him, that the judge could not give reasons for his judgment and that there would be no right of appeal. Mr. Rowe then claimed that the judge, in such circumstances, would be acting "in name only. He would be exercising a function which could be called judicial only because he happened to be a judge by his profession and occupation. And the judge would in this situation would have every appearance of being an arm of the Executive."

In other words, Mr. Rowe was asserting that a judge could bring nothing to the process, and that the only consequence of his role would be to compromise his judicial integrity. If that were so, we would never ask judges to make decisions except in open court. Yet Mr. Rowe admits that there are plenty of examples where judges do not have to make decisions in open court, where they make them in secret on evidence that cannot be disclosed to the defendant.

As the House discussed two weeks ago on Second Reading of the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Bill, that is exactly the position when it comes to dealing with sensitive evidence—for example, the identity of an informant covered by a public interest immunity certificate, where the defendant may not even know that an application to the judge has been made, still less what it contains.

Increasingly over the years, to provide greater public confidence in the fairness of procedures that necessarily have to operate in secrecy, the House has asked senior members of the judiciary to supervise parts of the work of the intelligence and security agencies. No one doubts the independence of mind and spirit of Lord Nolan, yet one of his tasks is to act as interception commissioner in the operation of the Interception of Communications Act 1985 to check whether telephone taps and other intercepts have been properly authorised. In those circumstances, Lord Nolan has not acted as a judge in name only; nor have his integrity and public reputation been compromised in any way as he has undertaken that task.

There is the example of Mr. Rowe, who is brought in to act, in a judicial capacity, to check retrospectively the use of the Act's powers. Moreover, Ministers have voluntarily assented to treaties and conventions which require that there should be an independent element in decisions, as the decision of the European Court of Justice in the Gallagher case demonstrated.

The state has no greater coercive power than the deprivation of liberty. Even in the grave circumstances of the fight against terrorism—indeed, especially in those circumstances—it is wrong that decisions should be made by Ministers alone.

Exclusion orders apply only to Irish terrorism. They have been justified on the ground that they are a necessary part of measures that are needed to fight terrorism by denying certain individuals entry to one or other parts of the United Kingdom, so disrupting terrorists' organisational and supply lines. That was the case advanced by the Home Secretary. The orders, however, are a form of internal exile, last practised, I understand, in this country in the time of Henry VIII. When such exile was practised in the former Soviet Union, it was subject to round condemnation by the international community.

The effects of exclusion orders are bizarre. After all, we are one kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. Yet the orders mean that a suspected terrorist who is regarded as so dangerous that he is not allowed anywhere in England, Scotland and Wales is allowed freely to walk the streets of Northern Ireland. In reverse, a suspect can be banned from Belfast but still be free in Birmingham.

For all that the Home Secretary said in support of exclusion orders, he omitted to mention that when there was last a fundamental review of the PTA, conducted by Lord Colville, the outcome was a settled conclusion on exclusion orders. Lord Colville described the orders as "the most draconian in the present Act".

Having considered the security arguments in favour of exclusion orders, he said:

"However, I am not convinced that the ends justify these means . . . exclusion orders should not be renewed or replaced."

That would be the correct decision, he continued,

"both in terms of civil rights in the United Kingdom, and this country's reputation in that respect among the international community".

Those were prescient words. The continued use of exclusion orders has harmed our reputation abroad and written endless speeches for the apologists for terrorism. It has led also to Britain ending up on the wrong side of international laws to which we have assented.

Mr. Barnes: Is it not also unacceptable that the IRA operates a form of external exclusion order, the exercise of which means that many citizens of Northern Ireland are kept out of Northern Ireland?

Mr. Straw: I accept entirely what my hon. Friend has said.

We remain implacably opposed to exclusion orders, and shall be saying so in our evidence to the Lloyd review. I hope that the Government will reconsider their support for the orders. They have, by their actions, recognised the force of the arguments against the orders. The number in force, as we heard from the Home Secretary, is the lowest ever. Only four were made in 1993, the last full year before the ceasefire, compared with nearly four times that number in 1987.

Moreover, it now appears that some of those who are involved in the making of exclusion orders now have serious misgivings about them. In his 1994 audit, Mr. Rowe stated simply that police officers had told him that the orders "have a real value". There is, however, a more quantified story in Mr. Rowe's latest audit. He states that the "overwhelming majority of port officers . . . gave me the answer that these orders are useful and should be retained."

But he continued by stating that "there was a fair number of officers, of all ranks, who held the opposite view".

He explained that the opposite view was that

"a known and experienced member of . . . terrorist organisations can be noticed at port and followed thereafter, and kept under surveillance."

We now know from Mr. Rowe's report that a number of people in the security services are questioning the value of exclusion orders. The only argument in favour of the orders was their utility. If even that is now being questioned, it is surely time for us to agree to abandon their use altogether.

Whatever sincere but differing views Members may take about the merits of the renewal order, the House is united in its determination to fight terrorism with every means that is consistent with a democratic nation whose constitution is based on the rule of law. It is the Opposition's fervent hope that the Lloyd review will be the means by which we can at last achieve bipartisan agreement on the measures necessary to fight the scourge of terrorism.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that Back Benchers' speeches are restricted to 10 minutes.

5.39 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): I shall be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) should understand that he fails to convince on two important points. First, he fails to demonstrate any error in our assumption that the greatest threat to civil liberties lies with terrorist activity rather than anti-terrorist legislation. The second flaw in his argument is that he gives insufficient attention to the fact that exclusion orders have a vital operational value in that they can interrupt the command and communications structure of terrorists and thus save life. For that reason, reluctantly, we accept the infringement of civil liberties that exclusion orders represent.

On the wider issues, I have three observations to make. The first relates to the Rowe report as a whole. The essential point to note is that it is entirely unequivocal: it is precise, and there are no ifs and buts. It states that the prevention of terrorism Act was operated effectively and properly in 1995 and that there is a continuing need for its existence in the next 12 months. My hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) pointed out in an intervention that Mr. Rowe came to his conclusions at a time when the IRA was still operating its ceasefire, so they are that much more valid now that we have moved out of that era. By any criteria, the House would be entirely wrong and would be acting indefensibly and irresponsibly if it did anything other than support the measure as amended with regard to exclusion orders.

Secondly, perhaps the most significant aspect of Mr. Rowe's report this year is the emphasis that he gives to the dimension of international terrorism. There has too often been a tendency on the part of politicians and commentators to regard the PTA exclusively in the context of Northern Ireland. That was always mistaken. The statistics speak for themselves: more than 21 per cent. of the people who were detained under either the 1984 or 1989 Act and who were subsequently charged were involved in international terrorism. In some years, the figure was much higher, and in one year—1987—the totals of those involved in international and Northern Ireland terrorism were virtually identical.

Mr. Rowe provides a useful potted history of the various PTAs and shows that from 1974—when the first of these Acts was introduced—through to 1976 and then to 1984, they always contained the provision to counter international terrorism. The provision was not specifically identified until the later two Acts, but those Acts were consistent with that intention from the very start.

Mr. Rowe reminds us that the Lockerbie incident occurred only just over seven years ago, that it is not yet two years since the attack on the Israeli embassy and Balfour house, and that last year 50 per cent. of the extensions of detention related to international terrorism. It is vital that we do not lose sight of that essential fact and that we continue to have on the statute book legislation which will enable a democratic society to respond to the ever-present threat of international terrorism, regardless of the situation in Northern Ireland.

Thirdly, I must express a slight concern. I noted Mr. Rowe's favourable and reassuring comments about the funding of terrorism and the investigation of it. He pointed out in paragraphs 39 to 42 that there have been convictions under sections 9 and 10, and that greater use was made in 1995 of schedule 7 with regard to the making of search warrants and so on, but my concern is that perhaps the powers that we have on the statute book do not go far enough and cannot deal with one particular issue—that of fund-raising on the part of the non-proscribed political wings of proscribed organisations.

The arguments are long and detailed so I shall say only that non-proscribed organisations can legally raise money which is channelled not necessarily into acts of terrorism—which would be contrary to the PTA—but into promoting the ideology and stance of terrorist or proscribed organisations. I hope that the Lloyd inquiry will deal with terrorist financing or promote the opportunity for wider debate because I do not believe that we have yet got to grips with it.

As I said, I believe that the House would be entirely mistaken if it did anything other than support the measure.

5.44 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I am sorry that the Home Secretary chose to begin the debate in the way that he did because he is playing politics, which is rather sad and not something that the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland would so easily have done.

The Home Secretary spoke about the vote last year and said that it took place at the time of the Heathrow bombs. He said that we should face down the terrorists. If, after 25 years of violence, I believed that we could face them down simply by voting, I would vote with him every time. The problem is that we need to do something more sophisticated than facing down the terrorists.

The Home Secretary and one or two other hon. Members accused my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) of inconsistency. They should watch what they say. They have been asking for cross-party support on Northern Ireland, and they will get it because we believe in the peace, but there is nothing more inconsistent than the Government condemning IRA terrorism year after year while at the same time talking to it without the House's knowledge—and I do not mean Sinn Fein: I mean the IRA. A party that talks to the IRA but then lectures us on being inconsistent has a substantial lesson to learn. The Unionists and the SDLP know that, and most of us know it, too. It is time that the Home Secretary talked to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and the Prime Minister, who are handling the situation with a great deal more sophistication than he is.

In response to an intervention, the Home Secretary said that there were no political prisoners. I agree. A long time ago, during the hunger strike, I argued—when it was not popular to do so—that there were no political prisoners. Why? Because in this country, laws are made democratically and there is an independent judiciary to put them into effect. There can be political prisoners only when that is not the case. As an ex-probation officer, I knew that people from varying backgrounds would claim political status when they were not entitled to it and when it had nothing whatever to do with Ireland.

The Home Secretary does devastating damage to his case by justifying under the prevention of terrorism Act the power of a politician to impose internal exile and, at times, to detain. That is why there is so much concern among some hon. Members about the nature of the PTA. I am in favour of civil liberties, but the argument is not only about such liberties—it is about two fundamental concepts. The first is the rule of law and the second is how most effectively we can fight terrorism.

I shall explain why I am prepared to abstain this evening, having voted against the measure on previous occasions, and I urge my hon. Friends to do the same. The situation is changing. If the Government had the wit, they would have told the House that they accept what Lord Colville said in 1987, that there is internal exile, that we know that we have to get rid of it and that is why the numbers in internal exile have dropped and are so low. That is why the Home Secretary should get rid of the exclusion orders. As my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn said, senior police officers know that, in view of the small numbers involved, it would be more effective to use the security services, MI5 and MI6.

The worst argument that the Home Secretary could have used was that of resource implications. For heaven's sake—we have been spending billions of pounds in Northern Ireland to deal with terrorism, and the Irish Government have been doing the same. Are we seriously saying for the sake of four exclusion orders that we would not use a method which does not so much override the rule of law? If MI5 and MI6 can do the job, as I believe that they can, we should let them do it.

Let us not be dragged before international courts that we helped to establish. British lawyers wrote the laws for the European Court of Justice. We set it up, but then we allow ourselves to be dragged before it because the Home Secretary cannot move on one key issue and say that exclusion orders must go.

Mr. Howard rose—

Mr. Soley: I will give way briefly as I am under pressure of time.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman referred to the European Court of Justice without mentioning that it upheld the substance of exclusion orders and found that they are entirely in accordance with our obligations under the European convention on human rights. The change that it asked us to make, and which we have made, relates simply to the adaptation of the procedures. On the substance of exclusion orders, the European Court of Justice found in the Government's favour. The fact that there are now so few exclusion orders shows that we use them only when we need to do so.

Mr. Soley: I think that I should claim injury time for that intervention.

The derogation that Britain seeks is intensely damaging and the Government know it. They know that we get more convictions before the European Court of Justice than almost any other European country and we cannot claim otherwise, as we used to be able to do. As one who was brought up to be proud of our parliamentary democracy and the rule of law in Britain, I do not like to see us in that position. It is legislation such as this that does that damage.

The Home Secretary is moving and he should admit it. The figures are coming down dramatically, although that is nothing to do with the ceasefire; it was happening before that. The figures are also coming down dramatically, as the Home Secretary could have said, in another area that is so damaging in the fight against terrorism—the number of people detained but not charged. At one time, as many as 95 per cent. of people detained under the Act were not charged. Can anyone think of any other Act of Parliament under which that would be acceptable? Of course not. Yet that is what we are doing under this legislation.

The figures have dropped dramatically, but the percentages are still worrying. The one area where they have not dropped is also an area where there has not been a move to the benefit of the fight against terrorism and I would ask the Home Secretary to consider it. A growing number of people are not held under a detention order, but simply questioned for fewer than four hours and then released. I am not convinced that the Home Secretary wants to help, but if he does, he should ensure that those figures are also reduced, just as the number of detentions and exclusion orders have been reduced.

This is a fight for hearts and minds. To those Conservative Members who doubt that, I simply say that some years ago I was held for several hours and cross-examined by the East German police when East Germany was still a communist state. I did not know it at the time, but they were worried because I had in my possession an unsigned cheque belonging to a German who was in fact a distant relative and who had given it to me as a present. One can dine out on a story like that for years.

One of the tragedies is that it is not only people who are held under these Acts and then released without charge who become alienated, but their families and friends. That is why I welcome the drop in numbers. In other words, the prevention of terrorism Act—a deeply undesirable Act, as even the Home Secretary seemed to admit in one of his more radical moments—is being used far less often and, in a way, rather more specifically than it was before.

If the Home Secretary had done what many of his predecessors had done and come to the House and said, "Fortunately, I have been able dramatically to cut the use of the Act and I will review it as well," many people would have said, "Hear, hear—well done, Home Secretary, keep on doing that." But he did not. He came with the intention of scoring a few cheap political points and then told everyone that he was proud of being a Conservative and Unionist. Some people would dearly love to recreate the old Conservative and Unionist party, and I know why. But I tell the Home Secretary this: he can never be a Unionist when he says that Northern Ireland is to be treated so totally and utterly differently from the rest of the United Kingdom, that people can be excluded there in the form of internal exile that the Government support. The SDLP and the Official Unionist and Democratic Unionist parties will tell the Home Secretary that that is to treat Northern Ireland as a second-class citizen and not as a proper part of the United Kingdom, so the Home Secretary should not come to the House claiming to be a Unionist and expecting to have Unionist support, because he will not even get it there, where he seeks it most.

I have been opposed to this legislation for many years. The legislation cannot be temporary when it has run for more than 20 years, and we know it. It is deeply offensive to the rule of law and to Britain's tradition of democracy. The numbers being scooped up in its net have changed dramatically over the years and we need to recognise that. It should have been a collection of information Act, because that is what it does and that is the way in which it works. It has not necessarily prevented much terrorism. It has at times, I accept, but it has also acted as one of the best recruiting serjeant majors the IRA could have wished for, enabling the IRA to claim—wrongly, in my judgment—that it could not get justice in British courts.

[Mr. Soley]

We are moving in the right direction, slowly. I hope that Lord Lloyd produces a more fundamental and better analysis than Mr. Rowe. I am not happy with the Rowe report. Its presentation of facts and figures is not good and some other things are missing. But I hope that my hon. Friends will abstain tonight and I hope that the Home Secretary listened to my remarks with care.

5.54 pm

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne): Throughout last year, I spent a lot of time trying to convince myself that we were moving to a situation where these powers were no longer necessary. If I understand Mr. Rowe correctly, however, he tells me in paragraphs 13 and 14 why I was completely wrong to take that view. It bears thinking carefully about. He says:

"The proscribed organisations still maintain their structure and organisation, and murders and assaults are carried out in their name."

He continues:

"Explosive devices have been found: a new mortar device has been developed . . . there is movement of arms about the country . . . Considerable amounts of firearms and explosives are still in the hands of the proscribed organisations and ready for use. Training goes on, and there is still some recruiting".

It is important to note that that was written at a time when there was a ceasefire, not the time after Canary wharf. It is therefore not Canary wharf and what has happened since that makes the renewal necessary. The PTA will remain necessary even if the temporary ceasefire is reinstated.

I want to take a moment or so to explain why I believe that to be the case. I have never had any real doubt that the ceasefire was a temporary truce and a sham. At the very moment when Gerry Adams was shaking Clinton's hand, his friends were building the Canary wharf bomb. The purpose of the Sinn Fein-IRA temporary truce, therefore, was not to help phase out terrorism but to exploit our weakness and to buy time to reorganise and re-equip.

Sinn Fein-IRA has always been and remains, despite its words, a Marxist terrorist group, committed to obtaining by any means at its disposal—including violence—that which it believes in. I still see no sign of willingness on its part to compromise in any way. We therefore have no alternative but to renew the prevention of terrorism Act. Making one-sided compromise after one-sided compromise is no alternative to the PTA. Not only is treating bombers and assassins as though they were democrats not an alternative to the PTA—it is a despicable affront to the people of Northern Ireland.

Even when one accepts the need to renew the PTA, there is a temptation in a debate such as this to focus on whether we need to retain all the powers or whether, as we have just heard, some powers could be phased out. That is not what we should be considering. We should be asking ourselves what more we can do, not what less we can do, to root out terrorism. Mr. Rowe makes it crystal clear that we need each and every one of the powers that we currently have.

One can go through the entire list—proscribing organisations, exclusion orders, investigating funding, section 14 arrests, extension of detention, the port powers and the new powers that were given last year. Mr. Rowe makes it crystal clear that the PTA is needed and that every power in it has his backing. He recommends that we renew them all.

Canary wharf and everything that has happened since therefore confirms not just the need for the Act, but the need to do more. In starting that debate on how to do more, how to extend the PTA and even the emergency powers legislation, we must begin by saying an emphatic simple no to the men of violence. There can be no compromise with evil. That is what the PTA is all about. All terrorists and their apologists must be totally excluded from the entire democratic process unless and until they renounce their terrorism and unless and until they hand over their arms and explosives. Having said that firm no, then—and only then—can we turn to the detailed debate about doing more. That is why I welcome Lord Lloyd's review, and I very much hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, when he winds up the debate, will assure me that Lord Lloyd will not only consider retaining existing powers but will be encouraged to consider additional steps to stamp out terrorism and to bear down on it rather than compromise with it.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wilshire: No. I am very sorry, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have a chance to disagree with me when he makes his speech.

I end by saying a few words about the Labour party and its decision to abstain, which it wants us to believe is proof that it is tough on terrorism. What signal does the Labour party believe that that sends? What signal does it send when it does not have the guts to have an opinion? I gather that what I see as a spineless gesture of abstention is intended to avoid giving Sinn Fein-IRA an excuse to bomb. Have the Opposition not noticed that Sinn Fein-IRA does not need an excuse to bomb? It has been bombing for the past 25 years, and it promises us another 25 years whether or not the Opposition vote today: it does not need an excuse.

Mr. Soley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wilshire: No, I shall not. I am very sorry.

Mr. Soley rose—

Mr. Wilshire: The hon. Gentleman has had his 10 minutes. I now hope that he will let me have mine.

I believe that there is only one honourable course at the end of the debate: to vote one way or the other. I believe passionately that voting in favour of renewal of the pRevention of terrorism Act is the right thing to do. That said, I am willing to admit that I respect the integrity of those who have the guts to vote against it.

6.1 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The Liberal Democrats will vote in favour of the renewal of the legislation tonight, as we have in previous years. We shall not abstain.

Since voting similarly last year, there has, of course, been a resumption of the IRA's bombing campaign, with all the terrible results that flow from that. Any ceasefire, even if it were still in operation, would have some uncertainty about it. An industry of violence has developed in Northern Ireland around the paramilitary organisations. There are, indeed, people who have a habit of violence, which the organisations seem to be having some difficulty in controlling. I have my suspicions that at least some of the assaults and attacks that took place during the ceasefire were carried out by members of the IRA who had nothing better to do and whose determination to continue using violence was channelled into those supposedly disciplinary activities, which, of course, had no shred of justice or legality associated with them. They were a form of intimidation.

Even if the ceasefire were continuing, we would have to keep in place some emergency measures for quite some time. As the Lloyd inquiry assumes, we would need, for the foreseeable future, some anti-terrorist provisions of wider application, which are relevant to other forms of terrorism that are happening around the world and that have some effect in this country.

Mr. Barnes: The IRA has suggested that it may engage in another 25 years of terrorism. Does that mean that the principles that are currently contained in the prevention of terrorism Act and to which the Opposition object so strongly should be in place for another 25 years? Would that help the process?

Mr. Beith: It means that the character of the legislation that we would have for the next 25 years would be influenced by the background of security that it was intended to deal with. It is difficult to speculate about whether the precise powers in the order would continue to prove useful or whether we would need others, which might involve other incursions into civil liberty. Civil liberties in this country will be damaged for as long as a terrorist organisation targets citizens as a means to exert political power. That is utterly deplorable, but it is a harsh reality.

We do not like this legislation, as it involves a curtailment of civil liberties, but bombs in cities curtail civil liberties absolutely and utterly. Therefore, we have to find ways in which to combat those who bring bombs, while minimising the risk to the civil liberties of others, recognising, however, that the threat to most of our citizens is profound. How far can we contest and combat terrorism and maintain our civil liberties? To a large extent, I hope.

What must be clear, of course, is that the legislation and what we keep on the statute book to deal with terrorism is not a part of the negotiating process. It is not part of attempting to secure a renewed ceasefire. It is the subject neither of threats nor of concessions. It is simply what we feel we have to do to protect our citizens. We should neither ease it to obtain concessions from the other side, nor, indeed, attempt to portray it more harshly in the belief that that will somehow frighten or intimidate. We judge it against the clear security background of what is necessary to protect our citizens.

We very much welcome the fact that the Lloyd review is taking place. It is what we asked for. It is a wide-ranging review. The Home Secretary, in his anxiety to make a different point, may have appeared to restrict the significance of Northern Ireland in the Lloyd review. I think that he was trying to make the point that much in the present situation cannot be resolved by the Lloyd review, because he is looking to a period in which we can assume that a long-term peace has been secured. That seemed to imply that Lord Lloyd is not concerned about Northern Ireland; he is, of course.

Any long-term view must take into account the fact that the possibility of any ceasefire will produce dissident elements who may be willing to resume acts of terrorism. We may need legislation on the statute book to cope with that. Lord Lloyd will have to consider what elements of the legislation will need to be in place in the longer term. We have talked to him about that already and expect to do so further. As was implicit in my reply to the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes), there will be problems even if we secure what we hope is a long-term peace, because there will always be those with the possibility of disrupting that peace.

We particularly dislike exclusion orders, to which much reference has been made tonight, and increasingly they are seen to have limited value. The resumption of hostilities on the mainland is, perhaps, the least propitious moment to bring about the final removal of exclusion orders from the mechanisms of counter-terrorism, but it is something that we should consider as soon as possible.

I regard the new procedure, following the Gallagher case, as an improvement. There is an argument to be made about whether it is a good idea to have a judge. It is important that we have someone who is seen to be independent. Judges carry out such work in relation to interception of communications, and their standing gives greater authority to what they do. I do not believe that it has to be a judge. Much hearsay evidence has to be considered in those matters, so we should not pretend that it is a judicial process. It is an independent review of the Executive, and it must be seen to be so. The detention element arises in part from the existence of an appeal procedure. The possibility of people being detained, when it remains possible that they will be allowed to go wherever they want, exists because they are able to challenge what the Home Secretary might otherwise do, which was not previously possible.

It is not a happy state of affairs, and it is not something that I want to keep on the statute book, but as long as it is there, I would like greater safeguards than there have been hitherto, so I support the second order, which provides that.

Detention for up to seven days is an unwelcome feature of this legislation. It is sometimes adversely compared with countries that allow longer detention without charge than is normal under our system. Nevertheless, I would not want to see it as a long-term part of our counter-terrorism legislation, because it has damaging effects, which the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) described, when it impinges on people who have no involvement in violence or terrorism.

The legislation contains uncontroversial provisions with which we do not wish to dispense—for instance, the provisions relating to the control of explosives, fund-raising and the confiscation of funds. There has been a good deal of public discussion about whether funds are being raised for terrorism in the middle east, and whether Hamas has channels for funds in this country. I hope that, if appropriate, the powers in the Act will be used to deal with any such developments.

[Mr. Beith]

The Home Secretary spoke of the work of the police and the Security Service, which have a key role in the fight against terrorism. As I said when we discussed the Security Services Bill, there must be no let-up in the counter-terrorism work of the Security Service for as long as the current bombing campaign continues. I would be worried by any significant transfer of personnel from such work to dealing with organised crime: in the present circumstances, the counter-terrorism campaign should be an absolute priority for the Security Service.

In a similar debate last year, I said that it would be irresponsible to scrap the anti-terrorism legislation entirely, with immediate effect. That is what would have happened if a vote against the Government had been carried that night. I said then that we would vote to renew the Act, although we would continue to demand a general review of its working. Now that there is to be a general review, I feel even more determined that we should ensure that the legislation remains on the statute book, while working for a peace that will mean that at some point in the future our counter-terrorism legislation can make fewer incursions on civil liberties, and can be more directed towards some of the longer-term terrorist threats that will probably always exist.

We must constantly strive to achieve a balance between protecting our citizens from the total destruction of their civil liberties that being bombed, shot or maimed involves, and ensuring that, in providing such protection, we do not create some aspects of the society that the terrorists are wishing on us. We must ensure that we do not further their interests by reducing our civil liberties. Some terrorists, indeed, use the exploitation of the loss of civil liberties as one of their political tools. The more they think that they can make a country ungovernable, the more they think that they can exercise political power from the barrel of a gun or from their bomb-making activities.

That is a difficult balance for any Government to strike, and we shall continue to criticise when we feel that it could have been struck differently. Nevertheless, we do not consider it responsible at this stage to remove the powers that we are using against terrorism from the statute book.

Sir Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I listened with some surprise to the speech of the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). I have listened to debates such as this for many years, but I have never heard the hon. Gentleman or anyone else suggest that, if the number of people excluded ever fell to 35, they would change their mind about whether to oppose the legislation.

I listened with complete amazement to the speech of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). I am sorry that the House is not full, because we have witnessed yet another instance of the undermining of the Labour's party's bid to be credible on law and order. It is almost mind-blowing that a spokesman for that party should argue at the Dispatch Box that it has changed its posture because the Government are setting up a review which is, in fact, irrelevant to Irish terrorism; that he should use as an excuse for the change of heart the fact that a review has been announced, when it was announced on 9 January, before a debate on emergency powers legislation whose Second Reading Labour opposed; and that he should be blissfully unaware that his party voted against Second Reading, insisting when I challenged that that was not so.

Miss Hoey: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Ivan Lawrence: I hope that the hon. Lady will not mind if I do not. I have only 10 minutes in which to speak.

Mr. Straw: If the review has nothing to do with the situation in Ireland, why was it announced on Second Reading of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland?

Sir Ivan Lawrence: The hon. Gentleman has referred to Mr. Rowe's report on the operation of the Act, in which it was made absolutely clear that Lord Lloyd's brief was "To consider the future need for specific counter-terrorism legislation . . . if the cessation of terrorism connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland leads to a lasting peace".

If the hon. Gentleman has not read that, however, I am not surprised, because he had not even read the report of the debate on the emergency powers legislation, and insisted that his party had not voted against it. That shows that the Labour party has no grip on the subject, that its members do not know what they are doing or saying and that, if there is a party fit to lead the country in the attack on terrorism, Labour is definitely not that party.

This is a fitting day on which to debate an Act that is intended to prevent the large-scale slaughter of innocent people. Most law-and-order legislation is directed at catching, convicting and sentencing the perpetrators of violent crime after their deeds have been done; if there is any element of prevention, it lies in establishing so fearsome a law that, if it is enforced efficiently, it may deter some would-be offenders. One of the strengths of this legislation is the fact that it meets the prevention of crime head on by proscribing terrorist organisations, and by excluding people suspected of involvement in terrorism from Great Britain and Northern Ireland as a whole.

Of course that is a form of rough justice, and it may be a denial of civil liberties; but there is ample justification for such action, and if the exclusion is directed in error in any particular case, no great harm is done.

Exclusion should not be seen as a punishment. It is a preventive measure, pure and simple. Moreover, exclusion orders can be reviewed by the Secretary of State if the independent adviser suggests it, or if fresh evidence appears that makes such a review necessary. They do not affect too many people, even if they affect them unjustly: the number of those excluded fell from 68 in 1994 to 35 in 1995—the lowest figure for 20 years. In fact, very few mistakes will have been made over those 35, because we have an exceptionally efficient Secret Intelligence Service.

This part of the legislation is not contrary even to the European convention on human rights. In the Gallagher case, it was made clear that the United Kingdom could derogate from article 5(3) in matters of exclusion and detention. John Rowe QC reviewed the operation of the Act even before the docklands bomb, and decided that it remained necessary to counter the threat of terrorism.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): Will the hon. and learned Gentleman give way?

Sir Ivan Lawrence: No.

Above all, if justice must be rough and the strict obligation to be sure beyond all doubt must be waived, it is because the IRA makes it impossible to obtain evidence for a court by terrifying witnesses. The IRA makes it impossible to secure convictions by terrifying people who, but for the Diplock courts, would serve on a jury. Civil liberties must also be considered from the victim's point of view: the victim of a terrorist attack is entitled to his or her civil liberties, too. So if rough justice is being done, the IRA has no one to blame but itself. And if errors are made, surely it is better to err in an effort to save innocent lives than to err in order to guarantee civil liberties.

It is no surprise that the police support exclusion orders, because their effect is to disrupt terrorist activity. There is no more vital and effective way of preventing terrorism than removing suspected terrorists from areas where they may well be plotting to slaughter innocent people. It would, of course, surprise anyone who did not know the Labour party that the party bidding to form the next Government opposed this order, on civil liberties grounds, for 13 years, and that even today some of its members propose not to go along with the leadership. That shows just how split the Labour party is. By doing that, it was saying, was it not, that it was justified in putting first the civil liberties of persons against whom there was evidence, even if it could not be adduced in a court, showing that they were parties to terrorism.

When the hon. Member for Blackburn says that Labour's change of heart is to stop the wrong message being given to the IRA, he is making it clear that for years the party was giving the wrong message to the IRA and to the nation. In an article in Tribune on 8 March, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) said:

"When Straw announced on television that Labour was no longer going to oppose the continuation of the Prevention of Terrorism Act, he argued that, following the ending of the IRA ceasefire, it would send the wrong message to the IRA that somehow Labour was being soft on terrorism . . . It suggests that Roy Hattersley, Gerald Kaufman and the entire Labour leadership were, at the height of the IRA campaigns and atrocities, by opposing the PTA, sending out signals to the IRA that they were soft on terrorism."

How on earth can anyone call a decision to abstain, which I understand Labour intends to take, a clear message to the IRA?

It is obvious that Labour has woken up to the fact that it is suffering in the public eye by being soft on crime and its causes. It has decided to give a clear signal to the British people that it is "tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime"—by abstaining.

Part of the legislation helps to protect innocent people from international terrorism—one of the blots from which the world is at present suffering. As new nation states emerge and states become unstable, international terrorism may grow. Terrorism is being used at the moment to undermine the peace in the middle east, with the most horrific acts of violence in Jerusalem and in Tel Aviv and other parts of Israel. We have to play our part in helping to defeat international terrorism. We have pledged ourselves to do that by international treaties and agreements, and we are doing it by this legislation. We do it by helping to plug the hole in current legislation—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I call Sir James Molyneaux.

Mr. Mullin: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We have been debating the Act for almost two hours. Forty minutes from now, the Front-Bench spokesmen will begin to sum up. The House has not yet heard anyone who is opposed to the Act. I hope that in the next 40 minutes someone will be permitted to put the opposition case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Sir James Molyneaux.

6.22 pm

Sir James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): I shall not seek to follow that point of order, but it seems to me that a great many groans, moans and supplementaries showed a fair measure of dissent from the side of the House on which I sit.

In last year's debate on this legislation, my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) expressed the hope, which was shared by many of us—perhaps all of us—that there might be no need for the renewal that we are debating. He said:

"it is important that we do not lose the protection that the Prevention of Terrorism Act and the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act provide with regard to terrorist acts. It is not wise to leave the United Kingdom without some permanent protection."—[Official Report, 8 March 1995; Vol. 256, c. 379-80.]

That has been the consistent view of my party for well over 20 years. It was because of our concern for the protection of the United Kingdom that the right hon. Enoch Powell persuaded a Committee examining the Act to extend its scope to deal with international terrorism. Not for the first time was he criticised, and not for the first or last time was Enoch Powell proved correct in his prediction. For what other reasons would the leaders of the world's nations gather in Egypt this very week? I imagine that the British delegation will have been surprised by the resolute approach of some other participating nations, most of which regard Britain as a soft touch for evil-doers. They may have derived that impression from making the mistake of reading Hansard in their native tongue.

In the House, there has been a marked reluctance to recognise the enormity of the challenge of international terrorism to democracy and civilisation. Wishful thinking clouds judgment to an extent that confounds many of our friends elsewhere. For example, several months ago at an Australian international airport, I complimented the security chief on the rigorous checking system employed at the airport. Innocently, I asked him whether it was intended to relax the measures in view of the IRA ceasefire. His reply was significant. He said, "No. The IRA ceasefire is only a small blip. We have to develop even more effective measures, mindful of the known fact that international terrorism will be a permanent affliction." Glancing at my boarding pass, he said, "Well, have a good trip, but remember that the jumbo jet is the most vulnerable element in modern society." That was a chilling thought to take home with me.

There are those who are ever-vigilant in their concern for the protection of human rights. They have been consistent, and one must admire their stand. They highlight, for example, exclusion orders, seven-day detentions and powers of arrest and search. But those are mere infringements that are reversible and have proved to be reversible—all of them. However, the obliteration of the human right to life is totally irreversible. What right of appeal was open to the Lockerbie victim, and what redress is available to an Israeli child who has been blown to bits? What can compensate the murdered newsagents at Canary wharf? It is of no avail to say that two wrongs do not make one right, but that is not the equation. The seven-day prisoner will be released, but the murdered citizen cannot have his life restored. The longer Governments dither over mere inconveniences, the more murders and mass murders there will be. That is the real, true moral challenge to all of us.

For the second half of this century, the NATO shield protected the free world from the horrors of both conventional and nuclear wars. We now have to ensure that this week's summit in Egypt leads to the establishment of a mechanism that is just as effective in its own way, as was NATO, in protecting democracy and civilisation from terrorist machines every bit as deadly as old-style warfare.

In my maiden speech in 1971, I explained that in Northern Ireland we were seeing for the first time in Europe a demonstration of urban guerilla warfare. The pattern evolving at that time and the product have been successfully exported to many parts of the world. It follows that the civilised world must construct a counter-terrorist organisation on the lines that were mentioned today by the Prime Minister during questions. We were all greatly encouraged to hear him say that the first step towards that goal would take place within a fortnight.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): We have heard a reasoned and sensible speech from my right hon. Friend the Member for Lagan Valley (Sir J. Molyneaux) on the broad issues of terrorism. I should like to develop that theme a bit. This afternoon, we have discussed the terror inflicted on innocent children in a ghastly slaughter in Dunblane. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has returned from talks in Sharm el-Sheikh, where he has been discussing international terrorism, so it is especially apt that we should be discussing the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989.

As has rightly been pointed out, we live in an increasingly dangerous world where buses blow up in Tel Aviv and in the Aldwych. We see much violence on our screens, be it fictional or showing real incidents. That violence may have influenced Mr. Hamilton, the maniac in Dunblane. Other influences, voices and propaganda encourage people such as Edward O'Brien, who was blown up in the Aldwych. We should ask whether society should have the powers to defend itself against organised terrorism.

That is why I welcome the review under Lord Lloyd. It is right and important to review counter-terrorist measures. Legislation should cover the whole of the United Kingdom, not just part of it. The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act covers Northern Ireland. This part of the UK is covered by the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act. Legislation covering the whole country would be more logical.

As the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley said, international terrorism is a threat in the United Kingdom. There have been recent attacks against Israeli targets. There is a fatwa against Salman Rushdie. Organisations here have links with Hamas. Further back, Georgi Markhov was murdered on Hungerford bridge by the Bulgarian secret service. International terrorism poses real threats to life and limb in this country. We should have the means to defend ourselves and the necessary tools in the locker to protect society.

I differ from the hon. Member for Redcar (Ms Mowlam), who said:

> "I do not believe . . . that we need to keep emergency powers on the statute book when we do not have an emergency all the time."—[Official Report, 9 January 1996; Vol. 269, c. 42.]

Internationally, the development of emergencies is growing. We should be able to keep some of those powers in abeyance, but the world is not becoming safer, so at the moment we need them.

Some of reasons why we must have the emergency provisions Act have been mentioned. The reasons include the fact that terrorists are not reasonable people. Sinn Fein spokesmen deny the truth when they speak on television. Last month, I heard Martin McGuinness interviewed on the BBC. For more than a minute, he was not interrupted by the interviewer. When does a Cabinet Minister escape being interrupted for more than a minute?

Sinn Fein spokesmen will twist the truth and brazenly say that black is white, and that the Government are to blame for the end of the ceasefire. That is patently untrue. As has been mentioned, Sinn Fein-IRA rely on crime for a large part of their income, as well as on gullible United States citizens. They rely on racketeering and on corruption.

I welcome last December's Proceeds of Crime (Northern Ireland) Order 1996, but Sinn Fein-IRA remain inextricably linked to crime, as do some Protestant paramilitaries. I was always opposed to the broadcasting ban on Sinn Fein and on the other paramilitaries. I should welcome some tough questioning. I wonder whether interviewers are intimidated by stony-faced terrorist sympathisers, some of whom are convicted terrorists with blood on their hands. I wonder whether Sinn Fein spokesmen have been schooled in resisting interrogation and being interviewed, because they stand there saying that black is white.

I make a plea to broadcasters, if any are listening. They should remember whom they are questioning, and be a little more forthright.

Intimidation is a real factor, which is why we need these provisions. There is intimidation against populations, voters, witnesses to crime on the mainland and witnesses in Northern Ireland, which Northern Ireland Members will know much more about than me. I remember bus drivers being held up with weapons and refusing to testify because they feared for their lives. There is intimidation here in relation to terrorism.

I should like to mention, in a slight digression perhaps, that there is intimidation against politicians in the House. Journalists have told me that some hon. Members are unwilling to speak openly on Northern Ireland. I urge my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, remembering the deaths of Airey Neave and of Ian Gow, to revisit the question of—

Mr. McNamara: What about Robert Bradford?

Mr. Robathan: I have yet to finish.

I urge my right hon. and learned Friend to revisit the question of candidates' addresses on nomination and ballot papers. That was considered in early 1992. I understand that that was backed by the Labour party. We give a gift to terrorists.

Northern Irish politicians live with that nightmare the whole time. Mr. Bradford has just been mentioned. Several hon. Members have been attacked. Lord Fitt from the other place was attacked in Andersonstown. More recently, the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor) and others were attacked.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim): The family of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea).

Mr. Robathan: I hear a sedentary intervention. Many hon. Members have been attacked and intimidated. I pay tribute to the bravery of hon. Members who still return here despite those attacks, but we should not assist terrorists, be they republican or loyalist, by giving them the gift of the home addresses of people who wish to speak out.

Here and in Northern Ireland, we need the extended powers that the EPA gives us. We are not dealing with cosy criminals from a "Dixon of Dock Green" wonderland. There is no honour among these thieves. The atrocities in Northern Ireland are too many to mention, but I recall the children murdered in Warrington. What brave boyos those murderers were. What courage they showed for the cause—another stain on the history of Ireland. A united Ireland is a respectable political aspiration, but those murders differed from those in Dunblane only in the number killed.

In August 1919, Siegfried Sassoon wrote a poem entitled "Aftermath". It stated:

"Have you forgotten yet?"

I say to Opposition Members who are considering voting against these measures—have they forgotten the Baltic exchange, Canary wharf, the mortars at Heathrow and other outrages? Has anyone been caught? I fear not, but at least we give the security forces all possible assistance.

The rule of law has been mentioned. The Government must act within the rule of law. Where they do not do so, or where their agents do not so, the judiciary should and does act. Generally the police have acted reasonably with the powers that have been given. The hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) may disagree, but the police are well motivated and reasonable, in marked contrast with the opponents they face.

Was Edward O'Brien 21? I think so. He was recruited by the lies and deceits of the IRA, destined to blow himself to bits and injure others, including a poor unfortunate fellow Irishman. Some hon. Members would say that that is no justification for giving the police the powers to stop and search someone whom they suspect, yet there are other sleepers and other IRA cells in this country. We must have the power to stop, search and detain if necessary. The Bill allows the exclusion of suspects. This country's population want the police to defend them and have the other powers that are given.

This is not a totalitarian measure. It is to protect the citizens of the United Kingdom. Hon. Members who oppose it show how gullible they are. I would accuse most of the Members who will do so this evening not of having sympathy for the IRA, but of extreme foolish and misguided ideology. The hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) talked of political prisoners. That says more about his gullibility, blinkered views and instincts than anything else. I hope that his comment is duly published in the newspapers.

The Labour party, I regret, is not backing this measure. I hope that it will convert at the last moment, support the Government, and show that it is not soft on terrorism.

6.38 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Today, we celebrate the release of the Birmingham Six. That terrible explosion was the cause of this legislation. Many of us were panicked into voting for it because we saw it as a means of protecting the Irish population in this country against what was happening to them as a result of that terrible episode. This is the fifth anniversary of release of the Birmingham Six, and the people who perpetrated that foul bombing are still at large. They have not been captured, for all the years that we have had the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989.

The last time we debated the Act, my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) moved an amendment. It said:

"this House, reasserting its determination to defeat terrorism and believing that the defeat of terrorism in Northern Ireland can only be achieved with the wholehearted support of law-abiding citizens, declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill that undermines the rule of law on which the fight against terrorism must be based; and refuses to provide permanent powers either for a suspect to be detained for seven days without charge or for exclusion orders that effectively impose internal exile on British citizens, since such powers are wrong in principle and, by the offence they cause, aid rather than combat terrorists and terrorism".—[Official Report, 6 December 1988; Vol. 143, c. 215.]

The question we have to ask today is whether that position has altered in respect of the reasons why the Opposition voted for that reasoned amendment and against the Bill. My hon. Friends the Members for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) and for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) would argue that it has, and that the change has been the result of the Government's decision to appoint a commission, presided over by Lord Justice Lloyd and assisted by Mr. Justice Kerr, to determine what anti-terrorist legislation we might need in the event of a cessation of hostilities in Northern Ireland.

There is no cessation of hostilities in Northern Ireland. I regret that very much; I wish there were. I wish that the terms and conditions under which Lord Justice Lloyd is looking at these matters really existed, that the premise was there—but that is not the case. It is standing logic on its head to say that the Labour party reverses its position because of a Government decision based on a proposition which, sadly, has not become reality. Like everyone else, I hope that there will be an unconditional ceasefire today, but that has not yet happened. Therefore, the premise on which the Labour party has decided to abstain tonight does not exist.

Let us take the matter one stage further, and suppose that Lord Justice Lloyd produces his report in a vacuum and recommends that we should retain detention for seven days and exclusion orders. Do we then suddenly change our position and say, "Well, the referee, that impartial judge who has been appointed, does not accept our principles, so we must either accept what he says or reject what he says and vote accordingly"? Where is the consistency in that? There is none, so it is wrong of us to think or act in those terms.

During my happy days on the Front Bench, I spent some time looking at the question of a judicial commission. We did so in an attitude of trying to help a Government who seemed to be impaled upon the horns of seven-day detention and exclusion orders. We wanted to get away from those. However, the principles behind our suggestions were never accepted by the Government.

There was never any inter-party agreement to sit down and talk through the issues, which was our first proposition. Our second, for an independent commission, was never accepted while the fighting was continuing and the terror still existed. During that time, there was an elision of the principle of being against seven-day detention and internal exile, and a sudden belief in the "principle" of a judicial inquiry. Surely that is not in any way a principle.

If we get a decision we like, is there any guarantee that the Government will come through with it? From what we have heard from the Home Secretary today, it seems that the Government are implacably of the belief that they must retain exclusion orders and seven-day detention, without a judicial element. Did the Home Secretary say today that, if Lord Justice Lloyd came out with such and such a proposition, the Government would immediately embrace it? Has he given an undertaking that, when we get the result of the inquiry in the autumn, if it embraces certain suggestions we will have immediate legislation to put them into effect? Far from it. Considering the proposition for an independent judge is just putting off the problem until after the next general election. It is an easy way out.

We supported the proposition for a commission, but we never said that the exclusion orders and seven-day detention were anything other than wrong in principle, wrong in their effect. As a recruiting agent for the IRA, they have been without parallel.

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan): In about an hour, barring an unforeseen accident, the House will renew the Act. It will still contain the power for the Home Secretary to sign exclusion orders. My hon. Friend is aware of the case of John Matthews, to which I referred from the Front Bench when I was my hon. Friend's deputy. The Home Secretary can still sign an exclusion order for a young man who was set free from a magistrates court without a stain on his character. That power will be retained this evening, no matter what we do.

Mr. McNamara: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising a point that I had intended to make. The Home Secretary, in his speech, condemned left, right and centre people suspected of planting bombs, evil crimes, murder and so on. He put labels on people, yet not one of them is able to defend himself, to see the evidence or to go before a jury in this country or a Diplock court to defend himself. The Home Secretary engaged in some of the most terrible smearing imaginable. It puts those people in ghettos where they become walking targets, find it difficult to get jobs, and are unable to go out of their areas without being attacked.

I want to return to the Opposition's attitude. We are renewing these provisions in March. What happens if there is not a general election—the Government do not want one—until next spring, with Lord Justice Lloyd coming along with his report but the Government doing nothing? Why do we have to go through all this again, especially if Lord Justice Lloyd does not come down on our side? If he does come down on our side and we have the order, there will be the nonsense of voting on that occasion, but not on this one. It does not make sense.

I say to my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench that they cannot run before this particular Home Secretary, because he will get them every time. The logic is that, by abstaining, we are in effect voting for these provisions. There is no choice; there is no question of abstention—we are either for the provisions or we are against them. We welcome a judicial inquiry, but we should still stand firm against renewing the provisions.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): There have been some remarks about being soft on terrorism. I have always regarded this debate as a litmus test on being soft on terrorism. Anyone who believes that any of us who come here as representatives of the north of Ireland are soft on terrorism should come and stay where we live, and he will find out about that.

I speak against, and will vote against, the motion for two reasons. My position is based on two basic principles of justice which do not, cannot and should not change with the political climate; which do not, cannot and should not change with the mood; and which do not, cannot and should not change with the feeling that is prevalent at any given time. It is not easy to speak against this Act today, after what happened in Scotland yesterday, but those principles must remain, and they are tied by two elements of the Act.

The first is the power of detention for seven days without any judicial assessment—contrary to the European convention on human rights—which is wrong, irrespective of the year or the circumstances. The second element is the power to exclude people in this jurisdiction, which is not only outside the norm of national and international law, but antipathetic to it.

The principles cannot be bartered away or be conditional on any prevalent mood. Nor can the debate be dispensed with by sleight of hand, on the fragile and probably fallacious argument that, as Micawber said, something might turn up. For Micawber insert Lloyd. Something will not turn up, as my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) correctly predicted.

When I heard the Labour party's decision to abstain, I felt obliged to look through copies of Hansard for the past 10 years that I have been a Member to find out what new elements I had not identified and what had changed since we last voted on the subject. I did not find any new element, except the proposed Lloyd review. Indeed, the principles that I hold were expressed by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) when he said:

"the only safeguard . . . against arbitrary arrest is a review by some authority outside the Government who arrested him or her."

That remains a principle to which I adhere, as I hope all hon. Members do.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook also expressed his opinion on the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights when he said:

"The fact that the Government have chosen to ignore or defy that judgment . . . is in itself cause for us to vote against the order."

That remains a cause for me to vote against the Act. He expanded on the point when he said:

"A second cause is a renewal of the powers that, in the words of a previous Attorney-General, amount to 'internal exile'—the exclusion orders."—[Official Report, 6 March 1990; Vol. 168, c. 822.]

I will not just cite the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook as an authority on the subject. I refer the House to what the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said in a similar debate:

"Exclusion orders represent an Executive power of such force that it belongs to an authoritarian regime and is unlike anything in the British tradition of parliamentary democracy . . . They are unacceptable to all true democrats".—[Official Report, 30 January 1989; Vol. 146, c. 31.]

They are unacceptable to me, and I hope that they are unacceptable to other hon. Members too.

The power of seven-day detention has been abused. The former Home Secretary, Sir Leon Brittan, allowed it to be abused when he defined two reasons why it could be used. He said that it could be used "first, as a deterrent to persons other than the people who have been detained and, secondly", because it has

"enabled information to be obtained that was of direct value in the battle against terrorism, even though it did not lead to action against the people concerned."—[Official Report, 24 October 1983; Vol. 47, c. 55-6.]

There is a dilution of the principles of law in a statement by a former Home Secretary.

Such dilution has affected many people—mostly Irish people in Britain. We are all appalled by the bomb attack in which a young man was killed. Does anybody know the name of the young man who was injured in that incident? His name was Paul Woodhead, who ended up in hospital under armed guard and was detained under the PTA. He was the only person of all those who were injured to be put in that position—why? Because he is Irish. Although I understand the position in which people find themselves after an explosion, that is too much of a coincidence. I simply use that one example, but I could use many more.

The proposed review—regardless of whether Lord Lloyd turns out to be Micawber—is not the first that has been carried out by eminent jurists. Reviews have been carried out by Lord Jellicoe, Lord Shackleton, Lord Gardiner, Sir Cyril Phillips, Lord Colville, Sir George Baker and John Rowe. They all conducted either detailed or broad reviews of the operation of the Acts, and they all have one thing in common: when they recommended changes to the fundamental principles, the Government ignored them. The Government ignored their suggestions about exclusion orders and a judicial element in the seven-day detention power.

What should we expect from the latest review? Where is the confidence that, somehow or other, the Government will be convinced that the situation has changed so much that they should accept the review? I cannot make that act of faith in Lord Lloyd, any more than I could in John Rowe or any of the noble Lords who reviewed the legislation.

When the Home Secretary referred to the input of a judicial element in the seven-day detention power in last year's debate, he said that the Government had carried out a review, and informed us:

"We have considered whether there might be a different way to achieve that objective, and we have come to the conclusion that there is not."—[Official Report, 9 March 1994; Vol. 239, c. 305.]

Lord Lloyd is going to review a proposed judicial element, yet the Government's view is that things will not change, irrespective of what he presents to the House.

I leave the last word on the subject to the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley), whose speech I listened to with great interest, and some alarm. I wrote down at the time the words that he used in a television interview he gave on "Newsnight", so I know that I am not misquoting him. He said of the PTA:

"it is a bad Act, and it needs to go."

I believe that it is a bad Act. I believe that it needs to go. But the only way in which I can try to ensure that is by voting against it tonight, as I hope every hon. Member who feels that way will do, given that it abuses the principles of law.

6.57 pm

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): I consider the term prevention of terrorism Act a misnomer; it has not prevented terrorism. Twenty-two years ago, it was rushed through both Houses of Parliament in the aftermath of the Birmingham bombings. It has certainly not helped to catch the real culprits and, since then, many innocent people have been arrested and detained under it. We should be very wary about simple knee-jerk reactions to acts of terrorism.

We all condemn the atrocities, including the recent London bombings, and want to bring the perpetrators to justice. Lord Colville, who conducted a review of the PTA, said:

"if we stoop to the level of the terrorists and abandon altogether our fundamental liberties, we have lost the battle against terrorism."

I was a Member of Parliament when the original legislation was enacted. Even Lord Jenkins, the Home Secretary at the time, admitted that it was a draconian measure. Exclusion orders are a form of internal exile by ministerial decree. Ministers can order detention for up to seven days with no judicial hearing. It is no wonder that such extreme powers were found to be in breach of the European convention on human rights and that the British Government had to seek a derogation from the convention.

Since the introduction of the prevention of terrorism Act, 448 people have been served with exclusion orders—33 of which are still in force. Since 1974, more than 27,000 people have been detained under the PTA and about 85 per cent. of them were not charged with any offence. It is a very blunt instrument and it could prove counter-productive in the campaign against terrorism. Good police-community relations are absolutely essential in that campaign, and the prevention of terrorism Act has succeeded in alienating many innocent people, their families and their communities. It has caused hostility between communities and the police, particularly among young people, who are often arrested and detained—their only crime being their Irish accent, Irish name or Irish family connections.

Since last year's debate, the Government have established another review, to be undertaken by Lord Lloyd of Berwick. I have no great confidence that he will tackle the basic problem. His terms of reference are as follows:

"To consider the future need for specific counter-terrorism legislation in the United Kingdom, if the cessation of violence connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland leads to a lasting peace".

As we all now know, that is a big "if". It could be argued that those terms of reference have been tragically overtaken by events in view of the IRA's deplorable decision to end the ceasefire. I think that the Home Secretary said in his opening remarks that the Lloyd review has precious little to do with terrorism related to the Irish situation. Given that fact, I do not expect Lloyd to recommend scrapping the exclusion orders and introducing a judicial element into detention orders. At best, we simply do not know what Lloyd will recommend. It would be naive to buy a pig in a poke by voting for continuing the Act or abstaining in the hope that Lloyd will address the legitimate criticisms that have been made.

I have voted against this draconian legislation for many years and nothing that I have heard tonight has persuaded me to do otherwise. If the Government are serious about eliminating terrorism, they should repeal all such oppressive legislation, establish better police-community relations, and accelerate the peace process so that the terrorists and potential terrorists can see clearly that democratic and exclusively peaceful means are the only way to make progress and to build a better society based on peace, justice and equality.

7.2 pm

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): I am grateful to be called to speak in the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker—particularly in light of my recent point of order. It is a pleasure to be associated with the principled stand taken by the hon. Members for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), for Belfast, West (Dr. Hendron) and for South Down (Mr. McGrady). No one could accuse them of being soft on terrorism: they must live with the realities of it every day.

Although I am well aware of his general view of the world, I was a little disappointed by the contribution of the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence), who is a distinguished lawyer and a part-time judge. I was disappointed to hear him talk quite enthusiastically about the need for rough justice. That gives us a glimpse of the judicial thinking that perhaps got us into the difficulties that we were in a few years ago.

I am as much in favour of catching terrorists as anyone—indeed, I have had rather better luck than the British authorities in tracking down the odd terrorist, without having the prevention of terrorism Act or any other such powers at my disposal. I should state at the outset that my interest is in justice—particularly British justice. I do not believe that the Act has led to the arrest and conviction of terrorists who would not otherwise have been arrested and convicted. However, I believe that it has led to the harassment of many decent people who are not terrorists.

I accept, as some have argued, that the Act is no longer used—or misused—as much as it was in the past and I welcome that fact. I think that that is probably because of the pressure that the Opposition have maintained for the past 13 or 14 years in voting against the measure.

I accept that there might be a case for some of the provisions in the Act, which my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) mentioned. Like most hon. Members who have spoken, I find exclusion orders distasteful, but they are not as effective as Ministers seem to think. One of the first people to be excluded under an exclusion order was one of the organisers of the Birmingham pub bombings. He should not have been excluded, but arrested and put on trial. On another occasion, I met someone who had been excluded who returned to the country during his period of exclusion and even visited friends in prison.

For all the talk, exclusion orders are not as effective as the Home Secretary appears to think. However, that is not the fundamental reason why I shall vote against the measure this evening. My principal objection arises from section 14(5) of the Act, which gives the Secretary of State power to extend, to up to seven days, the holding of prisoners incommunicado and without the safeguards of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. That is the bottom line as far as I am concerned: I shall not vote for any measure that allows prisoners to be held incommunicado for up to seven days. I know from experience—as we all should by now—that it is possible to get anyone to confess to anything if he or she is at one's disposal for seven days and nights. Perhaps the Home Secretary or Lord Lloyd of Berwick might consider extending the provisions of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 to cover those who are arrested in connection with terrorism.

My attitude will be changed not by a review, but by a change in the Act. Until the Act, or section 14(5), is changed, I propose to continue to vote against it.

7.7 pm

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): I begin by offering the apologies—as did my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw)—of my hon. Friends the Members for Redcar (Ms Mowlam) and for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) who, with many hon. Members from Northern Ireland and others, are in the United States at this particularly significant time.

As the House knows, the measures that we are considering today have their origins in the response to the slaughter that resulted from the Birmingham pub bombings in 1974. I have a very clear recollection of those outrages, as I am sure do all hon. Members. I remember them particularly for the reaction of one Irish person who had been resident in London for more than 40 years, 15 of which were spent serving in the Royal Air Force, including the whole of the second world war. He was working for the Post Office, as he had done for 20 years. He felt unable to go to work, or even to leave the house, on the day after the bombings, not because he feared abuse or worse, but because he felt deeply ashamed at being Irish and at what had been done allegedly in his name. He was a mature, well-established British citizen who had his home and his family in London. Tragically, his experience was not unique. It has been shared by far too many other members of the Irish community both then and since. I know that that is true because that man was my father.

In the past 25 years or so, the gunmen and the bombers of the IRA, in their culpable distortion of the tradition of Irish republicanism, far from advancing peace and freedom in Ireland, have brought untold suffering, misery, distress and disgrace upon Irish people wherever they might be. It would be hard to find a better exposition of that than the extraordinary and resonant speech of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) on the Third Reading of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill a few weeks ago. I recommend study of it to every hon. Member.

The return of the so-called bombing campaign by the IRA has had a particular significance in Lewisham, part of which I represent. The Aldwych bus bomber was staying in a flat in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice). The 171 bus left Catford bus garage on that fateful Sunday evening and the driver who, thankfully, is making a good recovery, lives in Brockley in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms Ruddock). One of the tragic victims of the South Quay atrocity lived in Downham, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East. Lewisham has a large and well-established Irish community and those events have done nothing to its benefit—as is true of the rest of the country.

I was particularly struck by what the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh said about the experience of Mr. Paul Woodhead, who happened to be an innocent Irishman in the wrong place. Although it should be placed on record that his family in Dublin quite understood why security forces here and in the Republic had to take certain precautions, one can imagine their horror when the Gardai turned up on their doorstep to tell them that he had been seriously injured—I am pleased to hear that he is recovering—and that he was suspected of having been deeply involved in an IRA atrocity in London.

As has been said, tonight's debate is about means and not ends. There can be no dispute that all hon. Members are resolutely determined to stop the inhuman brutality of terrorism wherever it may occur and whoever perpetrates it. The discussion centres on the effectiveness of the proposed measures and the circumstances to which they apply.

The Home Secretary and my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn, among others, have made it plain that the circumstances are different now from what they were a year ago. The Home Secretary said that the circumstances had not been the same in any of the years in which he has dealt with the matter. The Government's agreement to establish a review, under Lord Lloyd of Berwick, of temporary and emergency powers to counter the terrorist threat—for which we have been pressing for a number of years—is most positive. Some hon. Members may feel that it is not change enough, but without doubt the most negative change since last year has been the ending of the IRA ceasefire and the assertion by Sinn Fein that the peace process is finished.

Our forthright response is twofold. First, we should state categorically that the search for a lasting peace with security in Britain and Ireland will never be over—under any Government, here or in Dublin—until it has achieved its end. The only choice is about whether any party or group wishes to take the necessary steps to join in that endeavour. It will never be easy, but that is inevitable.

Secondly, no democratic Government or society can allow those who use violence, subversion and intimidation to have a veto over progress towards the just settlement that is craved by the overwhelming majority of decent people throughout these islands.

One of the most insidious threats to democracy from those who sponsor and practise terror is that they provoke a disproportionate response from those they attack, which they can then use as a spurious retrospective justification for their actions. There can never be any doubt that terrorism will be resisted by all necessary means, but we must always ensure that we do not fall into that devious trap.

In a recent written answer, the Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office, the right hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), who is not in his place, stated:

> "Whatever the law . . . should be, it is clearly essential that it should allow for the efficient use of public resources; pay due regard to public safety yet be no more restrictive than absolutely necessary, and be capable of being effectively applied and not open to abuse."—[Official Report, 26 January 1996; Vol. 270, c. 402.]

I am certain that all hon. Members will agree. Certainly Opposition Members do—it is a model of its kind. The only argument that arose when I quoted that sentence to the Minister when the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill was discussed in Committee, concerned how the current proposals compared with that standard.

We are dealing with an entirely reasonable and legitimate subject on which hon. Members have strong views. The measures have far-reaching consequences. There should be no doubt that we are prepared to take whatever action is appropriate to defend democracy, its citizens and its freedoms against any group that threatens it, but in our unflinching determination to do so, we must be certain that we do not make an already difficult task harder by neglecting or overlooking the very values for which our society stands.

Some hon. Members have asked what store we set by Lord Lloyd. Others, most notably the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence), clearly do not understand the purpose of the Lloyd review. It is plainly absurd for him to assert that it has nothing to do with Northern Ireland. Not only was it announced in the House on 9 January by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, but Lord Lloyd will be assisted in his deliberations by Mr. Justice Kerr, who has been appointed specifically because he is a judge in the High Court in Northern Ireland. It is absurd for the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that there is no impact on Northern Ireland.

It is disingenuous in the extreme for the Home Secretary to minimise what he feels will emerge from the Lloyd review. I would say that it is unworthy of the Home Secretary to be so inflammatory, but it may be unworthy of the office of Home Secretary rather than the Home Secretary himself. We do not prejudge the outcome of the Lloyd review.

The hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) said that he would prefer there to be a single, comprehensive package of anti-terrorist legislation. That is precisely what we have been pursuing and urging on the Government for many years. We hope that Lord Lloyd will be able to make such a recommendation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn explained that we have strong reservations about the current legislation but, as he also made plain, we have no objection to the bulk of its provisions and are in favour of their continuing. Indeed, there might be a case for strengthening some of them. It seems odd that the Home Secretary should diminish what is likely to emerge from the Lloyd review—

Sir Ivan Lawrence: He does not.

Mr. Dowd: The hon. and learned Member for Burton says that he does not, but I am sure that the Home Secretary is perfectly capable of making his own defence. I understand that the hon. and learned Member for Burton has represented various dubious clients in the past, including the Kray brothers, but he should not let his enthusiasm run away with him when defending the Home Secretary.

The Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill was brought in for a two-year period—the preceding measure ran for five years—precisely so that it could be open to the amendment and revision that we hope the review will recommend. We believe that the review is long overdue, and we hope that Lord Lloyd will reach the same conclusion as Lord Colville and that the legislation can be improved so that it stops being in part—and only in part—counter-productive and measures up to the standard of security that the British people have every right to expect.

Mr. Howard: With the leave of the House, I should like to pick up the main themes that have emerged from the debate and respond to some of the points that have been raised.

As in previous years, much has been made of the exclusion power. We have heard objections to it on grounds of civil liberties or its being an unacceptable form of internal exile. As I have already made clear, it is a power that has been used sparingly and carefully over the past year and there are only 33 exclusion orders currently in force—less than half the number at the beginning of 1995.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Does the Home Secretary agree that it is dangerous for any Minister to have the use of exclusion powers, and that it is doubly dangerous to have exclusion powers that cannot be contested in a court of law and, therefore, are not open to public examination? That is condemned around the world and it should be condemned here as well.

Mr. Howard: It has not been condemned by people who have examined the issue, including Mr. Rowe, because they know that it would be naive and irresponsible for a Government to abandon the power of exclusion while the IRA maintains its weapons, explosives and the will to use them.

I will put it plainly to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) and others who think like him. If we had obtained intelligence of who was planning to carry out the South Quay bombing, or of Edward O'Brien's purpose in coming to London to lie low with a stock of Semtex, I would have had no qualms in excluding them and using the powers that the prevention of terrorism Act provides. I do not believe that anyone has the "civil liberty" to travel around the United Kingdom to commit whatever acts of terrorism he pleases. I am far more concerned with the civil liberty to run a newsagents in docklands without the roof being blown in on top of one, or to catch a No. 171 bus without it blowing up in the Strand. Those are the civil liberties about which I care passionately.

Mr. Corbyn rose—

Mr. McNamara rose—

Mr. Howard: I shall not give way again. I was generous in giving way during my opening remarks, and now I want to finish in the time allotted to me.

As for extensions of detention under section 14 of the Act, to which the hon. Member for Sunderland, South referred, I give my personal authority for any detention beyond 48 hours. In doing so, I look at the case put by the police—including, for example, the need not simply for questioning, but for further inquiries or searches to be made or, with foreign suspects, for suspicious material to be translated. I take into account any intelligence that might justify the inquiries. Where an extension of detention is necessary for investigative purposes, I authorise it, for the period necessary.

The hon. Member for Sunderland, South was wrong when he suggested that it is possible under section 14 for a person to be detained for seven days, incommunicado and without seeing a solicitor. The maximum time that the right to consult a solicitor can be delayed, and then only for the specific purposes set out in section 14, is 48 hours. The maximum time for which contact with a solicitor can be delayed in non-PTA cases is 36 hours. The hon. Gentleman attached great significance to those powers this evening and on the "Today" programme this morning, but he is mistaken in his interpretation of section 14. The difference between that section and the ordinary application of the law outwith the prevention of terrorism Act is limited.

Mr. Mullin: Is the Home Secretary saying that no one has ever been held, without access to a solicitor, for more than 48 hours under the Act?

Mr. Howard: I have no knowledge of anybody being held for more than 48 hours, for which section 14 provides—the power that we are debating this evening, and which the hon. Gentleman misinterpreted or misunderstood.

It was suggested that the power of detention should include a judicial element, but the decision to detain cannot sensibly be taken by anyone who does not have access to the full intelligence picture that enables an informed judgment to be made. The introduction of a judicial element has been rejected in a series of reviews of the Act—by Lord Shackleton in 1978, by Lord Jellicoe in 1983 and by Viscount Colville in 1987. Mr. Rowe deals with the matter in chapters 6 and 8 of his report, in which he succinctly, but clearly, sets out the arguments against judicial intervention. I shall not repeat the arguments because they are set out for all to see in the report.

Perhaps the most difficult issue to address is the funding of terrorist operations in other countries. Whatever legislation is in place, it is extremely difficult to get the evidence necessary to secure a conviction. Money can be laundered through various routes, and some may be used for humanitarian purposes as a cover. As soon as one, supposedly innocent, fund-raising activity is exposed, the collecting tins come out under another guise. To tackle that, we need close and careful international co-operation. In many cases, it may be best to tackle the fund raiser rather than the fund that he establishes—excluding or deporting where there is information that justifies the use of those powers on the basis that the person's activities are effectively funding terrorism elsewhere. I shall continue to give close attention to that. If there are ways of tightening up our practices that will make a real difference, I shall be delighted to put them into effect.

Much has been made of Lord Lloyd's review. My hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) asked whether the review could consider introducing new powers. I unhesitatingly give my hon. Friend my assurance that it will. The hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) suggested that I was seeking to minimise the significance of the Lloyd review, but nothing could be further from the truth. I said that the Lloyd report is predicated on the ending of Northern Irish terrorism. It is intended to examine the permanent powers that we shall need to combat terrorism if and when there is a ceasefire in Northern Ireland—so it is not relevant to the heart of the issues we have debated today. I see many nodding heads among the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen seated behind the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), who wholly failed to grasp the central aspect of the report's significance in relation to this debate.

I walked through South Quay with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. I saw the devastation caused in London just a few weeks ago. Ask people in South Quay if they support the prevention of terrorism Act. Ask the families of people who were murdered there. Ask the people who were injured. Ask those whose homes were shattered or whose businesses were devastated. We all know the answer that they would give. They would queue up to vote with the Government in the Lobby tonight—and that is where all right hon. and hon. Members should be if they want effective action to combat terrorism—not just to talk about it.

If we are to fight terrorism effectively, and to give our people the protection that they need, we need the powers in the prevention of terrorism Act. That is why I invite the House to approve the order and the regulations.

Theatr Clwyd

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ottaway.]

7.40 pm

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): I welcome the opportunity to raise the important issue of Theatr Clwyd. This debate relates to the closure of an important social and cultural asset of north Wales and north-west England. I hope that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales will respond positively to my points, as the Welsh Office has a central and crucial role to play in the future of the theatre—just as it has had a central part to play in the problems associated with the possible closure of the theatre.

In 1994, the Welsh Office was instrumental in passing the Local Government (Wales) Bill, which has had a bearing on the possible closure of the theatre because of the abolition of Clwyd county council. I hope that this debate will present the Welsh Office with a good opportunity to respond positively to the points that I have been putting to Ministers.

I should like to record my thanks to my hon. Friends the Members for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones), for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones) for their staunch support for Theatr Clwyd over the past few months. I am also pleased to see the hon. Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) in his place; he too has taken an interest in the theatre's future.

Theatr Clwyd is based in Mold in my constituency. It is owned by Clwyd county council and operated as a directly provided service through a board of governors comprising 16 elected councillors and 11 co-operative non-voting members. Its staff are all local government employees. Theatr Clwyd comprises two excellent theatres: a main theatre, seating between 530 and 590, and a large flexible studio, seating between 180 and 300. It also contains a cinema with 129 seats, a television facility including a dual-use television and drama studio, many galleries, a multi-function performance and function room with up to 250 seats, and facilities to support a producing theatre company and educational services for the community.

The theatre also houses the leading drama company in Wales, which currently presents a minimum of six and a maximum of 12 productions a year at home, giving about 200 to 320 performances a year. The company spends up to 15 weeks a year on tour throughout the rest of the United Kingdom, and often gives performances in London's west end.

The theatre plays host to a range of quality visiting drama, dance and music, and presents a large programme of film and exhibitions. All this is available to the people in Flintshire, the rest of Clwyd and north-west England. The wide-ranging educational provision includes a professional theatre-in-education company, a youth theatre, courses, classes, a professional dance service, and training and work experience opportunities for young people.

There are currently about 1,300 performances a year in the theatre and more than 150 performances on tour in Wales and the rest of the United Kingdom. Nearly 200 performances are sponsored by the theatre in schools in the county of Clwyd, and there are nearly 1,000 workshops and courses a year throughout the county. The facilities, the staff, the location and the financial resources have attracted artists of the finest calibre from all over the United Kingdom to Mold, sure in the knowledge that standards achievable at the theatre are among the highest in the UK. I could name many actors and actresses who have performed there: Vanessa Redgrave, Joan Plowright, Philip Madoc, Timothy West, Julie Christie and Sir Anthony Hopkins have all performed there recently—a formidable list.

This theatre in my constituency is unique. There is no other arts complex of its kind in Wales or north-west England; there is no other theatre company in Wales that can produce work of such quality and with such a high profile.

About 400,000 people a year see the work of the theatre or visit its facilities. There are well over 160,000 paid attendances at the theatre, and well over 120,000 other users come to it. Well over 60,000 people take part in workshops, courses and classes in Clwyd, and well over 10,000 people participate in the theatre-in-education in Clwyd's schools. Well over 20,000 people, excluding London west end audiences, see the theatre on tour each year.

These figures are much higher than those of other theatres in major conurbations, such as the West Yorkshire playhouse, the Nottingham playhouse, or even the Birmingham repertory theatre and the Leicester Haymarket theatre. Theatr Clwyd has consistently attracted large audiences and now has a well-established profile, offering a dependable base from which to attract further audiences and bring the community in to see the work of the theatre. It is a thriving business, with an annual turnover of more than £4 million.

Until the advent of local government reorganisation—my reason for calling this debate—Clwyd county has provided the theatre with financial support for its core operation amounting to about £1.5 million a year. The Arts Council of Wales has given about £500,000 towards the production costs of the theatre company. Income earned from people who come to the theatre currently totals more than £1.5 million a year. The theatre has developed tight financial controls to ensure that there is no budget deficit. A considerable amount of money is spent by local people at the theatre, and a considerable amount of local ratepayers' money contributes to the running costs, besides the grant that the Arts Council of Wales pays.

In my constituency, the theatre employs 65 permanent staff and more than 600 other people on a temporary basis, many of them from north-west England and north-east Wales. Contracts from the theatre for catering and cleaning services create at least another 39 jobs locally, and the theatre draws significantly on supplies of many local products from north Wales and north-west England. Payments to businesses in north Wales alone amounted to almost £500,000 in 1994-95, and payments to businesses in England were well over £1.3 million.

As is recognised in many of the letters that I have received from constituents, Theatr Clwyd helps to draw in people to north-east Wales. They then spend their money at local restaurants and in hotels and other holiday accommodation. They also support coach operators throughout the north-west and north Wales, and they spend their money in Mold. I am sure that the hon. Member for City of Chester finds that the Gateway theatre in Chester has the same beneficial effect. Certainly, Theatr Clwyd is a major attraction to inward investment and tourism.

The theatre is also recognised by many businesses in north Wales as one of the reasons why they established themselves there in the first place. It constitutes an added attraction to the area, along with many other of our facilities in north Wales.

All that has been achieved by the local authority over the 20 years of the theatre's existence. I pay tribute to the people who founded the theatre, to Clwyd county council and to the board of governors who have sustained the theatre for all these years. I also pay tribute to Patrick Gilcrest and his staff, who have worked hard to develop the theatre and to ensure that it attracts audiences.

We are left with a problem which I hope this evening we can, by agreement, resolve. The problem relates to the abolition, under local government reorganisation, of Clwyd county council, which has sustained the theatre to the tune of £1.5 million over these years. With effect from 1 April this year, Clwyd county council will no longer exist. Over the past few months, that fact has cast grave doubts on the future viability of the theatre. The money that the council has been paying will have to be found from elsewhere. I hope that that problem can finally be resolved by means of this debate and by discussion with local authorities over the next few weeks.

Local government reorganisation was the creation of the Welsh Office. That, in part, is why I asked for an Adjournment debate. I voted against Second Reading of the Bill that introduced reorganisation, but that is by the bye. Reorganisation has taken place. The Welsh Office has created unitary authorities, and I wish those authorities well. Elections took place last year and the electors in the authority that covers my constituency elected a Labour council. I wish that council well for the future.

The Welsh Office, because of the focus of local government reorganisation, has moral and political responsibilities to help the new authorities through the difficult times that face Theatr Clwyd. Clwyd county council has split into the four new authorities of Flintshire, Denbighshire, Wrexham, and Aberconwy and Colwyn. The theatre is in Mold, in Flintshire, in my constituency.

The Minister is aware of the background to these matters but it is important to place it on record. The fact that Theatr Clwyd was in some difficulty was raised during consideration of the reorganisation Bill about two years ago. At that time, the previous Secretaries of State for Wales, the right hon. Members for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) and for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), gave assurances that local government reorganisation would not damage the theatre's prospects and that the theatre would not be adversely affected. Commitments were given to ensure the continuation of the theatre. They were given verbally to the leader of the council. Commitments were also given in Committee to the effect that the issue would be considered.

It became clear late last year that it was necessary to clarify matters. It had always seemed that 1 April 1996 was a long way off, but at the end of 1995 it became apparent that that date was not so far away and that matters should be resolved. In October 1995, the Arts Council of Wales recommitted its £500,000, as it had done for several years. In January, the new Flintshire authority committed £600,000 of ratepayers' money to establish dialogue to try to secure the £1.5 million deficit that Clwyd county council had previously undertaken.

[Mr. David Hanson]

I am grateful to the Minister with responsibilities for local government in Wales for meeting a delegation of Flintshire councillors and my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside and me late last year. During the meeting, we raised the issue of Theatr Clwyd and put on record the need for the Welsh Office to come forward with some proposals to secure future viability and to support the local authority.

I must praise Flintshire for taking the initiative. The authority requested the meeting and took responsibility for trying to find a funding solution. It has committed £600,000 of ratepayers' money, which is 40 per cent. of Clwyd county council's former grant. Flintshire has only 35 per cent. of the former Clwyd county council's population. The Labour leader, Councillor Tom Middlehurst, has shown commitment, with the chief executive, Philip McCreavy, but has needed the support of the Welsh Office and other authorities to help keep the theatre viable.

On the announcements of £600,000 from Flintshire and £500,000 from the Arts Council of Wales being made available, considerable community interest was shown. The local communities rallied around, and they have shown their support for the theatre. I have had numerous letters from constituents who have requested support to maintain it. Many people from England, as well as from my constituency and throughout Wales, have written to me. An early-day motion was tabled and signed by many hon. Members from England and Wales.

Local newspapers—the Chester Chronicle and the Daily Post—ran strong campaigns to save the theatre and to put pressure on those who had influence. Many engaged in the theatre and in the theatrical profession generally have professed their support. I understand that the Welsh Office has received more than 1,000 letters from individuals expressing support for the retention of the theatre and for the Welsh Office to take positive action.

On 8 February, during the debate on local government finance, the Secretary of State responded to the meetings that have taken place and to the pressure that has been exerted by many people by announcing a £1.3 million one-off grant, subject to a long-term future for the theatre, to write off outstanding capital debts. He said:

"I share its"—

the Flintshire authority's—

"opinion that Theatr Clwyd should continue to provide the high-quality productions for which it is famous."—[Official Report, 8 February 1996; Vol. 271, c. 489.]

The one-off grant is welcome. It will pay for the capital cost of the project.

Shortly after that, the Arts Council of Wales announced a further £200,000 direct funding grant to support the £500,000 that it had given already. It became clear, however, that there was still a significant financial shortfall, taking into account what the theatre had enjoyed previously while under the ownership and control of Clwyd county council. The £1.3 million grant from the Welsh Office and the £200,000 additional funding from the Arts Council of Wales were consistent with and subject to local authorities in former Clwyd contributing significant sources of resource.

There were expectations of Denbighshire, Wrexham, and Aberconwy and Colwyn councils to provide significant sources of funding to help the theatre to continue at the current level of funding. The Minister will be aware that £50,000 has been promised by Denbighshire, £56,000 by Wrexham and £23,000 by Aberconwy and Colwyn. These moneys, while genuinely welcome, were not necessarily what was expected, and not what was formerly paid by the ratepayers of former Clwyd. The reasons that lie behind that are varied and complicated and I do not wish to rehearse them tonight. Until this week, however, there was a projected deficit of about £319,000, when set against the undertaking of former Clwyd, in maintaining the theatre for the forthcoming financial year.

The Minister will be aware that the theatre had projected savings of about £100,000 and increases in income. I am sure that those savings and increases in income would have been helpful. When I requested this debate this week, there was still a shortfall of £319,000 and grave concern that the theatre would close from 30 June unless funding was made available from another source. The funding package that the Secretary of State brought forward had an initial deadline of 8 March for acceptance. I welcome the extension of that deadline to enable further consideration to be given by local authorities to tackling a major deficit.

Events move with speed, however, and only yesterday a meeting was convened by Clwyd county council of the four unitary authorities, at which representatives of the Arts Council of Wales were present. It was decided at that meeting to produce a package for the theatre, which I hope will get it through the next financial year.

The funding package may still mean job losses, significant cuts and grave difficulties. I hope that the Minister will take up those issues when he replies. The county council had drawn on resources from its dying days. In effect, a deathbed grant has been made to the new authorities to try to get the theatre through the next financial year, with a substantial package of cuts. There is still no long-term future, however, for the theatre complex and for the good services that the theatre provides.

I am pleased that the county council has been able to assist. I am pleased also, of course, that it has been able to carry some finance through to next year. However, the package is still subject to the agreement of the Secretary of State's office. I look for some positive news on that front from the Minister.

As I have said, events have moved on since I applied for this debate, but there are still matters that need to be tackled. There are a number of key points with which I hope the Minister will deal positively this evening. There is still the need to take matters forward for the future. We have an excellent theatre that provides extremely good services to 400,000 people. It is popular and well known, and has a value in the community. I believe that the Welsh Office has certain moral and political responsibilities and that there are things that only the Welsh Office can do to help secure the long-term funding of the theatre.

First, I ask the Minister to ensure that the £1.3 million grant that was placed on record by the Secretary of State on 8 February will remain on the table during current discussions, subject to the package that local authorities are trying to agree for the next financial year. That package should be available for the short-term future of the theatre as well as for the long term. I hope that the Minister will be able to ensure that the arts council's additional £200,000 is available for use next year to see the theatre through the next 12 months. That would be a key statement this evening that would give the local authorities confidence to commit the package and so to get the theatre through the next 12 months.

Secondly, I hope that the Welsh Office will adopt a positive role during the next 12 months to try to secure the theatre's long-term future. I hope also that the Minister, through his officials, will be able to convene a meeting in the next few months with all interested parties who have a stake in the theatre to discuss its future and that of the complex after 31 March 1997. The situation should be all right next year, but we need to discuss and consult on what will happen in future years. I hope that the Minister will use his good offices to facilitate that meeting, because the Welsh Office has a responsibility and a key role in the matter which it should take on.

Thirdly, I hope that the Secretary of State and the Minister will generally examine the issue of local government funding of the theatre. I have certainly had representations from Flintshire—I am sure that Wrexham, Denbighshire, and Aberconwy and Colwyn councils would support those representations—to examine the capping levels for local authorities this year and in the future so that the facility's regional potential can be taken into account. In the review of the standard spending assessment and the formulae, I hope that the Minister will take the regional nature of Theatr Clwyd into account. I do not expect an answer from him this evening, but I hope that he will consider the matter so that future SSAs and capping levels reflect local authorities' responsibilities in committing themselves to the theatre.

Fourthly, I should like to impress on the Minister the strong feeling in my community and in the local authorities that, although Theatr Clwyd is in Wales and receives substantial support from Welsh ratepayers, the Welsh Office and the Arts Council of Wales, some 50 per cent. of its audience comes from England. My constituency is not 20 minutes from that of the hon. Member for City of Chester. Many people travel; I have had letters from constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) and from Bolton, Liverpool, Shropshire and Cheshire about individuals who go to Theatr Clwyd to see a performance. It is a regional theatre in Wales provided by local ratepayers, but I hope that it will receive support from the Welsh Office in the future and continue to receive support from the Arts Council of Wales.

Flintshire has asked—I ask the Minister to consider this request—whether there is scope for the Welsh Office and for Flintshire to support contact and discussion with the Department of National Heritage and the Arts Council of England to secure at least discussion on the possibility of some funding from England, which would follow individuals from England who attend the theatre.

Flintshire has written to the chief executives of Cheshire county council, Chester city council, Shropshire county council, Wirral metropolitan borough council, and Ellesmere Port and Neston borough council, among others, seeking financial contributions from the rates of those authorities to help Theatr Clwyd's revenue support. To date, all replies have been negative. Flintshire simply feels, as I am sure the other authorities do, that the facility is welcome in Wales and is a boon to Wales, but that it also has an impact on England.

I should welcome the Minister's comments on whether he feels able to support Flintshire making representations to English authorities, to the Department of National Heritage and to the Arts Council of England to facilitate discussion on whether there is scope to maintain the theatre. I do not know whether that support is possible, but my local authorities certainly desire it, and I am sure that people in my area would welcome it.

This has been an important opportunity to debate the future of Theatr Clwyd. It has local support and it is valued, and I hope that the Minister can offer some positive news on the points that I have made. If he provides such news, the theatre will go from strength to strength. The theatre is used by 400,000 people a year and is a valuable source of support; the Minister should support it in his reply.

I pay tribute to all those who have pressed for the retention of Theatr Clwyd. There are some solutions for the £1.5 million deficit from Clwyd county council. I look forward to hearing the Minister's response because he and the Welsh Office have a responsibility for the theatre. Without local government reorganisation, the theatre would not be experiencing this crisis. I know that the Minister has been helpful to date; I look forward to his help today.

8.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Gwilym Jones): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I have taken a close interest in the future of Theatr Clwyd in recent weeks. When I visited it two weeks ago, I took the opportunity to speak to Mr. Patrick Gilcrest, the manager, and members of the staff. It is the people who work in and for Theatr Clywd who have brought about the qualities that are admired and valued in it, and they certainly deserve the greatest consideration when we think about its future.

I know that the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson) has also been much concerned about the theatre, and I pay tribute to him for his constructive contributions to securing the theatre's future. It was in response to his question that my right hon. Friend and I decided to extend the deadline for our offer of help to Theatr Clywd, which would have expired on 8 March but is now open until 31 March. The offer is there on the table to enable the local authorities to respond as the hon. Gentleman wishes them to do.

As the hon. Gentleman said, there is a shared appreciation on both sides of the House for the artistic quality of Theatr Clwyd's work, particularly among my ministerial colleagues. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the presence in the Chamber of my hon. Friend the Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth). The Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury, my right hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad) was also here for the start of the debate, and he is equally concerned about the theatre. Within the Welsh Office, the Under-Secretary of State for Wales—my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards)—has constantly pressed the theatre's interests.

[Mr. Gwilym Jones]

The future of Theatr Clwyd has recently seemed to be under threat as a result, it is claimed, of local government reorganisation in Wales. However, I believe that that is nought but a red herring and it is necessary to recap the history of the matter before looking to the future.

This year, Theatr Clwyd is receiving £2 million in subsidy from the taxpayer, £1.5 million of which came from Clwyd county council and £0.5 million from the Arts Council of Wales. Last year, the Welsh Office and Welsh local government undertook a joint exercise to disaggregate county and district council standard spending assessments and budgets on a unitary authority basis. The Welsh Office used the disaggregated budgets to calculate provisional notional amount figures, which were issued for consultation in December.

Final notional amount figures, which form the basis for provisional capping principles, were approved by the House on 8 February. With the exception of slight reservations on the part of Powys, all unitary authorities in the Clwyd county council area accepted that the notional amount calculations were fair and reasonable. At no time during consultation was any alternative basis put forward for disaggregation involving Theatr Clwyd expenditure.

The £1.5 million per year that Clwyd county council budgeted to spend on running Theatr Clwyd this financial year was allocated to Flintshire county council in the disaggregation exercise and is included in that authority's notional amount. Under our provisional capping proposals, Flintshire was able to set a budget requirement up to 3.5 per cent. above its notional amount. I understand that Flintshire has set its budget requirement for 1996-97 at the maximum level implied by the capping proposals, but including only £600,000 for Theatr Clwyd. Therefore, although Flintshire has inherited the spending power to fund Theatr Clwyd, the authority appears to be using its discretion to divert some of that spending power to support other services.

As the House knows, the Government have essentially no power to direct how local authorities spend their money: that is local democracy, and councils should be accountable to their local electors. I make no comment today on the merits of Flintshire's decision, but it is important to put it on the record that that authority had the spending power, within its capping limit, to support Theatr Clwyd to the same extent as Clwyd county council had this year. Local government reorganisation has therefore been no cause of the situation before us today: it is Flintshire's decision to contribute only £600,000 that places the theatre in immediate jeopardy.

In those circumstances, and given the importance that we attach to Theatr Clwyd, the Welsh Office and the Arts Council of Wales offered assistance. First, the Arts Council of Wales, with Welsh Office approval, agreed to pay Theatr Clwyd its annual grant of £500,000 in the first quarter of the new financial year rather than in instalments throughout the year, thereby easing the company's short-term financial position and allowing it to confirm its artistic programme for the first part of the year.

Secondly, on 8 February my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State offered £1,300,000 to pay off Theatr Clwyd's accumulated capital debt with, according to its business plan, a saving to the company of £200,000 every year. Thirdly, the Arts Council of Wales announced on 9 February its intention to increase the annual grant to the theatre by £200,000, from £500,000 to £700,000. By any standards, that was a major package of additional support from central Government, but we made it clear that those additional resources were available only provided that local authorities demonstrated their own commitment to the future of Theatr Clwyd to enable it to continue to operate as now and for the foreseeable future.

My right hon. Friend invited Flintshire county council to undertake urgent discussions with neighbouring local authorities and other interested parties and to report back. It now has until the end of the month to do so.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about possible exemptions from capping. I have to tell him that the legal basis for the capping of local authority budgets requires that any decision to designate an authority must be in accordance with general principles which shall be the same for all authorities falling within the same class. That means that in the case of the new unitary authorities in Wales, the same general principles apply to all 22 authorities. It is not possible to determine additional non-general principles disregarding specific expenditure by certain authorities only. That is therefore not an option open to my right hon. Friend, in relation to either 1996-97 or, as the legislation stands, 1997-98 and beyond.

The present position is that we must await a response from Flintshire before we can decide whether to release the £1,300,000 conditionally offered to pay the theatre's debt. Press reports indicate that Wrexham borough council and Denbighshire county council have each agreed to contribute to the support of the theatre for 1996-97 but not necessarily for future years. I understand that Clwyd county council—before it goes out of existence, as the hon. Gentleman described it, on 31 March—will also make a contribution towards the theatre's 1996-97 costs. If the position is as described in the press reports, I am afraid that the future of Theatr Clwyd remains uncertain.

My right hon. Friend has made his offer, and the Under-Secretary of State for Wales—my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West—and I await local government's response. When that response is received we shall need to consider, with the Arts Council of Wales, whether for 1996-97 and future years the response meets the terms of our offer and justifies releasing the £1,300,000.

We shall need to be sure that there is a reasonable prospect of the company being able to continue to operate as a producing house with its high artistic levels for the foreseeable future without a plunge back into crisis or renewed appeals to the Welsh Office for further assistance. It is not sufficient just to keep the theatre open: my right hon. Friend and I look to local government to propose a sure foundation for the continuing operation of a centre of artistic excellence. Without that, paying off the capital debt would serve no useful purpose. I am glad to note from the statement issued yesterday by Councillor Walmsley on behalf of Clwyd county council that it is intended that proposals will be formulated to secure the long-term future. I look forward to those proposals.

Mr. Hanson: Will the Minister agree to officials from his office being party to any discussions?

Mr. Jones: The hon. Gentleman anticipates me. I was about to respond to his question about future Welsh Office involvement. It is not appropriate for officials from the Welsh Office to participate in planning the long-term artistic future of Theatr Clwyd. That is a matter for the Arts Council of Wales, and I am confident that it will wish to be closely involved. After all, on current plans the Arts Council of Wales will be the biggest single contributor to the finances of Theatr Clwyd. The hon. Gentleman can therefore be reassured it will continue to take a close interest in the future of Theatr Clwyd on my Department's behalf. I will certainly draw the chairman's attention to the hon. Gentleman's proposal for a meeting.

As for support from England, I understand that the Arts Council of England could not provide support for Theatr Clwyd's activities in Wales although it might be possible for that council, if it so wished, to support touring activities by Theatr Clwyd in England. That might be a matter for future consideration, but it is certainly the case that English local authorities across the border from Clwyd could provide support for the company's work. I hope that they may be persuaded to provide support if and when Theatr Clwyd's long-term future is secured.

I confirm that the Welsh Office has received more than 1,000 letters on the subject, all but a handful urging the theatre's survival. A majority have come from England, from the north-west down to the midlands. Perhaps some of the letter writers will already have written to their local authorities. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Biffen) and my hon. Friends the Members for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) have certainly already raised this matter.

I very much hope that local government's response will be sufficient. If so, the future governance of Theatr Clwyd will also require consideration. While this must be a matter for the interested parties, which will obviously include the Arts Council of Wales, I see some attraction in the option outlined in Theatr Clwyd's business plan, submitted by Flintshire county council, for the establishment of an independent limited company or trust with charitable status to run Theatr Clwyd. That seems the best way to assure its successful future—an aspiration which I believe that we all share and wish to see come about.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes past Eight o'clock.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Fundamental Expenditure Review

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government intend to implement the recommendation in the ODA's fundamental expenditure review, paragraph 13.37, that the ODA should, reduce further contributions to UNICEF and the United Nations Development Programme; and what account was taken of UNICEF's management review. [18339]

Mr. Hanley: In autumn 1996 we shall be reviewing progress on reform in UN development agencies, including UNDP and UNICEF. This review will take account of evaluations such as UNICEF's management review.

Meanwhile, we have just announced that our 1996 contributions to UNDP and UNICEF will be maintained at last year's levels.

DEFENCE

Construction Skills Certification Scheme

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action his Department is taking to ensure that personnel on its construction sites have construction skills certification scheme accreditation. [17436]

Mr. Arbuthnot: MOD-appointed contractors have specific health and safety responsibilities and are expected to comply with the Construction (Design and Management) Regulations 1994.

The competence of principal contractors is verified by a planning supervisor, a commercial appointment acting for the MOD. Verification of the accreditation of sub-contractors appointed by the principal contractor is the responsibility of the principal contractor concerned.

Fire Safety (Wheelchairs)

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the relative risk to (a) employees confirmed to wheelchairs and (b) other employees in the event of a fire within a Ministry of Defence building following implementation of his Department's new regulations for placing employees confined to wheelchairs in protected areas. [18048]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department's arrangements for employees confined to wheelchairs follow building regulations and British standards which apply alike to Government Departments and the private sector. No departmental assessment was therefore necessary.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's plans to introduce rooms specified for employees confined to wheelchairs in the event of a fire. [18044]

Mr. Arbuthnot: MOD complies with building regulations and British standards which apply equally to other Government Departments and the private sector. The Ministry is satisfied that as they stand these deal adequately with fireproof areas for the protection of all staff, including disabled people, and has no plans to introduce further measures.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the organisations (a) of disabled people and (b) representing disabled people his Department consulted before formulating its proposed regulations for evacuating disabled employees from Ministry of Defence buildings in the event of fire. [18043]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The Ministry's arrangements follow the regulations which apply alike to Government Departments and the private sector. The Ministry of Defence neither has, nor proposes to have, its own regulations for evacuating people from buildings in the event of fire.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated cost of introducing fireproof rooms for employees confined to wheelchairs within his Department; and if the rooms will be introduced throughout his Department only in response to the number and distribution of employees already in employment that are confined to wheelchairs. [18045]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The need to protect all staff, including disabled people, in the event of fire is a fundamental part of building design embodied in the building regulations and British standards which apply to all MOD buildings. It cannot be presented as a separate cost. Specific local contingency plans are maintained to take account of the number and distribution of employees in wheelchairs.

NAAFI

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to announce his implementation plan following the conclusion of the Dart report into the NAAFI; and if he will consult interested parties. [18511]

Mr. Soames: It is not the Government's intention to publish an implementation plan in regard to taking forward the recommendations of the Dart report into NAAFI. The plan, if it is to be successful, must be wholly owned and implemented by NAAFI's board of management.

The steering group set up to advise Mr. Dart has accepted an implementation plan which will now need to be considered by the NAAFI Council. The NAAFI main board has been consulted in the development of the plan and accepted it in principle at their board meeting on 23 February 1996.

As detailed work on the plan progresses consultations will be held with all relevant organisations.

Homosexuality Policy Assessment

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the homosexuality policy assessment team has completed its assessment; and if he will make a statement. [19206]

Mr. Soames: The homosexuality policy assessment team has, following an exhaustive and wide ranging consultation exercise involving personnel from all three services, together with staffs from overseas defence forces, now produced its report, copies which have today been placed in the Library of the House. The team's assessment is that any relaxation of the existing policy is likely to have a detrimental effect on operational effectiveness. For that reason, the Government will continue to support the existing policy of excluding homosexuals from the armed forces.

The Ministry of Defence will shortly be submitting a paper of evidence, based on the team's report, to the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill to assist in its deliberations on the subject.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what actions he (a) has taken and (b) plans to take as a result of the recommendations of the Scott report. [16958]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the speech made by the President of the Board of Trade on 26 February, Official Report, columns 590–604.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what consultation he had with the Secretary to the Cabinet concerning the Government's response to the Scott inquiry; and where and when such consultations took place. [16603]

The Deputy Prime Minister: Successive Governments have not disclosed the nature or the specific sources of the advice they receive from the civil service.

Former Civil Servants

Mr. Luff: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what changes he plans to make to the rules on business appointments of former civil servants. [19075]

Mr. Freeman: I have today placed in the Libraries of both Houses, for consultation, the proposed text of the revised rules for civil servants. The substantive changes give effect to the recommendations of the Nolan committee on standards in public life by bringing special advisers within the system and by allowing the Prime Minister's advisory committee on business appointments to publicly announce the reasons for its decisions and to advise a civil servant that the acceptance of a particular appointment is inappropriate. We intend that the revised rules will come into effect on 1 April 1996 and will finalise the necessary amendments to the civil service management code in consultation with the Council of Civil Service Unions.

ENVIRONMENT

Oil Pollution

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further measures he proposes to take to protect the United Kingdom coastline against oil pollution from merchant ships; and if he will make a statement. [17596]

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and I are already taking forward relevant recommendations of the Donaldson report following the Braer accident as announced in the Government response to that report. In addition, we shall be working together with our right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland and our right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in looking at the lessons to be learnt from the Sea Empress incident.

Domestic Water Bills

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what research he has commissioned to establish the correlation between household income and domestic water bills based on (a) an unmeasured and (b) a measured charging basis; [18155]

(2) what research he has evaluated from the Director General of Water Services relating to information supplied by water and sewage undertakers, in respect of the correlation between household income and domestic water and sewerage bills based on (a) an unmeasured and (b) a measured charging basis. [18154]

Mr. Clappison: My Department and Ofwat jointly commissioned a report, "The Social Impact of Water Metering" from W. S. Atkins Planning and Management Consultants, which was published in August 1992. In addition, the Office of Water Services commissioned a report from the Institute for Fiscal Studies, "The Distributional Effects of Different Methods of Charging Households for Water and Sewerage Services." That report was published in August 1993. Copies of both reports are in the Library.

Battersea Power Station

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what parties are now involved in discussions on the future of Battersea power station; and if he will make a statement. [18087]

Sir Paul Beresford: Discussions are continuing between Wandsworth council, English Heritage and the owners on a master plan for the whole Battersea power station site. The Government would like to see the future development of this important site on the River Thames resolved as soon as possible.

Drinking Water

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what action he will take in response to the House of Lords European Communities Select Committee fourth report, HL31 of Session 1995–96, with regard to lead in drinking water; [18495]

(2) what action he plans in response to the conclusions of the House of Lords European Communities Select Committee fourth report, HL31 of Session 1995–96, in respect of the dosing of drinking water with chemicals; [18499]

(3) what assessment he has made of the conclusion of the House of Lords European Communities Select Committee fourth report, HL31 of Session 1995–96, in respect of the urgency with which the problems of removing lead from drinking water have been approached; [18497]

(4) if he will implement a national strategy for the replacement of all domestic lead piping within a 15-year period. [18496]

Mr. Clappison: My right hon. Friend is considering the report from the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities about Commission proposals for a revised drinking water directive, and will respond to it, including the recommendation for a national strategy, in due course.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he plans to remove lead from drinking water. [18498]

Mr. Clappison: Water companies have installed treatment to reduce lead levels at consumers' taps. In addition they have programmes for replacing lead communication pipes. Lead levels in drinking water supplies are now lower than they have ever been.

Water and Sewerage Companies (Surplus Land)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 14 February, Official Report, column 76–77, if he will make it his policy to allow public access to information regarding the projected and actual capital receipts of water and sewerage companies from the sale of surplus land. [18213]

Mr. Clappison: The Director General of Water Services has not since 1989 required water and sewerage companies to report projections of receipts from the sale of surplus land. Aggregate capital receipts from the sale of assets in the preceding financial year, including receipts from the sale of surplus land, are given in companies' annual reports.

Safety Signs Directive

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what actions the Health and Safety Executive has taken in response to EC directive 92/58/EEC on safety signs in relation to United Kingdom brands of tampons; [18561]

(2) what action he is taking to ensure that tampons containing man-made fibre display a safety warning sign on the packets to comply with EC directive 92/58/EEC; [18558]

(3) if he will list the products which are required to comply with EC directive 92/58/EEC on safety signs. [18560]

Sir Paul Beresford: The EC Safety Signs Directive 92/58/EEC was made under article 118A of the treaty of Rome. This article exclusively concerns health and safety requirements for the workplace. Article 1 of the directive specifically excludes signs used in the marketing of products, and therefore no action of the sort envisaged by the hon. Member is required.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions on EC directive 92/58/EEC on safety signs have been held (a) in the Council of Ministers and (b) with the Commission. [18564]

Sir Paul Beresford: The European Commission first produced proposals in 1989 for a directive to replace an earlier, 1977, safety signs directive. A formal proposal to the Council of Ministers was published in early 1991, and common position was agreed by December of that year. The directive was then adopted by the Council of Ministers in June 1992.

Sea Empress

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to improve environmental protection following the grounding of the Sea Empress. [18468]

Mr. Clappison: The Department of the Environment will continue to liaise closely with the statutory environmental protection and nature conservation agencies. The agencies are currently advising local authorities on the best means of ensuring environmental protection in the wake of the Sea Empress oil spill. That advice is being given on the basis of experience and on the findings and recommendations given by the ecological steering groups on the oil spill in Shetland after the grounding of the Braer in January 1993. The success of measures undertaken to protect the environment, and specifically wildlife and habitats, will be reviewed in the light of experience gained in dealing with the current incident.

Rough Sleepers Initiative

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for the next phase of the rough sleepers initiative. [19135]

Mr. Curry: The rough sleepers initiative which has operated in central London since 1990 has been an outstanding example of co-operation between Government and voluntary organisations to bring effective help to people in the greatest need. This partnership to tackle the problems of people sleeping rough in central London has helped thousands of people to start a new life away from the streets, and has prevented many more from having to sleep rough. When the rough sleepers initiative began, voluntary sector agencies estimated that between 1,000 and 2,000 people were sleeping rough in central London. The numbers now sleeping rough in this area have fallen to around 270 on any one night. This is a tremendous achievement.

By the end of this month, the Government will have invested over £180 million through the initiative, providing at least 3,300 permanent homes, 950 short-term hostel places, 700 places in flats and houses leased from the private sector for up to three years, an annual winter shelter programme of up to 400 beds—with further emergency beds available during episodes of particularly severe weather—and, importantly, year-round outreach and resettlement work to engage people sleeping rough and to support them in moving to new accommodation.

The White Paper "Our Future Homes: Opportunity, Choice, Responsibilities", published in June 1995, confirmed that the Government would continue a programme to help people sleeping rough in central London beyond March 1996, and would also consider assisting the development of the rough sleepers initiative model in areas outside central London where rough sleeping could be demonstrated to be a major problem.

In October 1995, the Government issued a consultation paper on future plans for the initiative. The paper invited views on a number of proposals for continuing the initiative in central London. It also asked local authorities outside central London to assess the extent of rough sleeping in their areas. 258 responses to the consultation document were received.

Following analysis of those responses, I am publishing today a strategy paper, "Rough Sleepers Initiative, The Next Challenge", which sets out our plans for a third phase of the Initiative over the next three years. 1996–97 to 1998–99. The emphasis of the third phase will be on providing extra help for the hard core of people who have been sleeping rough for considerable periods of time, often because they suffer complex problems, such as mental ill health, alcohol or drug misuse, which require special care.

My Department plans to make £73 million available over the next three years to fund the third phase of the rough sleepers initiative. In addition, we plan to make £25 million available over the same period in grants under section 73 of the Housing Act 1985 to voluntary sector agencies for the relief of homelessness.

In central London, our plans for the third phase of the Initiative are to fund:

- the provision of at least 250 new homes providing permanent accommodation for people sleeping rough;
- up to 40 beds in permanent high care accommodation for the homeless mentally ill;
- up to 200 new beds in hostel accommodation;
- continued funding for some hostel and night shelter accommodation already funded under the initiative;
- ring-fencing of up to 80 beds in existing hostels, about 30 of which would be for clients with disruptive behaviour and 50 specifically for clients referred by outreach agencies;
- up to 30 beds in a new "wet" hostel for people sleeping rough who have drink problems;
- an annual programme of winter shelters for people at risk of sleeping rough during the coldest months of the year; and
- more effective outreach and resettlement work.

Also, we plan to retain the clearing house system as a means of allocating permanent accommodation until at least March 1997; and to uphold the current criteria for access to permanent accommodation—people sleeping rough or with a clear history of sleeping rough.

Responses to the consultation document did not provide clear, quantified evidence of a major problem with rough sleeping in any area beyond central London. Therefore, our plans for the rest of England will impact in two stages.

First, we will extend the rough sleepers initiative to Bristol, the only area outside central London where a major rough sleeping problem has been demonstrated conclusively. Bristol city council is invited to form a consortium with voluntary sector organisations, the private sector, housing associations, the Housing Corporation, the police, health care providers and other relevant bodies. The consortium will be expected to agree a local strategy for targetting rough sleeping in Bristol, and to bid for Government resources.

Secondly, we will be proposing further evaluation of the extent of rough sleeping in 23 other areas where local authorities have identified a possible problem, before deciding whether there is a need to extend the initiative further. These areas are Basingstoke, Bath, Birmingham, Bournemouth, Brighton, Cambridge, Exeter, Gloucester, Leicester, Manchester, Norwich, Nottingham, Oxford, Reading, Tunbridge Wells, York; and the London boroughs of Barnet, Ealing, Hammersmith and Fulham, Kensington and Chelsea, Richmond upon Thames, Tower Hamlets and Waltham Forest.

As part of the Government's strategy, the Department of Health is further developing the homeless mentally ill initiative to complement the extension of the RSI by making available £2 million per year form the mental illness specific grant—MISG. This nearly doubles the £2.2 million per year already spent from the MISG on this initiative, which has so far cost over £20 million. The additional resources will target both the care needs of those requiring long-term high care accommodation and will also enable specialist staff to provide support to those with mental heath problems in direct access hostels. This additional help to local authorities will enable the Government to build on the successes already achieved in central London and to develop services for homeless mentally ill people based on the lessons learned from the HMII in other centres.

The Government are committed to ensuring that there is no necessity to sleep rough. What I am announcing today aims to achieve this.

Copies of the strategy paper have been placed in the Library and the Vote Office. Copies of the responses may be viewed at the Department of the Environment's library.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the total expenditure of his Department, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies on publicity for each of the years (a) 1979–80, (b) 1989–90, (c) 1991–92, (d) 1993–94, (e) 1994–95 and (f) 1995–96 (i) to date and (ii) as estimated for the whole year; what estimate he has made of such expenditure for 1996–97; and if he will break these figures down to indicate expenditure on (1) advertising and (2) press and public relations. [11396]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 25 January 1996]: Paid publicity expenditure by my Department—excluding agencies and non-departmental public bodies—is as follows:

(a) 1979–80: [figures not available]

(b) 1989–90: £31,500,000

(c) 1991–92: £3,387,000

(d) 1993–94: £12,108,000

(e) 1994–95: £8,878,000

(f) 1995–95:

(i) To date: £4,902,700

out of planned total expenditure for the year of £6,835,900.

Of this, expenditure on television, radio and newspaper advertising was as follows:

1989–90: £19,810,000

1991–92: £680,870

1993–94: 5,149,000

1994–95: £4,470,000

1995–96:

Expenditure to date £2,800,000

The figure for 1989–90 incudes publicity costs associated with water privatisation. Figures for 1996–97 are not yet available.

Press relations are handled by members of the Government information service whose salaries are paid as part of the Department's annual running costs. Paid publicity is the most cost-effective way to raise public awareness and understanding of the Department's policies.

Publicity expenditure by the Department's agencies is the responsibility of the respective chief executives. I have ask them to reply to the hon. Member direct as soon as possible. Expenditure by non-departmental public bodies is not held centrally.

Letter from R. D. Budden to Mr. Malcolm Bruce, dated 8 February 1996.

Sir Paul Beresford at The Department of the Environment asked Professor Rhind, the Chief Executive of Ordnance Survey, to let you have the information you requested about expenditure on advertising and press and public relations. Professor Rhind is currently away from the office on business and I am responding on his behalf.

I regret that the figures for 1979–80 are not available but the remainder of the information is contained in the table below.

£ thousand

	Advertising	Press and public relations
1989–90	321.0	825.5
1991–92	420.0	828.3
1993–94	189.0	890.4
1994–95	478.0	940.3
1995–96[1,2]	458.7	858.4
	674.8	1,030.0
1996–97 (budget)	748.0	1,085.5

[1] To January 1996.
[2] Budget for year.

The trend indicated by the table is reliable. However, in absolute terms, the figures are not always comparable, one year with another, owing to the constantly changing mix of activities which have been allocated to these accounting sub-heads, in turn reflecting the dynamic nature of the organisation.

I hope this information satisfies your requirement.

Letter from M.C. Buck to Mr. Malcolm Bruce, dated 29 February 1996:

The following is the information you require in relation to the QE2 Conference Centre:

Year	Advertising	Press and Public Relations	Total
(A) 1979–80	(Centre not in operation until 1986)		Nil
(B) 1989–90	(figures not available)		—
(C) 1991–92	£50,000	£52,000	£102,000
(D) 1993–94	£65,000	£33,000	£98,000
(E) 1994–95	£61,000	£35,000	£96,000
(F) 1995–96	£36,000	£39,000	£75,000

I should be grateful if you would confirm receipt.

Letter from Roger Courtney to Mr. Malcolm Bruce, dated 28 February 1996:

The Secretary of State for the Environment has asked me to reply on behalf of the Building Research Establishment (BRE) to your recent Parliamentary Question about expenditure on publicity.

The primary purpose of BRE's publicity expenditure is to promote the results from publicity funded research, to help secure maximum application. Thus our publicity expenditures include paying for articles to be drafted for publication in the trade press, participation in exhibitions, organisation of press events and publishing News of Construction Research. Expenditure in the years requested has been:

(a) 1979–80: [figures not available]

(b) 1989–90: [figures not available]

(c) 1991–92: [figures not available]

(d) 1993–94: £182.6k

(e) 1994–95: £181.8k

(f) 1995–96:

(i) to date £185.4k

(ii) estimated for whole year £202.0k

(g) 1996–97: Budgets not yet set but likely to be similar to previous years

No detailed breakdown between "advertising" and "press and public relations" is available but BRE does not promote its work through press advertising and therefore any advertising expenditure would be very small.

These figures exclude recruitment advertising and publicity funded directly by the former Energy Efficiency Office in connection with their Best Practice Programme.

Letter from C. J. Shepley to Mr. Malcolm Bruce, dated 12 February 1996:

Further to the answer given by Sir Paul Beresford on 6 February 1996 in response to your Parliamentary Question about publicity costs, I am writing with details of the Agency's expenditure on the this front.

The only costs incurred by the Planning inspectorate over the relevant period were £4,757 in 1995–96. These costs were incurred in connection with the launch of the Planning Inspectorate Journal No other publicity costs were incurred in any of the other periods mentioned, and none are planned for 1996–97.

Housing Associations

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the funding available for new rented housing association homes in 1996–97; if the expenditure levels in the 1993 autumn statement have been maintained for each local authority in Yorkshire and Humberside. [15485]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 27 February 1996]: The 1996–97 funding allocations made by the Housing Corporation in Yorkshire and Humberside for the provision of new build rented housing by housing associations are as listed. The Housing Corporation's estimate of what the allocations may have been for 1996–97 if funding plans in the 1993 autumn statement had been maintained are also listed. These estimates can be only hypothetical since the actual allocations depend on a series of factors including the nature of the schemes submitted by housing associations, local housing needs, local authority involvement and value for money. In any one year, activity by housing associations in a particular authority area can vary according to the schemes proposed and approved.

Local Authority	1996–97 Allocations (£million)	Estimate of Allocations Based on 1993 Autumn Statement (£million)
Barnsley	1.00	1.17
Bradford	6.94	8.10
Calderdale	1.90	2.22
Craven	0.22	0.26
Doncaster	1.63	1.90
East Riding	1.69	1.97
Hambleton	0.44	0.51
Harrogate	0.88	1.03
Kingston-on-Hull	2.73	3.19
Kirklees	3.49	4.07
Leeds	5.96	6.96
North East Lincolnshire	1.60	1.87
North Lincolnshire	0.81	0.95
Richmondshire	0.32	0.37
Rotherham	0.71	0.83
Ryedale	0.20	0.23
Scarborough	0.86	1.00
Selby	0.33	0.39
Sheffield	4.32	5.04
Wakefield	1.91	2.23
York	0.89	1.04
Total	38.83	45.33

In addition, the Housing Corporation also makes funding allocations for social lettings provided through the purchase and rehabilitation of properties; the corporation's new build programme for shared ownership; and the corporation's other home ownership initiatives which release existing social lettings for reletting to others in housing need. Local authorities may also support housing association developments with local authority housing association grant.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Alzheimer's Disease

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans his Department has to review the current level of funding for research into Alzheimer's disease; and if he will make a statement. [17514]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The DTI's support of research into Alzheimer's disease is funded through the research councils from the science budget. The councils determine research priorities and review funding as part of their annual business planning process.

Medical Research

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what criteria are used by the Medical Research Council to determine future research priorities; and if he will make a statement. [17513]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Medical Research Council has a broad remit across all areas of research relevant to maintaining and improving human health. The following broad criteria underpin its strategy for determining priorities; degree of scientific opportunity; such as the scope for high-quality, productive research; the needs of society, including opportunity for improving quality of life and for wealth creation; and the need to maintain a reasonable balance of activity across key areas of MRC's remit, to co-ordinate with other funders and users and to promote interdisciplinarity and integration between basic and clinical research.

Environmental Technology Companies

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total amount of grant investment incentives awarded to British environmental industries in (a) 1993, (b) 1994 and (c) 1995. [17598]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I refer to the answer given to the hon. Member for Camarthen (Mr. Williams) on 19 February 1996, Official Report, column 44. Grants made under schemes designed specifically to promote research and development in, or the takeup of, environment technologies totalled £2.6 million in the period 1 January 1993 to 31 December 1995.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to improve market access for British environmental technology companies; and if he will make a statement. [17595]

Mr. Taylor: The Joint DTI-DOE environmental markets unit, which is the lead sponsor division in Government for the environmental industry, is working with the industry to assist it in identifying the factors that affect the industry's competitiveness and in developing a long-term strategy for improved performance.

Colliery Sales

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations his Department has received on the sale of (a) Houghton main colliery and (b) Woolley colliery. [18432]

Mr. Page: I am not aware of any recent representations to my Department about these sites.

British Coal (Property)

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the British Coal property sites remaining in public ownership, and their acreage. [18431]

Mr. Page: This is a matter for British Coal.

Mineworkers and Supervisors Pension Fund

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will meet the trustees of the mineworkers and supervisors pension fund to assess their views before he has further negotiations with other parties interested in taking over the fund's management. [18664]

Mr. Page: Negotiations with parties interested in acquiring the management of the funds of the coal pension schemes are a matter for British Coal and the trustees. As guarantor, my consent is required under the schemes' rules to the appointment of a new fund manager.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Government are seeking fresh bids for the management of the mineworkers and supervisors pension fund; and what is the estimated timetable. [18665]

Mr. Page: This is a matter for British coal and the trustees. I understand that discussions between British Coal and the trustees are continuing.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the cost to public funds to date of efforts to sell the mineworkers and supervisors pension fund; and who will meet these costs. [18666]

Mr. Page: This is a matter for British Coal as the vendor of CINMan.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Government will now make it a condition of the sale of the mineworkers and supervisors pension fund business that the buyer keep the existing CINMan team. [18667]

Mr. Page: It will be for the parties concerned to agree on the terms of any sale.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been his Department's involvement in the departure of the chief executive of CINMan; and who will fund his redundancy settlement. [18663]

Mr. Page: My Department has been kept informed of British Coal's plans for the re-organisation of CINMan. As guarantor of the coal pensions schemes, I have a common interest with the coal pensioners in ensuring the proper and effective management of the pension funds. The terms of the settlement are a matter for the parties concerned.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Morgan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what consultation he has had with the member of the European Commission responsible for regional development concerning the award of powers to member states to swap areas currently eligible for objective 2 status for new areas currently ineligible; and if he will make a statement. [18837]

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friends and I, and the UK permanent representative to the European Communities, have repeatedly and consistently expressed to Commissioner Wulf-Maties our view that the present list of areas eligible for grants under objective 2 of the EC structural funds should remain unchanged. We have not suggested any swapping of areas.

Nuclear Decommissioning

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on each of the payments made from the Drawmops—decommissioning and waste management operational programmes—fund since its inception. [18064]

Mr. Page: The DTI has been funding United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority decommissioning and waste management work under the Drawmops programme since 1986—when the UKAEA was set up as a trading fund.

There is no separate Drawmops fund. The programme is paid for by an annual grant. Drawmops payments each year have been as follows:

Year	£ Million
1986–87	15.77
1987–88	28.92
1988–89	34.21
1989–90	42.61
1990–91	82.76
1991–92	104.62
1992–93	125.00
1993–94	120.80
1994–95	126.71

Digital Broadcasting

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the Government's policy towards conditional access systems for digital broadcasting. [16372]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government published proposals for the regulation of conditional access systems for digital television on 15 January 1996. The Government consider it necessary to set out a clear regulatory framework for the new markets in digital television. Our proposals also meet our obligations under the recent television standards directive.

In contrast with current analogue broadcasts, all digital broadcasts—terrestrial, satellite and cable—will require access to the viewer's television via decoding receiver "set-top box". These receivers or boxes will also implement any conditional access service, which ensures that only viewers having a valid contract with a broadcaster or multiplexor can receive and view their programmes. As such these conditional access points will be a gateway between all viewers and all broadcasters for every delivery mechanism. Regulation is designed to prevent any abuse of this "gatekeeping" role and to discourage anti-competitive behaviour. It is also important that those who will be investing in the new markets have a clear understanding of the regulatory framework at the outset, so that they can invest with confidence in these long-term ventures.

Our proposals are designed to stimulate early development of digital television in the UK. They are based on the existing framework for telecommunications licensing. Licences would be issued by the DTI and enforced by the Office of Telecommunications, in close co-operation with the Independent Television Commission. Copies of our proposals have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Ariane 5 Programme

Mr. Batiste: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the United Kingdom has joined the Ariane 5 programme; and when its first launch is due to take place. [19205]

Mr. Ian Taylor: I am pleased to confirm that the UK has joined the Ariane 5 programme. The Government have committed £2.8 million to this project up to the year 2000. The European Space Agency plans to carry out the first launch of Ariane 5 on 15 May 1996 and its payload will be the four-satellite ESA science mission, "Cluster". UK industry contributed significantly to Ariane 4, which captured 60 per cent. of the world market for launching commercial satellites. This new programme will enable UK companies to transfer their skills and to pursue competitive opportunities well into the next century.

UK companies and UK science have helped to make Ariane 4 a success story by supplying specialist systems and components for the launcher and for ground control. Until now, the UK Government have chosen not to contribute to the next generation, Ariane 5, which was originally designed to launch the European spaceplane Hermes. However, welcoming the fact that Ariane 5 has since been more clearly matched to the worldwide needs of customers wanting to launch the next generation of communication and scientific satellites, we agreed last year to reconsider that earlier decision. As a full member of Ariane 5, we can support this important collaborative endeavour and ensure access to cost effective and highly reliable launch services. This is of particular importance to the UK as we are Europe's largest users of space-derived services. In addition, I have asked the British national space centre to consider exploitation of other flexible launch systems appropriate to small payloads for specific experiments.

My announcement coincides with confirmation today by ESA and the French space agency, CNES, of the start of prepartions for the first launch of Ariane 5.

I would like to congratulate those UK companies who are already suppliers to Arianespace and anticipate that my announcement today will lead to further opportunities for them and for other UK companies. This is a fine example of Government and industry working in partnership.

Departmental Severance and Redundancy Scheme

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many staff from (a) the main Department and (b) each of its agencies have expressed an interest in his Department's current voluntary early severance and redundancy scheme. [17467]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 27 February 1996]: Several voluntary early retirement and severance schemes are currently in operation in that part of the Department that falls under gross running cost control. The total number of initial expressions of interest by staff in these schemes is approximately 1,600 but a significant proportion of these are likely to withdraw as the scheme progresses.

I have asked the chief executives of the agencies within net running cost control—Companies House, the Patent Office and Radiocommunications Agency—to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Durham to Mrs. Helen Jackson, dated 2 March 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to explain the levels of interest in the current early retirement/severance schemes of Companies House.

We received 16 expressions of interest in the current schemes which are shortly to be concluded.

Letter from J. C. Octon to Mrs. Helen Jackson, dated 2 March 1996:

In the absence of the Comptroller General on official business I have been asked to reply on behalf of the Patent Office to your Parliamentary Question about voluntary early retirement and redundancy. The Patent Office is not taking part in the current Departmental schemes but has its own programmes for early retirement and voluntary severance. These have attracted 115 expressions of interest; 15 staff were released in 1995 and a further 81 will be leaving in the first 6 months of 1996. There have been no compulsory redundancies.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mrs. Helen Jackson, dated 2 March 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply on behalf of the Radiocommunications Agency to your Written Parliamentary Question about the DTI's current voluntary early severance and redundancy scheme.

The Agency has its own voluntary early retirement schemes. These concern (i) certain Senior and Higher Telecommunications Technical Officers and all seven staff who expressed interest will be retiring at the end of next month, and (ii) certain Personal Secretaries, none of whom expressed interest in early retirement.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Export Licences

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth affairs what applications for export licenses have been reviewed by his Department, and rejected on the grounds that the application indicated a possible nuclear end use for the export, under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1991 and Export of Goods (control) (Amendment No. 7) Order 1991. [18531]

Mr. David Davis: We are responsible for advising on the foreign policy implications of any proposed export of controlled goods referred to it by the Department of Trade and Industry. All applications are considered on a case-by-case basis. Final decision on the granting of export licences are a matter for my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

Convention on Human Rights

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the proposals his Department has (a) made in the last five years and (b) proposes to make to the Council of Europe for changes in the text of articles of the European convention on human rights that specify protected rights. [17903]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We have made no proposals for any such changes within the last five years. Our present initiative relates to seeking improvements to the way in which the Strasbourg system works.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what derogations from the European convention on human rights have been advised to the Secretary-General of the Council of Europe since 1970 as a result of (a) war and (b) public emergency; [17904]

(2) which states have to date derogated from the European convention on human rights because of war or public emergency; and if he will show the date and cause of derogation. [17905]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The Secretary General of the Council of Europe in Strasbourg acts as depository for notifications made under the convention. In the time available, we have not been able to obtain from him the information about derogations by other states party. I shall write to the hon. Member.

In respect of the United Kingdom, the only derogations made since 1970 relate to certain powers of detention of persons suspected of terrorist acts connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland. Each derogation supersedes its predecessor by revising the references to reflect current legislation. The last such was on 23 March 1989.

Northern Ireland

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instructions have been given to Her Majesty's embassy in Dublin in respect of advocacy of the union of Great Britain with Northern Ireland. [17906]

Mr. Rifkind: The embassy in Dublin is closely involved in explaining the Government's policies on Northern Ireland, including the Government's commitment to upholding the wish of a greater number of the people of Northern Ireland on the issue of whether they prefer to support the Union or a sovereign united Ireland.

Princess of Wales

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) on what date HRH the Princess of Wales informed the Foreign and Commonwealth Office of her intention to make her most recent visit to Pakistan; [18879]

(2) if his Department was consulted by HRH the Princess of Wale before her departure on her most recent visit to Pakistan. [18878]

Mr. Rifkind: The Princess of Wales's household informed this Department on Thursday 15 February of her intention to make a private visit to Pakistan. We were not asked to express a view.

Mr. Niaz Ahmed

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the application by Mr. Niaz Ahamed (ref: IMM/C8853) to join his wife in the United Kingdom was referred to his Department for inquires to be made in the United Kingdom; on what date the request was received by his Department; when he expects to make a recommendation; and if he will make a statement. [18469]

Mr. Hanley: I will arrange for the migration and visa department correspondence unit to write to the hon. Member.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he first consulted other Cabinet Ministers about the contents of the report of the Scott inquiry; and where and when such discussions took place and with whom. [16516]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 22 February 1996]: It is not the practice to give details of ministerial meetings.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to paragraphs D1.27 and D1.28 of the Scott report, if he will list those matters relating to the work of his Department since 1979 classified as matters about which successive Administrations have refused to answer. [17420]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 26 February 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. Friend, the President of the Board of Trade on 26 February, Official Report, Column 592.

South Africa

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with his European counterparts regarding trade with South Africa and the reduction of trade barriers with that country. [16793]

Mr. David Davis [holding answer 26 February 1996]: Britain is in the lead in pressing for the liberalisation of trade between the EU and South Africa. South Africa responded positively to the EU's offer of June 1995 to negotiate a free trade area. We need to move forward on this urgently, with the goal of an agreement which will remove as many barriers to trade as possible.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to discuss with his European counterparts the extension of the Lomé convention to South African trade. [16794]

Mr. Davis [holding answer 26 February 1996]: Negotiations on South Africa's accession to the Lomé convention are underway. These do not cover trade, which is being pursued separately: South Africa has responded positively to the EU's offer to negotiate a free trade area as part of a wider bilateral agreement on trade and co-operation.

Hussein Kamel

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which British representatives interviewed Hussein Kamel in Jordan and on what dates; and if the interview included questions on Mr. Kamel's involvement with Matrix Churchill. [17874]

Mr. Hanley: [holding answer 28 February 1996]: As I made clear in my letter of 2 October 1995 to the hon. Member, any such contacts would, by their nature, be confidential.

PRIME MINISTER

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Prime Minister what steps he will take as a result of the finding of the Scott inquiry that the letter written to the hon. Member referred to in paragraph D.4.43 concerning changes in the Government's policy on the supply of arms to Iraq was misleading. [16956]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

The Government continue to take the view that the Howe guidelines were not changed. My right hon. Friend does not consider that further action is necessary.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Prime Minister what action he proposes in respect of Scott's recommendation, K8.8, that the refusal to answer parliamentary questions on sales of arms or defence-related equipment to other countries should be re-examined. [17054]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

As my right hon. Friend, the President of the Board of Trade made clear in his speech in the House on 26 February, the Government will be considering the extent to which information about overseas defence sales can be publicly disclosed. A background note on "Ministerial Accountability and the Release of Information on Defence Related Exports" has been placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister if he accepts the observation contained in the Scott report, section K3.3, that the DTI should not continue to be the export licensing authority in respect of goods whose export is primarily the policy concern of some other Department; and if he will make a statement. [17867]

The Deputy Prime Minster: I have been asked to reply.

Sir Richard Scott recommends that consideration should be given as to whether the DTI should continue to be the export licence authority for the good concerned. The Government accept this and propose to publish a consultation paper on export control legislation and procedures. We will reach decisions on particular issues in the light of comments received, in response to the consultation paper.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Prime Minister how many civil servants had direct sight of the Scott report as of 13 February. [15705]

The Deputy Prime Minister [holding answer 16 February 1996]: I have been asked to reply.

As of 13 February, only those required to assist the Government in preparing their response to the report, as agreed between the Government and the Scott inquiry.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister what action he will take in response to the conclusion in section K4.1 of the Scott report that the role of Customs and Excise in policing and prosecuting export control offences is anomalous; and if he will make a statement. [17820]

The Deputy Prime Minister [holding answer 27 February 1996]: I have been asked to reply.

As my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade told the House in his speech during the debate on a motion for the adjournment of 26 February 1996, Official Report, column 597, the Government accept that there are benefits in Sir Richard Scott's recommendation that in future the role of the Attorney-General should include the exercise of increased supervision of Customs and Excise prosecutions in relation to export control matters. The Government are urgently developing proposals on the precise nature and scope of the increased supervision, and the Attorney-General will be reporting to the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will enumerate and detail the shortcomings of Government in relation to the Scott report to which he referred during Prime Minister's Question Time on 22 February. [17670]

The Deputy Prime Minister [holding answer 27 February 1996]: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the speech made by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade on Monday 26 February, Official Report, column 589.

Scottish Grand Committee

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Prime Minister when he plans to attend a meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee; how many officials will attend with him; how many of these will be press officers; and what estimate he has made of the total cost involved. [18571]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend expects to attend shortly. Details of officials and costs are not yet known.

Women's Issues

Ms Jowell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will name the members of the Cabinet committee dealing with women's issues. [18251]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Edmonton (Dr. Twinn) on 18 July 1995, Official Report, columns 1005–12.

Iraq (Exports)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government will now make public details of the involvement of British companies in Iraq's (a) chemical, (b) nuclear and (c) biological and chemical warfare programmes as communicated to Her Majesty's Government by UNSCOM—the UN special commission on Iraq. [17322]

The Deputy Prime Minister [holding answer 26 February 1996]: I have been asked to reply. UNSCOM has communicated to us in confidence the names of a number of British companies which may have been involved in supplying items found at sites associated with Iraqi programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction. UNSCOM does not make this information public, and it is important that we respect its confidence. UNSCOM considers that a high degree of confidentiality is essential to the successful performance of its work.

Moreover, release of the names included in UNSCOM reports could unreasonably damage the reputation of British companies. It would be wrong to conclude without further analysis that companies whose names might appear in reports from UNSCOM have behaved wrongfully. Should any evidence of wrongdoing emerge, it will be investigated and, if appropriate, will be a matter for the courts.

Western European Union

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the policies he presented to the Western European Union assembly in London on 23 February; and if he will place a copy of his speech in the Library. [18171]

The Deputy Prime Minister: I have been asked to reply.

This Government's approach is set out in detail in a memorandum of 1 March 1995. Copies of this and of my right hon. Friend's speech to the WEU assembly have been deposited in the Libraries of both Houses.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister on what dates between 1987 and 1990 he met officials from the Export Credits Guarantee Department; and if he will make a statement. [17708]

The Deputy Prime Minister [holding answer 27 February 1996]: I have been asked to reply.

Advice about policy on export credit cover would normally be given to my right hon. Friends, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer by Treasury officials. It is not possible, without disproportionate cost, to ascertain if, and on what dates, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister may have met ECGD officials between 1987 and 1990. It would, however, have been unusual for Ministers to receive advice on export credit policy from officials other than those in their own Departments.

TRANSPORT

Sea Empress

Mr. Dafis: To ask the secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to ensure that local organisations are able to reclaim from the polluter the cost of clean-up, after-care, research and monitoring; and if he will make a statement. [17660]

Mr. Norris: Compensation for cost incurred and economic loss suffered as a result of the oil pollution damage from the Sea Empress, including the costs of reasonable measures taken to prevent or minimise the damage, will be available from the shipowner's insurer and from the international oil pollution compensation fund, which is funded by levies on the oil industry. Temporary arrangements have been put in place to meet claims involving hardship.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his latest estimate of the number of sea birds affected by oil originating from the Sea Empress. [18092]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Mr. Tony Banks, dated 4 March 1996.

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the number of sea birds affected by oil originating from the 'Sea Empress'.

1216/95/96

Reports received up to 28 February were that 3,806 sea birds has been affected by the SEA EMPRESS spill.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) sea birds and (b) other wildlife have been (i) killed and (ii) otherwise affected by oil originating from the Sea Empress. [18360]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 1 March 1996]: I have asked the chief executive of the Coastguard Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from C. J. Harris to Mr. Tony Banks, dated 2 March 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the number of sea birds affected by oil originating from the 'Sea Empress'.

Reports received up to 28 February were that:

(i) 1,403 seabirds have died, but there are no reports of any wildlife deaths.

(ii) 2,403 seabirds and 82 seals have been affected by the spill.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he has made to provide compensation to fishermen affected by the oil spill in Pembrokeshire. [18063]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 29 February 1996]: Compensation for cost incurred and economic loss suffered as a result of the oil pollution damage from the Sea Empress including the costs of reasonable measures taken to prevent or minimise the damage, will be available from the shipowner's insurer and from the international oil pollution compensation fund, which is funded by levies on the oil industry. As stated by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales yesterday, officials of relevant Government Departments have brokered an agreement which has enabled temporary arrangements to be put in place to meet claims involving hardship.

Access to Trains (Disabled People)

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what provision has been made by the Rail Regulator to allow for boarding and alighting from trains by disabled passengers. [17939]

Mr. Watts: As required by the Railways Act 1993, the Rail Regulator has produced a code of practice on meeting the needs of disabled passengers which covers recommendations for the design of rolling stock and stations. All train and station operators are required to submit for the regulator's approval, a disabled persons protection policy, based on this code of practice.

Transport Policies and Programmes

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what reviews have taken place in the system of allocating funds to local authorities through the transport policies and programmes processing the last five years. [18165]

Mr. Norris: The TPP system is constantly under review, in order to ensure that within the limits of public expenditure Government resources are targeted where they are most needed and where they give optimum value for money. The main changes that have taken place in the last five years are as follows:

1991–92

Resources transferred from the Department of the Environment's revenue support grant (RSG) system to my Department's transport supplementary grant (TSG) system for the assessment, strengthening, and structural maintenance of bridges.

Funds were earmarked for the first time in the local transport settlement for road safety schemes.

1992–93

Further resources transferred from RSG for the structural maintenance of principal ("A") roads forming part of the primary route network.

1993–94

Further resources transferred to TSG for structural maintenance of other principal local roads.

1994–95

The package approach to funding local transport infrastructure was introduced.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what monitoring is undertaken by his Department of how those policies contained in the transport policies and programmes documents submitted to his Department by local highway authorities comply with the local authorities' appropriate development plans; [18163]

(2) what monitoring is undertaken by his Department of how those transport policies contained in the transport policies and programme documents submitted to his Department by local highway authorities comply with PPG13. [18162]

Mr. Norris: The guidance we issue to local authorities makes it clear that the proposals they include in their transport policies and programme submissions are expected to be consistent with local structure and development plans, and with the guidance set out in PPG 13. Staff in my Department and in the Government offices for the regions look for evidence of this consistency when they are assessing local authorities' annual submissions.

Speed Cameras

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the change in the level of pedestrian injuries which has resulted from the use of speed cameras. [18181]

Mr. Norris: National figures are not available. However, in the west London pilot area pedestrian casualties were reduced by 30 per cent.

Drivers (Eyesight)

Sir Peter Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many road accidents have occurred in the last five years for which figures are available where one driver involved was driving a passenger service vehicle and required spectacles or contact lenses; [18285]

(2) how many road accidents have occurred in the last five years for which figures are available where one driver involved was driving a passenger service vehicle and was blind in one eye; [18283]

(3) how many road accidents have occurred in the last five years for which figures are available where one driver involved was driving a heavy goods vehicle and required spectacles or contact lenses; [18284]

(4) how many road accidents have occurred in the last five years for which figures are available where one driver involved was driving a heavy goods vehicle and was blind in one eye. [18282]

Mr. Norris: This information is not available.

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on EU policy with regard to lorry drivers' eye tests without the use of spectacles. [18875]

Mr. Norris: Among the eyesight standards for drivers of lorries and buses set in the second EC directive on driving licences, which will come into force on 1 July 1996, is a requirement to meet an uncorrected acuity standard, that is, without glasses or contact lenses, of 0.05—equivalent to 3/60 on the Snellen scale. This differs from the regulations in force in the United Kingdom since 1983 only in being required of both eyes rather than one eye only.

Rail Operating Licences

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reasons the general authority to the Rail Regulator issued under section 8 of the Railways Act 1993 prohibits him from granting licences to public sector operators other than subsidiaries of the British Railways Board; and if he will make a statement. [18486]

Mr. Watts: Both the Secretary of State and the regulator have statutory powers to grant licences under the Railways Act 1993. Decisions on the licensing of further public sector operators of passenger rail services can most appropriately be taken by the Secretary of State.

Train Delays

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what basis compensation is paid to train operators for delays caused by engineering work not completed on schedule. [18485]

Mr. Watts: Train operators are paid compensation for overrunning engineering works through their track access performance regimes. These have been designed to ensure that, broadly, when action by Railtrack or its contractors causes disruption to services, passenger train operators should be able to recover from Railtrack liquidated damages reflecting a fair assessment of the economic losses which they have suffered.

Railtrack

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he is taking to write off the debts of Railtrack; and what are the amounts of money to be written off. [18759]

Mr. Watts: Railtrack has a mix of different debts. The majority—around £1.2 billion—is owed to the national loans fund and cannot pass into the private sector with Railtrack. It will therefore need to be replaced with appropriate direct borrowings. Section 106 of the Railways Act 1993 contains the power for doing this. Final decisions on Railtrack's debt and capital structure will be taken in due course.

TREASURY

Benefit Claims

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) men and (b) women have made (i) one, (ii) two, (iii) three and (iv) four or more claims for unemployment-related benefits in the three year periods ending with each year from 1985 to 1995 in Great Britain; and what proportion each represents of those eligible to make such claims. [16251]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The table shows the numbers of men and women in Great Britain making one, two, three, or more than three claims for unemployment-related benefits in each three-year period since 1982. No information is available on the total number of people who might be eligible to make such claims but do not do so.

Redundancies

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the redundancy rate per 1,000 employees for each broad occupational group using the data from the spring labour force survey from 1989 to 1995. [17796]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information is given for people made redundant in the three months prior to their labour force survey interview in the spring quarters between 1991 and 1995. Data for 1989 and 1990 are not available on a comparable basis. The figures reflect the occupation in which people were last employed, or, for those people in paid employment, the occupation that they were in at the time of the interview.

Labour Force Survey.

Unemployment

Mr. Cox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current level of unemployment (a) in the Greater London area and (b) in other regions in the United Kingdom. [17727]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Nomis gives information on claimant unemployment and the labour force survey quarterly bulletin gives information on ILO unemployment. Both are available from the House of Commons Library.

Share Dividends

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of change in the average percentage dividends paid by industrial and commercial companies to their shareholders in (a) 1994 and (b) 1995. [17423]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Information on payments of dividends by industrial and commercial companies are published in the Central Statistical Office's "First Release—Quarterly National Accounts", and in the CSO publications, "UK Economic Accounts" and "Financial Statistics". These are available from the Library of the House. The latest seasonally adjusted data from 1994 and 1995 for industrial and commercial companies' dividends payments in pounds million, and dividends payments as a percentage of industrial and commercial companies gross trading profits, including stock appreciation, are as follows:

	Dividends payments (excluding payments to overseas parents)	As a percentage of industrial and commercial companies' gross trading profits
1994 Q1	4,771	20.7
1994 Q2	5,801	23.2
1994 Q3	5,926	22.9
1994 Q4	6,177	22.6
1995 Q1	6,647	25.0
1995 Q2	6,140	22.1
1995 Q3	6,612	24,3

Data for 1995 Q4 will be published on 26 March 1996.

Additionally, table 7.1G of the CSO publication "Financial Statistics" contains dividend yields.

Devaluation

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact of a devaluation of the French franc equivalent to the devaluation of the pound sterling since 1992 on British trade with France. [17961]

Mrs. Angela Knight: No estimate has been made of the impact of such a devaluation of the French franc on British trade with France.

However, British trade with France depends on a wide range of factors, of which the exchange rate is only one, and it is difficult to disentangle the various influences. In any case, without knowing the circumstances surrounding a devaluation of the French franc, it would be impossible to estimate its likely effects.

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact of a devaluation of the German mark equivalent to the devaluation of the pound sterling since 1992 on British trade with Germany. [17960]

Mrs. Knight: No estimate has been made of the impact of such a devaluation of the German mark on British trade with Germany.

However, British trade with Germany depends on a wide range of factors, of which the exchange rate is only one, and it is difficult to disentangle the various influences. In any case, without knowing the circumstances surrounding a devaluation of the German mark, it would be impossible to estimate its likely effects.

Forte (Granada Takeover)

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate his Department has made of the cost to the Exchequer resulting from the tax credit claimed by gross funds on the special dividend in the Granada takeover offer for Forte. [18346]

Mr. Jack: I am unable to comment on the tax affairs of particular taxpayers.

Tax Reliefs

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the reasons for the rules in respect of tax relief which apply to subscriptions to (a) the Royal College of Nursing and (b) Unison; and what plans he has to standardise the rules. [17890]

Mr. Jack: Tax relief may be given under section 201 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 for subscriptions paid by employees to approved bodies. A body may be approved by the board of Inland Revenue if it meets the conditions laid down in the Act. The same conditions apply to all bodies. Whether a particular body meets the conditions is a matter between it and the Inland Revenue.

Working Hours

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what have been the average working hours per week of those in full-time employment in each of the last 15 years. [18506]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The table following gives the information available from the labour force survey.

Total average usual weekly hours worked by those in full-time employment (Great Britain, not seasonably adjusted)

	Hours worked
Spring 1984	44.8
Spring 1985	44.2
Spring 1986	44.5
Spring 1987	44.7
Spring 1988	44.9
Spring 1989	44.9
Spring 1990	44.9
Spring 1991	44.7
Spring 1992	44.5
Spring 1993	44.6
Spring 1994	44.8
Spring 1995	44.9

Local Government Finance

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes he plans to make to the quotas for lending to local authorities by the Public Works Loan Board. [19207]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The public works loan commissioners have issued a circular today notifying local authorities that there will be no change in the formula for calculating quotas for 1996–97.

Copies of the circular have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Regulatory Bodies

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list each regulatory body for which he is responsible indicating for each the percentage of business people on the board. [15743]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 20 February 1996]: The percentage of business people on the board of each regulatory body is as follows:

Public Works Loan Board—58 per cent.

Securities and Investment Board—66 per cent.

VAT and duties tribunals—not known.

Regulatory bodies have been defined for this purpose as those which either make, or apply, regulations. Business people have been taken to include all those working, or having previously worked, in the private sector, including those holding directorships, excluding non-executive directorships. The numbers of business people on the boards of the VAT and duties tribunals is not known, and the information could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he first consulted other Cabinet Ministers about the contents of the report of the Scott inquiry; and where and when such discussions took place and with whom. [16513]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 22 February 1996]: It is not the practice to give details of ministerial meetings.

Temporary Employment Contracts

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has as to the number of people in the United Kingdom currently working under temporary employment contracts; how many have been supplied by employment agencies; and how many have been supplied by such agencies under contracts for service. [17352]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 27 February 1996]: The latest available information from the labour force survey shows that in summer—June to August—1995, there were 1,739,000 temporary employees in the United Kingdom. Of these, 182,000 said that they were agency temping. No information is available about the number of temporary employees supplied by employment agencies under contracts of service.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish (a) the recommendations made by the Council of Ministers to the United Kingdom, arising from article 23 of the Single European Act, with reference to economic and monetary union and (b) the Government's response. [17479]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 28 February 1996]: Article 23 of the Single European Act, which inserted articles 130a to 130e on economic and social cohesion into the EEC treaty, does not provide for any recommendations relating to economic and monetary union.

Single European Currency

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 15 February, Official Report, column 670, when he expects to be able to make a precise judgment on the impact of a single European currency on the United Kingdom economy. [1671]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 28 February 1996]: The United Kingdom will agree to take part in a single currency only if it is in our national interest to do so, given the circumstances at the time. A full assessment will be carried out nearer the time, before the decision is made.

Manufacturing (Earnings)

Sir Wyn Roberts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are average earnings in manufacturing industry. [17361]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 28 February 1996]: Underlying average earnings growth in the manufacturing sector was 4 per cent. in December 1995. This is the lowest rate since the series began in 1980.

Transfers of Iraqi Funds

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what inquiries are being conducted into transfers of Iraqi funds from Geneva to London. [17857]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 28 February 1996]: None. We have no knowledge of any such transfers in breach of United Nations sanctions against Iraq being made in the first instance, it would be for the Swiss authorities to investigate, as appropriate, any transfers suspected of involving a breach of sanctions.

Civil Servants (Company Directors)

Mr. Byers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which serving civil servants in his Department are presently directors of companies; and if he will indicate for each (a) the name of the company concerned and (b) if the annual remuneration was (i) £1 to £5,000, (ii) £5,000 to £10,000 and (c) above £10,000. [18151]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 1 March 1996]: This information is not collected centrally. Staff are required only to inform their line manager in writing of any relevant private financial interest where this might give rise to a conflict of interest with their official dealings in their current post. These records are held by the relevant team leader while the individual is in that post. No central record is held.

Tax Shortfall

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what shortfall he currently estimates in the level of tax collected by the Inland Revenue set against his Budget forecast. [18316]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 1 March 1996]: Outturn for the year to date is published in "Financial Statistics" monthly and provisional outturn will appear in the May 1996 edition. Final outturn for 1995–96 will be published in the board of Inland Revenue report late in the year.

The forecast of Inland Revenue receipts for future years will be next updated in the summer economic forecast.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Isle of Wight (Expenditure)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total expenditure by her Department on the Isle of Wight in 1994–95 broken down by category. [16774]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information is not available in the form requested. The Department for Education and Employment was created in July 1995. The information given relates to those functions retained by this Department after that date.

Expenditure information on schools is not held in the form requested.

The department does not hold information in such detail for either further or higher education. This should be obtainable from the Further Education Funding Council and the Higher Education Funding Council, which are responsible for the funding of further and higher institutions respectively.

Expenditure in 1994–95 by the Employment Service was £1.8 million. Expenditure by the Isle of Wight training and enterprise council was £5 million.

Student Loans (Wales)

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students in Wales were granted student loans in (a) 1993, (b) 1994 and (c) 1995. [17782]

Mr. Forth: In the academic year 1994–95, the latest year for which data are available, the number of loans taken out by students studying in Wales was 26,500. Corresponding figures for the academic years 1992–93 and 1993–94 were 15,900 and 20,500 respectively.

Student Awards (Mid Glamorgan)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students of higher education received (a) mandatory awards and (b) discretionary awards from Mid Glamorgan county council in (i) 1995, (ii) 1993 and (iii) 1991; and if she will make a statement. [17559]

Mr. Forth: In the academic year 1993–94, the latest year for which data are available, Mid Glamorgan local education authority made 6,620 new and continuing mandatory awards and 50 discretionary awards to higher education students. Corresponding figures for the academic year 1991–92 were 5,120 mandatory awards and 170 discretionary awards.

Information Technology

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to assess specific skills shortages in information technology. [16407]

Mr. Paice: The annual skill needs in Britain survey, commissioned by the Department, collects information on the number of hard-to-fill vacancies across all occupations and on employers' views on the types of skills among their existing employees that need improving. The information technology industrial training organisation regularly carries out surveys of more specific skill shortages in information technology.

Overseas Football Players

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on recent meetings between representatives of professional soccer authorities and members of his Department in respect of the granting of work permits to overseas soccer players wishing to play in the United Kingdom. [18175]

Mrs. Gillan: There has been a useful first meeting with representatives of the Football Association, Premier League, Football League and the Professional Footballers Association. Further meetings are to be held with the football bodies and it is hoped to complete the found of discussions shortly.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to meet authorities involved in professional soccer to discuss the issuing of work permits to overseas footballers seeking to play in Britain; and if she will make a statement. [18211]

Mrs. Gillan: The Department is currently holding meetings with the representative bodies of professional football to discuss the criteria applying to the transfer between clubs of players holding work permits. I shall be announcing final decisions in outstanding cases shortly.

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she expects a work permit to be issued to Mr. Marc Hottiger to allow him to play professional soccer in the United Kingdom. [18212]

Mrs. Gillan: Mr. Hottiger already holds a work permit to play professional football for Newcastle United. An application by Everton to employ Mr. Hottiger is under consideration and I hope to make a decision on this case shortly.

Under-fives Education

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the number and percentage of three and four-year-olds attending nursery and primary schools in (a) the Greater Manchester area and (b) in the borough of Rochdale in each of the last five years. [18259]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is shown in the table:

Pupils under five years of age on 1 January in maintained nursery and primary schools in Greater Manchester metropolitan district (1) 1991–1995

Position in January each year

	Greater Manchester		Rochdale
Year	Pupils	Pupils as a percentage of the population[2]	Pupils	Pupils as a percentage of the population[2]
1991	47,770	67	4,257	61
1992	49,289	68	4,133	64
1993	50,781	69	4,140	66
1994	51,006	68	4,034	64
1995	52,313	69	3,968	65

[1] Includes the local education authority areas of Bolton, Bury, Manchester, Oldham, Rochdale, Salford, Stockport, Tameside, Trafford and Wigan.

[2] Number of pupils under 5 years of age expressed as a percentage of the estimated population aged 3 and 4 at 31 December in the previous year.

Youth Training

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures exist to ensure that the maximum hours of work for young people on youth training schemes are not exceeded. [18436]

Mr. Paice: The contract which the Department has with training and enterprise councils, who are responsible for administering Government training programmes, requires that the maximum weekly attendance for a non-employed trainee shall be 40 hours. TECs are required to ensure that there is a regular review of training arrangements with each individual trainee. There are no other restrictions on the maximum number of hours of work for young people on youth training schemes.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are the maximum hours of work for young people on youth training schemes involving agricultural work. [18435]

Mr. Paice: The contract that the Department has with training and enterprise councils, who are responsible for administering Government training programmes, requires that the maximum weekly attendance for a non-employed trainee shall be 40 hours, excluding one meal break per day. There are no other restrictions on the maximum number of hours of work for young people on youth training schemes.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the reserves held by each training and enterprise council in 1994–95. [18493]

Mr. Paice: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers) on 9 February 1996, Official Report, columns 381–82. This shows a list of training and enterprise councils and their accumulated reserves, as shown in their annual statutory audited accounts, at the end of the financial year 1994–95.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total expenditure by her Department in (a) Waveney, (b) Suffolk and (c) Norfolk in 1994–95; what it will be in 1995–96, broken down by category; and if she will make a statement. [17767]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information is not available in the form requested. The Department for Education and Employment was created in July 1995. The information relates to those functions retained by this Department after that date.

Expenditure information on schools is not held centrally in the form requested.

The Department does not hold information in such detail for either further or higher education. This should be obtainable from the Further Education Funding Council and the Higher Education Funding Council, which are responsible for the funding of further and higher institutions respectively.

Norfolk and Waveney TEC	19.4	19.8

After-school Places

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many after-school places were provided in England for each year since 1990. [18246]

Mrs. Gillan: The out-of-school child care initiative was introduced in April 1993. In the financial year 1993–94, 4,000 places were created, in 1994–95 22,000 places were created and in 1995–96, 27,000 places had been created by January 1996. The total created since the initiative began is 53,000.

Experimental Nuclear Reactor (Imperial College)

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what provisions have been made for the decommissioning of the experimental nuclear reactor at Imperial college. [18067]

Mr. Forth: No provisions have been made for the decommissioning of this reactor. If Imperial college did decide to decommission a reactor which is central to its research activity, it would be for the college to make the necessary provisions.

European Social Fund

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list funding contributions (a) in cash terms and (b) as a percentage of total funding from the European social fund to each training and enterprise council in England and Wales for the (i) youth training, (ii) youth credits, (iii) modern apprenticeships and (iv) training for work programmes. [18758]

Mr. Forth: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in what circumstances the Employment Service will be able to vary the signing on time of a claimant in receipt of jobseeker's allowance so that such a claimant is able to attend a part-time training or education course. [18756]

Mr. Forth: The Employment Service will normally make arrangements so that a person in receipt of jobseeker's allowance who is a part-time student can attend the local office at a time which does not conflict with the hours of the course. Jobseekers should nevertheless be willing and able to arrange the hours of courses of part-time study in order to take up full-time employment at times falling within their pattern of availability.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if existing claimants will be required to complete a jobsearch plan and jobseeker's agreement when jobseeeker's allowance is introduced. [18748]

Mr. Forth: Existing unemployed claimants is already in receipt of unemployment benefit or income support when JSA is introduced in October 1996 will be treated as having made a jobseeker's agreement until, at the first suitable opportunity, an actual agreement is made or until their claim is terminated, whichever is the earlier.

In drawing up the agreement with existing claimants, Employment Service staff will assess whether the information already provided by the client for their claim to unemployment benefit or income support is sufficient for completing an agreement. Where the information is not sufficient or where the adviser and jobseeeker are not able to agree an agreement—for example because of a dispute about a pattern of availability—ES staff will be advised to ask the jobseeker to complete a "Helping You Back to Work" form, previously referred to as the jobsearch plan.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) in what circumstances a claimant in receipt of jobseekers' allowance participating in a part-time education or training course will not be required to attend a compulsory restart, workwise worklink course or jobplan workshop; and what structures will be in place to enable such claimants to maintain their course place; [18750]

(2) in what circumstances an unemployed person participating in a part-time education or training course will not be directed to attend a Government employment or training programme under the jobseeker's direction; and what facilities or arrangements will apply to those who are so directed to maintain part-time study. [18753]

Mr. Forth: The first priority of people claiming jobseeker's allowance must be to return to work. Jobseekers who are claiming JSA and studying part time will continue to be required to attend mandatory Employment Service programmes, which are designed to help them back to work. In addition, they may be given a jobseeker's direction to attend a Government employment or training programme with a view to assisting them to find employment or improving their prospects of being employed. It will be for an independent adjudication officer to decide whether such a direction was reasonable in the jobseeker's circumstances. No sanction will be imposed if a jobseeker shows good cause for refusing or failing to attend a mandatory programme or to carry out a jobseeker's direction.

Where possible, the Employment Service will seek to make arrangements which are reasonable in view of the jobseeker's circumstances and study pattern. This may involve rescheduling a stage of the programme to accommodate their study commitments, or by trying to arrange attendance during college holidays. Courses of study are also becoming more flexible, and where necessary jobseekers will be expected to re-arrange the hours they study so that they can attend the programme.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in what circumstances participation in a part-time education or training course will count as one of the job seeking steps necessary to satisfy the actively seeking work condition of the jobseeker's allowance. [18754]

Mr. Forth: The JSA regulations set out a non-exhaustive list of steps that it is reasonable for a jobseeker to be expected to have to take actively to seek employment. Participation in a part-time education or training course is not included in that list. However, any time during which a person was participating as a part-time student in an employment-related course, as defined in the regulations, is included in the regulations in a non-exhaustive list of circumstances that shall be taken into account in determining whether a person has taken sufficient steps to meet the entitlement condition.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if a claimant will be able to study part-time and claim jobseeker's allowance in circumstances where it is not possible for him to rearrange course times in order to take up employment at times falling within his pattern of availability and he undertakes to cease the course immediately suitable employment becomes available. [18757]

Mr. Forth: Jobseekers who claim jobseeker's allowance will be able to study part-time so long as they remain available for and actively seeking employment. They do not have to re-arrange their course but they should be prepared to leave their course to take a job if one becomes available.

There will also be an additional concession for certain jobseekers—broadly those who have been unemployed for three months or more, where no aspect of their study will be taken into account when deciding whether they are available for work if they are willing and able to rearrange their course to take a job in the hours that they have agreed they will be available for work in their jobseeker's agreement. If it is not possible for jobseekers to rearrange their course then this concession will not apply and they will be subject to the same rules as other jobseekers who study part time.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the maximum number of hours that unemployed people in receipt of jobseeker's allowance will be able to spend on training and education courses exclusively funded by the European social fund. [18755]

Mr. Forth: People receiving jobseeker's allowance will be able to study part time so long as they remain available for and actively seeking employment.

No courses are exclusively funded by the European social fund. It part funds courses jointly with a wide range of organisations. Under JSA, if a course is part funded by the Further Education Funding Councils for England and Wales and by the ESF it will be regarded as part time so long as it is of 16 or fewer guided learning hours a week. There will be similar arrangements for further education courses in Scotland.

There will be no change to the rules for courses part funded by the ESF and any other organisation. As now, a decision will be made about whether the course is full or part time based on all the information available, including any provided by the course provider.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what arrangements will be introduced for reviews by Employment Service staff of jobseeker's agreements completed by postal claimants. [18749]

Mr. Forth: Most jobseekers will be required to attend a jobcentre to make a claim for a jobseeker's allowance and to sign a jobseeker's agreement. Thereafter they will be required to attend a jobcentre every fortnight to sign a declaration that they have been available for employment, have been actively seeking employment and that their circumstances have not changed. Some jobseekers, as now, will not be required to attend fortnightly but will be able to provide such a signed declaration by post. Postal signers will be seen by an Employment Service adviser every 13 weeks. At that time the employment adviser and jobseeker will review the jobseeker's circumstances and determine whether the jobseeker's agreement that is in effect should be varied.

In certain circumstances some jobseekers will be able to make a claim for a jobseeker's allowance by post. They will be treated as having made a jobseeker's agreement until they have an interview with an employment adviser to draw up an agreement.

Grant-maintained Schools (Funding)

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when grant-maintained schools were transferred from the public sector to the private sector in respect of their treatment over capital expenditure. [18834]

Mrs. Gillan: Grant-maintained schools have always been considered to be private sector institutions.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what undertakings she has given to grant-maintained school governors in respect of increasing the annual maintenance grant to cover the cost of any private sector loans secured by grant-maintained schools. [18835]

Mr. Robin Squire: None. Except in areas where the common funding formula is in operation, annual maintenance grant for grant-maintained schools will continue to be calculated with reference to the local management of schools scheme of the local education authority in which the school is situated. In CFF areas, AMG is derived from the standard spending assessment for education for the authority in which the schools are situated.

Jobfinder's Grant

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many applications for a jobfinder's grant have been (a) approved and (b) not approved; and what were the gross weekly wages of those approved in gradations of £10 for (i) each standard region and (ii) Great Britain. [18746]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mike Fogden to Mr. Terry Rooney, dated 4 March 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about the Jobfinder's Grant.

I attach a table (Table 1) showing how many Jobfinder's Grants have been applied for and have been awarded nationally and by Employment Service region since the programme was introduced on 18 April (22 May in Yorkshire and Humberside region, where a more flexible variant to the programme is being piloted) up to 2 February 1996, which is the latest date for which figures are available.

I also attach a table (Table 2) showing the latest information about the gross weekly wage level of grant recipients.

I hope this is helpful.

School Premises Regulations

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the cost of the last quinquennial review of the Education (School Premises) Regulations 1981. [18831]

Mrs. Gillan: The regulations were reviewed as part of the normal work of the Department and it would not be possible to separate out the cost of the work involved.

Travel to Interviews Scheme

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what have been (a) the number of applications received, (b) the number approved, (c) the number not approved, (d) the average level of each award and (e) the total expenditure in each year of operation of the travel to interviews scheme; and what is the projected expenditure and number of awards in 1996–97 shown by (i) standard region and (ii) in total. [18747]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mike Fogden to Mr. Terry Rooney, dated 4 March 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question on the Travel to Interview Scheme (TIS).

The information you requested is as follows:—

Travel to Interview Scheme
(numbers assisted and associated costs)

[1] Figures up to end December 1995—year end statistics unavailable until mid-April 1996.

The following chart gives the anticipated figures and spend for the regions for 1996–97. Unlike some other programmes, TIS has to respond to demand. The provision and numbers we expect to help are, therefore, based on best estimates and may fluctuate according to demand and variations in transport costs.

Region	Allocation	Number helped
East Midlands	173,907	4,241
London and South East	261,630	6,381
North West	207,765	5,067
Northern	152,361	3,716
Scotland	173,907	4,241

West Midlands	93,879	2,289
Yorkshire and Humberside	172,368	4,204
Total	1,539,000	37,533

I hope this is helpful.

Civil Servants (Company Directors)

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which serving civil servants in her Department are currently directors of companies; and if she will indicate for each (a) the name of the company concerned and (b) if the annual remuneration was (i) £1 to £5,000, (ii) £5,000 to £10,000 and (c) above £10,000. [18135]

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 1 March 1996]: I am not aware that there are any serving civil servants in the Department currently holding or receiving remuneration in respect of directorships for either developmental or ex-officio purposes. Details of privately held directorships are not held centrally by the Department.

Discretionary Awards

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was (a) the total number and (b) the total value of discretionary awards to (i) students aged 16 to 18 years, and (ii) students aged 19 years and over in the last year for which figures are available. [18751]

Mr. Forth: The available information for the academic year 1993–94, the latest for which data are available, is given in the table:

Discretionary Awards in England and Wales
Academic Year 1993–94

	Number of awards (000s)	Total expenditure (£ million)
All discretionary awards of which:	222.2	184.1
Further education students aged 16-18	124.6	51.9
Further education students aged 19 and over	82.3	90.6
Higher education	15.4	41.6

Special Educational Needs Tribunal

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the present membership of the special educational needs tribunal panel, indicating (a) the experience and (b) the qualifications on which they were selected for appointment. [17332]

Mrs. Gillan [holding answer 26 February 1996]: The special educational needs tribunal has 32 legally qualified chairmen and 89 lay members. Their names are listed in appendix 3 of the president's annual report, a copy of which is in the Library.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State appoints lay members of the SEN tribunal. Lay members are required to have knowledge and experience at a strategic or operational level of either local government or special educational needs. The chairmen of the tribunal are required to have a seven-year legal qualification and are appointed by my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor.

HOME DEPARTMENT

EDS Ltd.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those contracts his Department currently holds with EDS indicating for each the (a) date of inception, (b) value and (c) duration. [17443]

Mr. Howard: The Home Office has one contract with EDS which began in 1994. It is currently valid for a period of 12 months. The annual value of the contract is below £50,000 per annum.

Scott Inquiry

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the extent to which the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Bill will meet the recommendations made by Sir Richard Scott in paragraph K5.1. [17234]

Mr. Howard: I am considering the implications of these recommendations for the Bill. I hope to be able to announce my conclusions in time for changes to be made to the Bill, if any changes appear to be necessary.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations he had with the Secretary to the Cabinet concerning the Government's response to the Scott inquiry; and where and when such consultations took place. [16602]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 22 February 1996]: Successive Governments have not disclosed the nature of the specific sources of the advice they receive from the civil service.

Director General of the Prison Service

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what salary plus bonus is being offered for the position of Director General of the Prison Service. [17703]

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to him on 27 February, Official Report, column 417.

Coroners

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the standard method of compiling verbatim transcripts in coroners courts; and what is the fee to bereaved relatives for a full transcript. [18194]

Mr. Sackville: Coroners are required, under the Coroners' Rules 1984, to take notes of evidence at the inquest. In many instances a tape-recording of the proceedings is taken. The fee for a transcript depends on the length of the document and is determined in accordance with the fees set out in the Coroners' Records (Fees for Copies) Rules 1982, as amended.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home department (1) how many cases were referred back by coroners to the Crown Prosecution service or police for further investigation or consideration of a more serious charge in each of the last 10 years; [18189]

(2) how many inquests into road deaths in the last year had to be adjourned because the driver responsible for the death did not attend; how many inquests went ahead without the driver and at how many inquests the drivers were allowed to remain silent; [18192]

(3) how many inquests into road deaths have been held after summary charges have been made; [18184]

(4) how many inquests into road deaths have been held with juries, under section 8(3) (d) of the Coroners Act 1988; [18183]

(5) how many inquests into road deaths were held (a) after six months and (b) after one year from the date of death in each of the last 10 years; [18190]

(6) what were the percentages of (a) accidental death, (b) unlawful killing and (c) open verdicts in respect of road deaths in each of the last 10 years. [18188]

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many inquests were reconvened after a guilty plea in the crown court in the past 10 years; how many were not reconvened; and what were the reasons for not reconvening inquests. [18186]

Mr. Sackville: Information regarding the number of adjourned inquests which were resumed, or not resumed, is not held centrally. On conclusion of the relevant criminal proceedings, or beforehand, if notified by the Director of Public Prosecutions that it is open to him to do so, a coroner may resume an adjourned inquest when, in his opinion, there is sufficient cause to do so.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the consultative procedure in respect of which statistics relating to inquests should be published by his office; and how frequently the types of statistics published are reviewed. [18185]

Mr. Sackville: Any proposals for changes or additions would first be discussed with senior coroners. The collection of statistics is reviewed each year.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department to which documents bereaved families are entitled before an inquest to enable them or their legal representatives to ask pertinent questions relating to the death. [18193]

Mr. Sackville: There is no general procedure in coroners' courts for documents to be released to interested persons in advance of the inquest.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what training coroners receive in respect of developments in road safety. [18195]

Mr. Sackville: The Home Office provides regular training courses for coroners, dealing with a range of issues relevant to the discharge of their duties. From time to time these courses can be expected to include matters concerning road deaths.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many recommendations for action by city or county councils have been issued by coroners in the last 10 years; and what steps have been taken to ensure these recommendations were carried out. [18191]

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is not held centrally. It is for the person or authority to whom the coroner reports the matter to consider what action should be taken.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what complaints procedures applies in relation to coroners failing to act in accordance with procedures laid down in the Coroners Act 1988; and which Home Office department carries out inquiries into complaints. [18187]

Mr. Sackville: Coroner's decisions or their conduct of proceedings may be challenged in the High Court by means of a statutory procedure or judicial review. Complaints concerning a coroner's non-judicial conduct may be referred to the Home Office for inquiry into the matter on a non-statutory basis. If the investigation reveals a clear instance of grounds for dismissal, the matter will be referred to the Lord Chancellor's Department since my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor alone has the power to dismiss a coroner from office for inability or misbehaviour in the discharge of his duties.

Entry Permission

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when Mr. Namir I. D. Al-Nainir of 2 Stratford place, London, an Iraqi citizen (a) entered and (b) left the United Kingdom; what were the nature and terms of his entry permission; and if deportation proceedings were made against him; [17926]

(2) when Dr. Fadel Kadhum of 2 Stratford place, London, (a) entered and (b) left the United Kingdom; what were the nature and terms of his entry permission; and if deportation proceedings were made against him. [17927]

Mr. Kirkhope: It is not normal Home Office policy to disclose information relating to individual foreign nationals to third parties, unless the individuals concerned or their representatives choose to make details public themselves. However, if the hon. Member wishes to write to me explaining his interest in these two persons I will give the matter further consideration.

Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons in England and Wales have a race relations committee. [18085]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 4 March 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about race relation committees in prisons.

128 establishments in England and Wales have Race Relations Management Teams. Some of these teams each cover two establishments, and all establishments in England and Wales are covered by a Race Relations Team.

Prison Ombudsman

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases have been referred to the prison ombudsman since his appointment. [18083]

Miss Widdecombe: The prison ombudsman had received 2,327 letters of complaint by 27 February 1996, of which 620 were eligible for investigation by his office; the eligibility of a further 121 was being considered. Investigations into 463 complaints have now been completed and the complaint upheld on 201 occasions. In a further 42 cases the complaint was resolved or withdrawn during the course of the investigation.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total expenditure by his Department in (a) Waveney and (b) Suffolk in 1994–95; what it will be in 1995–96, broken down by category; and if he will make a statement. [17842]

Mr. Howard: The table lists Home Office expenditure in Suffolk in 1994–95 and 1995–96.

	1994–95	[1]1995–96
Police grants to county council and police authority	29,915	29,886
Probation grants to county council	3,040	3,210
Civil defence grants to county council and police authority	230	215
Voluntary Services	3	1
Crime Prevention Grants	100	—
Section 11 (ethnic minorities) grants to county council	266	216
Immigration Service	460	502
Prison Service	29,508	28,609
Total	63,522	62,639

[1] Estimated.

Home Office grants to the county council and police authority are generally not earmarked for particular areas of the county. Of the totals above, only Prison Service expenditure of £8,193,000 (1994–95) and £8,130,000 (1995–96) can be identified as spent specifically in Waveney.

Peter Samuel Cook

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recommendations have been made by the Parole Board in respect of Peter Samuel Cook. [17919]

Miss Widdecombe: A discretionary lifer panel of the Parole Board considered Mr. Cook's case on 6 June 1995. The panel recommended that he should be transferred to a category D—open—prison. This recommendation has been accepted and Mr. Cook is now waiting to be transferred.

Mrs. Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if Peter Samuel Cook has received (a) treatment and (b) therapy while he has been in prison. [17921]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mrs. Anne Campbell, dated 4 March 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about Mr. Peter Samuel Cook.

Throughout Mr. Cook's sentence the Prison Service has sought to ensure, as far as possible, that appropriate therapy and treatment has been made available to him.

Rapists

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) treatments and

(b) therapies are made available to convicted rapists whilst they are in prison. [17920]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mrs. Anne Campbell, dated 4 March 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about treatments and therapies available to convicted rapists.

Since 1992 the Prison Service has been running a cognitive behavioural treatment programme for sex offenders, which is open to both rapists and child abusers. The programme is run in 22 prisons which provide treatment for about 500 prisoners a year.

Open Prison Transfers

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if a risk assessment is carried out on all prisoners prior to their transfer to open prisons in respect of their contact with the local residential population. [17922]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the temporary Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Butler to Mrs. Anne Campbell, dated 4 March 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director general from the office, to reply to your recent Question about risk assessment on all prisoners prior to their transfer to open prisons in respect of their contact with the local residential population.

The arrangements for temporary release on licence, including the criteria for eligibility and risk assessment, are set out in Instruction to Governors 36/1995 copies of which are available in the Library.

Life sentence prisoners must be recommended by the Parole Board and approved by Ministers before they are allocated to open prisons. A full risk assessment is undertaken before life sentence prisoners are approved for release on temporary licence from open prisons into the community.

Prisoners serving determinate sentences who are eligible for release on temporary licence must also satisfy a mandatory risk assessment.

Terrorist Incidents

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what dates terrorist incidents ascribed to the IRA have taken place on the British mainland for each year since 1980. [18744]

Mr. Howard: The information available relates to acts of terrorism connected with the affairs of Northern Ireland as defined in section 14 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989. Until 1989 only those incidents which caused death or injury were recorded.

Hong Kong

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if holders of Hong Kong special administrative region passports will require visas to visit the United Kingdom from July 1997. [19203]

Mr. Howard: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is announcing in Hong Kong today, holders of Hong Kong special administrative region passports will not be required to obtain visas for short visits to Britain after 30 June 1997. We will, of course, keep this arrangement under review, as we do with the visa arrangements we apply in every other part of the world.

Prisoners (Sanitation)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the provision of 24-hour access to sanitation for prisoners. [19204]

Miss Widdecombe: The deadline for providing all prisoners with 24-hour access to sanitation was 29 February. On 29 February over 99 per cent. of prisoners had 24-hour access to sanitation. If every cell without sanitation had been withdrawn from use on that date there would have been a loss of 267 places in the area between Leeds and Liverpool and this would have increased the likelihood of using police cells in that region. For this reason I approved the retention of some cells without sanitation until early April, when other accommodation opens.

Since the sanitation programme was announced in 1991, over 19,000 places have been provided with sanitation. During this period the prison population has increased by approximately 30 per cent. I anticipate that all prisoners will have 24-hour access to sanitation by 12 April 1996. The delay has been caused primarily by the need to include necessary security improvements in the refurbishment programme.

Statistics (Gender Breakdown)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department is taking to collect statistics broken down by gender where relevant. [17683]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 29 February 1996]: Statistics about people produced by my Department are normally based on administrative systems which include information on sex. Statistical information about people can therefore usually be broken down by sex.

East Birmingham Task Force

Mr. Godsiff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the projects which received money from the east Birmingham task force between the years 1988 and 1993 and (b) how much money was given to each of the projects. [17895]

Sir Paul Beresford: I have been asked to reply.

The information has been placed in the Library of the House.

HEALTH

High-voltage Power Cables

Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to issue guidance notes on health care for people living near to high-voltage power cables; and if he will make a statement. [17133]

Mr. Horam: None. The National Radiological Protection Board has advised that there is no convincing evidence that electromagnetic fields present a hazard to public health at domestic levels of exposure. The board further advises that epidemiological studies related to possible risks of cancer do not provide a basis for setting exposure standards as there is no evidence of any adverse effects. The Department will continue to monitor the situation and maintain support for research in these areas, consulting the NRPB and the Committee on Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment as necessary.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent reports he has received regarding health risks posed by high-voltage power lines near busy roads. [17128]

Mr. Horam: None.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the projects which caused the overspend in class A3 of the 1994–95 class XII, vote 3 appropriation accounts. [17801]

Mr. Horam: Additional refurbishment of departmental buildings became necessary leading to additional payments in respect of new works over £150,000 and furniture and fittings. The most significant projects in these categories were:

refurbishment of toilets;

installation of new lighting to comply with regulations on VDU use; conversion of redundant reprographic facility to offices;

moving staff into the newly-occupied Hannibal house.

Lariam

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 24 January, Official Report, column 243, what (a) representations and (b) reports he has received alleging adverse side effects arising from the anti-malarial treatment lariam; and if he will make a statement. [18221]

Mr. Horam: Ministers have received a small amount of correspondence concerning the possible side-effects of lariam—mefloquine.

From 1990, when lariam was launched in the United Kingdom, to 27 February 1996, the Medicines Control Agency has received 757 reports of 2,054 suspected adverse reactions for mefloquine. This is an increase of 152 reports—the majority of which are not serious—since the answer I gave on 24 January 1996. However, this number of reports is not unexpected in view of recent media attention concerning lariam which encouraged patients to report possible reactions. Receipt of a report of a reaction does not necessarily mean that it has been caused by lariam. The product information for doctors and patients provides information on the adverse effects of lariam.

The Medicines Control Agency will continue to monitor lariam and review any new evidence that may emerge to ensure that the potential benefits outweigh the risks.

Breast Screening

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 15 January, Official Report, column 336, if he will make it his policy that health authorities communicate directly with all women over 65 years of age who have previously received breast screening to inform them of their rights to continued screening. [17969]

Mr. Horam: It is already policy that health authorities inform all women of 65 years of age who have previously received breast screening of their right to continued screening. Screening units are reminded by the national health service screening programme to encourage women to continue to come for three-yearly screening, and this is emphasised in screening and well woman literature available in GP surgeries, clinics and screening centres.

Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if all mammography screening facilities in the United Kingdom have to obtain certification to a quality assurance standard; and what this standard is based on. [18329]

Mr. Horam: No. All mammographic screening facilities have to comply with the Ionising Radiations Regulations 1985 and 1988. This is facilitated by compliance with stringent quality assurance standards set by the national health service breast screening programme.

Audit Letters

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which bodies receive copies of the audit letter issued to NHS trusts by the Audit Commission. [17928]

Mr. Horam: Management letters from statutory auditors are addressed to the national health service trust concerned. They are copied to the appropriate regional health authority.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue instructions to NHS trusts to provide copies of audit letters issued to NHS trusts to (a) constituency hon. Members, (b) members of the public and (c) the local press who request them. [18037]

Mr. Horam: National health service trusts may make this information available on request, but these matters are primarily between the appointed auditor and the trust concerned.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will require the auditors of NHS trusts to provide copies of their audit letters to (a) constituency hon. Members, (b) members of the public and (c) the local press who request them. [18038]

Mr. Horam: Statutory auditors of national health service trusts are appointed by the Audit Commission and it is not for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health to instruct them on these matters.

Yorkshire Cancer Organisation

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 22 February, Official Report, columns 290–91, on the Yorkshire Cancer Organisation, what proposals the Northern and Yorkshire regional health authority or the NHS Executive have considered to relocate the Yorkshire Cancer Organisation away from Leeds. [18079]

Mr. Horam: None.

Fraud

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of fraud occurred in each year since 1985 in NHS trusts and health authorities; and what was the total value of such fraud. [17946]

Mr. Horam: The cost of fraud is not separately identified in the accounts or the losses and special payments returns submitted by NHS units in England.

Oncology Centres

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which oncology centres are refusing patients treatment on grounds of lack of money. [17942]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Mental Health

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the health authorities covered by the survey of mental health provision indicating which categories of 1, 2a, 2b or 3 each falls into. [17937]

Mr. Bowis: We already have, in the "Review of the Purchasing of Mental Health Services by Health Authorities in England", issued on 20 February, copies of which are available in the Library.

Ionising Radiation

Mr. Charles Wardle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what extent the ionising radiation regulations apply to patients being exposed to radioactive sources for clinical treatment. [18328]

Mr. Horam: The Ionising Radiations (Protection of Persons Undergoing Medical Examination or Treatment) Regulations 1988 apply to all persons undergoing exposure to radiation for medical purposes.

Nursery Places

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many places were provided in nurseries for children under three years of age in England for each year since 1990. [18248]

Mr. Bowis: Information available centrally on day nurseries relates to places for children aged under five and was published by the Department of Health in "Children's day care facilities at 31 March 1994, England, A/F 94/16".

Information on pupils aged two at the beginning of the school year and attending nursery classes in maintained primary schools or maintained nursery schools was published by the Department for Education and Employment in "Statistical Bulletin 1/96: Pupils Under Five Years of Age in Schools in England—January 1995".

Copies of both publications are available in the Library.

Toxic Shock Syndrome

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of toxic shock syndrome from women's use of tampons have been reported to the Medical Officer of Health in each of the last five years. [18562]

Mr. Horam: The following information has been collected by the central public health laboratory.

Number of cases of menstrually-associated toxic shock syndrome in:

1990: 15

1991: 14

1992: 11

1993: 12

1994: 8

The figures for 1995 are not yet available.

Human Embryos

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many human embryos have been frozen in each year since the practice was first sanctioned by law. [18317]

Mr. Horam: As recorded in the records of the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority, the numbers of embryos stored were as follows:

1991: 4,920

1992: 15,932

1993: 19,717

1994: 23,484

Data for 1995 have not yet been validated.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many frozen human embryos have been experimented on and then destroyed since the practice was first sanctioned by law; [18318]

(2) how many unfrozen human embryos have been experimented on and then destroyed since the practice was first sanctioned by law. [18319]

Mr. Horam: The total number of embryos created from 1991 to 1994 was 498,493. Of these, 27,493 embryos were donated for research; it is not, however, possible to give separate figures for frozen or unfrozen embryos.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in how many cases the parents of frozen embryos are currently untraceable; and what are the figures for parents of embryos frozen in 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994 and 1995. [18320]

Mr. Horam: The Human Fertilisation and Embryology (Statutory Storage Period for Embryos) Regulations 1996 enables all centres licensed under the Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 to contact couples with embryos in store under the five-year limit arrangements so that the possibility of extension can be considered. It is not possible at this stage to judge how many will not be traced.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the effects of deep freezing on (a) the human embryo, (b) the likelihood of mutation in the embryo and (c) the chance of achieving a successful pregnancy using a frozen embryo. [18361]

Mr. Horam: The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Authority's working group on embryo freezing considered the scientific and ethical aspects of embryo freezing. It undertook a review of the literature on embryo freezing and established that the evidence suggests that there are no long-term genetic implications arising out of current cryopreservation methods. Nor is there any evidence to suggest that the current freezing protocols are harmful to humans.

The working group also established that there is good scientific evidence from animal studies that viable embryos stored under proper conditions will not suffer harm from cryopreservation over very extended periods of time.

Two studies on children born from frozen embryos in the UK have shown that the rate of congenital abnormalities is no greater than in the general population.

In 1993 there were 3,002 treatment cycles using frozen embryos and there were 382 live births, giving a live birth rate of 12.7 per cent. compared with an unfrozen embryo live birth rate of 14.4 per cent.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many human embryos have not survived the freezing and defrosting process since the practice became legal. [18362]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available.

Consultancy Service Index

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the number of inquiries to the Department of Health consultancy service index, (b) the number of individuals who have been notified that they are to be included on the index and (c) the number of individuals who have appealed against inclusion on the index for each year since 1986. [18833]

Mr. Bowis: This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Deregulation and Contracting Out Act

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will publish the responses to his consultation on the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 and supervised activities and holiday play schemes. [18832]

Mr. Bowis: We are considering the responses received to the consultation document. The Government will give their response in due course.

Renal Services Review

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from kidney patients' associations concerning the publication of the national review of renal services. [18830]

Mr. Horam: Representations have been received from the National Kidney Federation concerning the publications of the national review of renal services and they will be meeting me to discuss this in April.

Alcohol

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the total number of people who died from (a) alcohol poisoning and (b) alcohol-related illnesses in each of the past five years. [18591]

Mr. Bowis: The numbers of people who died from alcohol poisoning[1] in England and Wales in the last five years are as follows:

1990: 153

1991: 152

1992: 126

1993: 136

1994: 122

[1] (Code 980, International Classification of Diseases, 9th revision).

I also refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) on 19 December 1995 at column 1148.

Barnet Hospital

Sir John Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the role of the private finance initiative in the development of Barnet hospital. [18683]

Mr. Horam: The Wellhouse national health service trust, of which Barnet hospital is part, already has phase 1a of its development under construction and has had approval to the outline business case for phase 1b. It is now investigating the potential advantages to be gained by proceeding with this project under the private finance initiative. The trust is making good progress in its negotiations with potential private sector partners, and it intends to submit its full business case within the next few months.

District Health Authority Managers

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total remuneration of each NHS district health authority's general manager for 1990. [18743]

Mr. Malone: The information is not available centrally.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Domestic Violence Cases

31. Ms Jowell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what consideration he has given to empowering the police to pursue a civil remedy in domestic violence cases on behalf of a victim of violence in the home. [16447]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The question of whether the police should have the power to pursue a civil remedy for domestic violence on behalf of victims has been considered in connection with the Family Law Bill and the former Family Homes and Domestic Violence Bill. The Home Affairs Select Committee, in its 1993 report on domestic violence, and the House of Lords Special Bill Committee on the Family Homes and Domestic Violence Bill, did not support the police having this power because this would place unaccustomed responsibilities on them and would create confusion between the criminal and civil law. The Government agree with this view.

32. Mr. Ainger: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the implementation of the recommendations of the May 1992 Law Commission report on "Domestic Violence and Occupation of the Family Home" relating to police powers in respect of family protection. [16448]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The recommendations of the Law Commission report on domestic violence and occupation of the family home have substantially been included in part III of the Family Law Bill. The Bill strengthens police powers to deal with situations of domestic violence. The Law Commission's recommendations that the police should have the power to pursue civil remedies on behalf of victims has not been included in the Bill because this would place unaccustomed responsibilities on them and would create confusion between criminal and civil law.

Probate Service

33. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what are the conclusions of his Department's consultation process regarding the structure of the probate services. [16449]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: No decisions have yet been made. Responses received during the consultation process are currently being considered.

Legal Aid

34. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what recent initiatives are being pursued to ensure the widest possible availability of legal aid; and if he will make a statement. [16450]

36. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to review the arrangements governing legal aid; and if he will make a statement. [16452]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: I refer the hon. Gentlemen to my oral answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Dr. Spink) earlier today.

35. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations he has recently received about the payment of legal aid to the apparently wealthy. [16451]

Mr. Evans: I have received a number of representations on this subject. As my hon. Friend knows, the Lord Chancellor last week announced a number of measures to tighten up the means assessment process.

Divorce Law Reform

37. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the effect of his proposal to require a one-year wait for divorce upon marriages where there is a history of violence. [16453]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The circumstances of marriages with a history of violence were carefully considered in the preparation of the divorce reform proposals. I believe that victims of violence are adequately protected by domestic violence legislation. Protection against domestic violence is not, and should not be, linked to the ability to get a divorce.

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what further plans he has to involve children of divorcing parents in his proposals for divorce law reform. [16446]

Mr. Evans: Our proposals will ensure that during the period for reflection and consideration parents will give close attention to the arrangements for children. Generally, our proposals are intended to reduce conflict between the parents, which will be to the advantage of children. Decisions relating to residence of and contact with children after divorce will continue to be dealt with under the Children Act 1989 and the welfare of children will continue to be paramount in these proceedings. We have no plans to increase the involvement of children in the legal process for divorce.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on his plans to reform the law relating to divorce. [16813]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Family Law Bill, which implements the proposals on divorce and mediation set out in the White Paper, "Looking to the Future—Mediation and the Ground for Divorce", published in April 1995, was introduced in the House of Lords on 16 November 1995. It received its Second Reading on 30 November, completed its Committee Stage on 30 January 1996 and is currently on Report. The Bill also reintroduces family law and domestic violence proposals, amended from the Family Homes and Domestic Violence Bill, which did not complete all its stages in the last session.

Confiscation Orders

38. Mr. Morgan: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what training or guidance he has arranged to provide for judges with regard to the making of confiscation orders in corruption cases at the time of sentencing or shortly thereafter. [16454]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Judicial Studies Board, which is responsible for training judges, covers confiscation orders in its seminars for the Crown court judiciary. The board also recently published in its bulletin an article on the Proceeds of Crime Act 1995, which included confiscation orders.

EDS Ltd.

Ms Eagle: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list those contracts his Department currently holds with EDS indicating for each the (a) date of inception, (b) value and (c) duration. [17442]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Department currently holds no contracts with EDS.

Women Judges

Ms Jowell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many women were appointed as judges in the High Court, county court and the Court of Appeal for each year since 1990; and what proportion these women represent of the total number of judges. [18247]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The table shows the total number and the number and proportion of women appointed to the Court of Appeal, the High Court and as circuit judges in 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994 and 1995. The end column lists the total number of judges in post, as a combined figures, as at 31 December for each year, and the number and proportion of women. The figures for 1990 are not readily available.

	Number of Lord Justices of Appeal appointed		Number of High Court judges appointed		Number of circuit judges appointed		Total number in post and proportion of women

1995	9	0	12	1	41	6	645	37 5.7 per cent.

Prince and Princess of Wales

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on what occasions he has advised or acted as an interlocutor for (a) Her Majesty the Queen and (b) the Prince and Princess of Wales in relation to, or about their respective private property and or other rights consequent on the separation of the Prince and Princess of Wales. [18884]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The matters raised by the hon. Member are confidential.

Great Seals

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what are the public holding arrangements for the great seals issued for the period between 1617 and 1831 concerning patents granted. [17156]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Public Record Office is best placed to provide an answer. I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from Sarah Tyacke to Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours, dated 4 March 1996:

I have been asked by the Lord Chancellor's Parliamentary Secretary to reply for the Public Record Office to your question about the public holdings arrangements concerning patents granted.

Copiers of letters patent issued over the great seal between 1617 and 1831 could be enrolled on the Chancery patent rolls. Under the Public Records Act 1958 these patent rolls are open for consultation by the public in the Public Record Office.

Not all letters patent were thus enrolled and the system of enrolment broke down from 1648 to 1659, for which period few rolls survive.

Original letters patent over the great seal were issued to the person to whom the grant was made. They thus passed into private hands, and were not subject to public holdings arrangements.

Contact Orders

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 16 February, Official Report, columns 718–19, if he will now instruct the court service to begin to collate information of the number of cases where parents with care have been imprisoned following non-compliance with a contact order made under section 8 of the Children Act 1989. [17774]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: No. On any item of legislation there is a profusion of information which it may or may not be useful to collect. The collection of statistical information places considerable demands on the time and resources of the Court Service, and thus must focus on the areas of central importance. My answer of 23 February gives details of the statistics collected on contact orders and other section 8 orders.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, pursuant to his answer of 16 February, Official Report, columns 718–19, what plans his Department has to monitor (a) the workings of the Children Act 1989 and (b) legal cases arising from section 8 orders under the Children Act 1989. [17775]

Mr. Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 26 February 1996, Official Report, column 323.

SCOTLAND

Police Officer Numbers

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what factors, other than population, determine police officer numbers per division in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland. [18054]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is for individual chief constables to decide the factors which are used to determine police officer numbers in their divisions.

William James McKay

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the work of the Crown Office in the case before Lord Hope in the Court of Criminal Appeal on 28 February. [18685]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The case concerned a note of appeal by the Lord Advocate in terms of section 228A(a) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975. On 5 December 1995 William James McKay pled guilty in the High Court at Glasgow to four charges of possessing quantities of controlled drugs with intent to supply them to another and one charge of unlawfully possessing a controlled drug. Following upon a plea in mitigation to the effect that the accused was now drug free and counselling young drug addicts, the trial judge deferred sentence for six months for good behaviour. The trial judge stated that were he to sentence the accused on the basis of his record of previous convictions and the offences to which he pled guilty, the sentence that he would have been thinking of imposing would have been one of seven years.

On 6 December 1995 the Lord Advocate became aware of the trial judge's decision to defer sentence in light of that plea in mitigation. On 11 December 1995, on the instructions of the Lord Advocate, the Crown Office wrote to the clerk of court asking to be provided with copies of all reports and documentation which were available to and placed before the trial judge. A written note, incorporating information provided by the trial advocate depute, was prepared by a Crown Office official for the Lord Advocate.

Appeals under section 228A(a) of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act 1975 require to be taken within 28 days. On 27 December 1995 the Lord Advocate decided to proceed with an appeal on the basis of the information available at the time. On the basis of that information it appeared to the Lord Advocate that, having regard to the whole circumstances of the case, the deferment of sentence by the trial judge had been inappropriate.

On 29 December 1995 a note of appeal was lodged on behalf of the Lord Advocate. It contained grounds of appeal to the effect that the deferment of sentence was inappropriate having regard to the gravity of the offences of which the accused had been convicted, the value and quantities of the various drugs referred to in the indictment, the fact that the accused was found in possession of the drugs in Her Majesty's prison Barlinnie, on the day following the imposition of a sentence of 18 months imprisonment in respect of a previous contravention of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 and the criminal record of the accused.

The grounds of appeal did not invite the court to lay down minimum sentences in respect of contraventions of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 committed in prisons. The trial judge's report about the case was sent to the Crown Office on 22 February 1996. It was accompanied by the documentation requested on 11 December 1995. When an appeal is taken under section 228A(a) of the 1975 Act, the Lord Advocate's position in respect of the appeal is reviewed after the trial judge's report becomes available. On receipt of the trial judge's report on the present case the papers were reviewed by Crown counsel. They were then placed before the Lord Advocate. After studying the trial judge's report, the documentation which had been before the trial judge and a further report dated 16 February 1996 from the Glasgow community drugs project, the Lord Advocate decided not to proceed with the appeal which had been taken.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how employment levels in the Benefits Agency will be affected by the implementation of the jobseeker's allowance; [9792]

(2) how many surplus staff there will be in the Benefits Agency as a result of the implementation of the jobseeker's allowance. [9791]

Mr. Roger Evans: The Benefits Agency will be taking over payment of the contributory element of what is currently unemployment benefit when jobseeker's allowance is introduced. There will be no jobs cut in the Benefits Agency as a result of the implementation of jobseeker's allowance nor will there be any surplus staff.

Income Support

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many income support claims ceased within four weeks of liable relatives action in each year since 1989. [14457]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is in the table:

Year	Number
1989–90	47,122
1990–91	60,056
1991–92	80,261
1992–93[1]	16,142
1993–94	24,383
1994–95	12,937
1995–96[2]	15,186

[1] Figures for 1992–93 onwards relate to spousal maintenance and sponsored immigrants only.
[2] To December 1995.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in respect of how many claims involving liable relatives income support ceased within four weeks in (a) 1989–90 and (b) 1990–91. [15831]

Mr. Mitchell: The information is not available.

Child Support Agency

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the benefit savings attributable to the Child Support Agency if a multiplier of 21 weeks were used when considering the savings due to the withdrawal of income support claims. [15754]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is as follows:

1993–94: £327 million

1994–95: £348 million.

These figures include savings where:

the level of child maintenance reduced the amount of income support in payment;

the level of child maintenance removed the need for income support;

the claim for income support was withdrawn following Child Support Agency involvement; and resultant housing benefit, council tax benefit, family credit and disability working allowance savings.

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the liability of an individual served with a detachment of earnings order in the event of an employer not making prompt payments to the Child Support Agency; [17705]

(2) who has responsibility for the collection of money when an employer has failed to comply with a detachment of earnings order. [17707]

Mr. Mitchell: Absent parents who have a liability to make payments of child support maintenance remain liable until the payment in question is made to the appropriate person irrespective of the way in which that payment is collected. However, employers have a duty to pass on, to the Secretary of State, moneys collected direct from an absent parent's earnings under a deduction from earnings order. Payments must be made by the 19th day of the month following the month in which the deduction is made. Failure to comply with the requirements of a deduction from earnings order is an offence punishable by a fine.

Where, for any reason, a deduction from earnings order proves ineffective as a method of collecting payments of child support maintenance it is for the Secretary of State to consider what further action may be appropriate.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 16 January, Official Report, column 568, relating to the financial memorandum of the Child Support Bill, how he intends to quantify long-term effects on expenditure resulting from the activities of the Child Support Agency; and how he will ensure that any savings are solely the result of the activities of the agency. [18169]

Mr. Mitchell: As part of the process of evaluation of child support policy, estimates will be made of the possible pattern of public expenditure if the scheme had not been introduced. These will attempt to isolate the behavioural changes arising from the child support scheme compared with, for example, those resulting from other changes made in the benefit system, and demographic changes. Such an evaluation is necessarily long term, because of the staggered take-on of the Child Support Agency's caseload, and because the full impact of the new departures system will not be apparent for several years.

Isle of Wight (Expenditure)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total expenditure of his Department on the Isle of Wight in 1994–95 broken down by category. [16772]

Mr. Burt: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Industrial Injuries Scheme

Mr. Ian McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average annual amount paid to individual claimants of prescribed diseases under the industrial injuries scheme; and what is the average duration of claims for those diseases. [17219]

Mr. Roger Evans: Information is not available in the format requested. Available figures relate to the number of assessments, not to claimants, and a person can be in receipt of more than one assessment. Based on prescribed disease assessments current at 2 April 1994, the average annual amount paid per industrial injuries disablement benefit assessment as a result of a prescribed disease was £1,669 at the 14 April 1993 rates. Of 43,184 assessments, current at 2 April 1994, 21,979 were for life awards and the average duration of the remainder was 46 months.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will ensure that the parliamentary constituency of Don Valley is covered by a single weather station in respect of cold weather payments; and if he will make a statement. [17373]

Mr. Roger Evans: The choice of weather stations for local areas is decided after consultation with the Meteorological Office. These linkages are constantly kept under review, and the Government have made a number of adjustments in successive years to ensure that weather stations are as representative as possible of the conditions in the areas they cover. Current Meteorological Office advice is that Leeds and Waddington are appropriate weather stations for the area in which the Don Valley constituency lies.

Where it can be shown that particular post code areas covering a large geographical area are not reasonably represented by the designated weather station or stations, the Department would consider, in consultation with the Meteorological Office, whether a change of weather station was appropriate. This would occur when the operation of the scheme is reviewed with the Meteorological Office after the end of March each year.

Housing Benefit

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total cost of housing benefit paid to families living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation in Argyll and Bute; what was the total for Scotland last year; and if he will make a statement. [17103]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Rogers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are currently receiving invalidity benefit in the Rhondda benefit district; what percentage this is of the total population of working age; and what are the average percentages for (a) Wales and (b) England and Wales. [17506]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested. The available information is as follows:

There were 32,814 people in receipt of incapacity benefit at the short-term—higher—and long-term rates in the Mid Glamorgan district of the Benefits Agency at 31 January 1996.

Notes:

1. Incapacity benefit replaced sickness and invalidity benefit on 13 April 1995.

2. Figure obtained from a 100 per cent. clerical count of cases in Benefit Agency offices.

3. The Mid Glamorgan district includes the following branch offices: Porth, Pontypridd, Tonypandy, Aberdare and Bridgend.

People in receipt of Invalidity Benefit on 2 April 1994 by country and percentage of working population

Country	People in receipt of invalidity benefit	Percentage of the working population
Wales	181,000	10
England	1,265,000	4
England and Wales	1,446,000	5

[1] The working population has been taken to be 16 to 64 for men and 16 to 59 for women.

[2] Invalidity benefit information based on a 1 per cent. sample of claimants, rounded to the nearest thousand at 2 April 1994.

[3] Estimated mid-year 1994 population figures supplied by OPCS publication, "Population Trends".

Absent Parents

Mr. Deva: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average net income, after deductions for tax and national insurance, of those absent parents with full maintenance assessments who receive earned income. [17664]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The average net income of absent parents with earned income—including the self-employed—who have a full maintenance assessment is £194.52. The average child support liability for this group is £38.66, which is less than 20 per cent. of their average net income.

Social Fund

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to make changes to the discretionary social fund; and if he will make a statement. [18907]

Mr. Roger Evans: We are introducing some minor amendments to the Secretary of State's directions and guidance on the help available from the discretionary social fund, the need for which we have identified in the course of our routine monitoring of the social fund.

Details of the amendments and a revised copy of the Secretary of State's directions and guidance to take effect from 1 April 1996 have been placed in the Library.

Supply Estimates

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set out for each year since 1990–91 in respect of the supply estimates for each sub-head of the votes accounted for by the Department of Social Security*(a)* the original estimate, the amount of increase or decrease for which approval was sought in the (b) summer, (c) winter and (d) spring supplementary estimates and the (e) amount of any excess vote; and which sub-heads were subject to a cash limit. [16678]

Mr. Burt: The table sets out the original estimate provision, the changes secured in the summer, winter, and spring supplementary estimates, and the amounts of any excess votes, for each of the votes accounted for by the Department of Social Security and for each year since 1990–91. Details of grants, expenditure, and receipts in respect of individual subheads of the votes are contained within the published appropriation accounts for each vote which are available in the Library.

Departmental Expenditure (Waveney)

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the total expenditure by his Department in Waveney in 1994–95; what it will be in 1995–96, broken down by category; and if he will make a statement. [17841]

Mr. Burt: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Lone Mothers

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone mothers were in receipt of family credit in each year since 1994. [18250]

Mr. Roger Evans: There were 235,000 lone mothers receiving family credit in July 1994 and 266,000 in July 1995, the latest date for which figures are available.

Source: Family Credit Statistics Quarterly Enquiry July 1994 and July 1995.

Pension Rights (Divorce)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what research his Department has commissioned on international comparisons of the treatment of pension rights on divorce; if he will set out the terms of reference of the project, the names of the researchers, the period of study and the estimated cost; what is the present status of the research; and when he expects to publish a report on the findings. [17591]

Mr. Heald: In September 1995, the Department commissioned Watson Wyatt, actuaries and consultants to carry out an International Comparison of the treatment of pension rights on divorce. Using local consultants in each country and drawing upon available literature, this work will provide comprehensive information on how pension rights are treated on divorce in nine countries: Australia, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, the USA, the Netherlands, New Zealand and Sweden. Work is currently in progress and the first draft report is expected in the Department at the end of March 1996. A final draft report should be available by the summer. Decisions on publication will be taken when the final draft is received. The cost of this research is £81,000.

Residential Care

Mr. MacGregor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the cost of excluding the family home from calculation of means for the purpose of determining liability to pay for nursing home and other residential long-term care.

Mr. Bowis: I have been asked to reply.

No detailed estimates have been made. To raise the upper capital limit used by local authorities when charging for residential care to the value of the average house would, we broadly estimate, cost some half a billion pounds. This is based on the current number of people who pay the total cost of such care; it takes no account of variation in usage which could result from such a change.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans his Department has to implement the MacSharry proposals to modulate the common agricultural policy, with specific regard to (a) a taper on milk support and (b) restructuring of the hill livestock compensation allowance; and if he will make a statement. [18604]

Mr. Baldry: The Commission's proposals to modulate CAP payments were rejected by the Agriculture Council when it agreed to reform the CAP in May 1992.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the active ingredients used in the dispersant used on the oil spill at Milford Haven in February. [17979]

Mr. Baldry: The dispersants used on oil spilt from the Sea Empress at Milford Haven contained the following ingredients:

Butyl glycol
Dioctyl sodium sulphosucinate
Ethoxylated fish oil
Ethoxylated sorbitan tri-tallate
Ethoxylated tall oil
Iso octanol
Odourless kerosene
Paraffin solvent
Polyethylene glycol fatty acid ester

Propylene glycol

Sodium dioctyl sulfosuccinate propylene glycol

Sorbitan monooleate

Sorbitan monooleate ethoxylate

Tall oil

NORTHERN IRELAND

National Continence Day

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to support National Continence Day on 19 March; and what plans he has to improve the incontinence service in Northern Ireland in 1996–97. [17140]

Mr. Moss: The Department of Health and Social Services will be funding a freephone helpline and arranging publicity for National Continence Day. In addition, continence advisers will be manning stands at shopping and health centres throughout Northern Ireland. A report will also be issued making recommendations for developments in continence services in 1996–97 and beyond.

Restraint and Confiscation Orders

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many restraint and confiscation orders have been obtained in each of the last three years; and for what amounts. [17148]

Sir John Wheeler: Restraint orders for the confiscation of the proceeds of drug trafficking and other crime are made under the Criminal Justice (Confiscation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1990. Details for the last three years are as follows:

Year	Number of confiscation orders	Total value £	Number of restraint orders
1993	nil	nil	2
1994	2	5,083.89	1
1995	39	28,106.39	3

Values for a restraint order cannot be accurately given since these are made against a person to prohibit him from dealing with property rather than for a specific amount.

Arts Council

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the level of co-operation between the Northern Ireland Arts Council and the arts council in (a) Scotland, (b) England, (c) Wales and (d) the Irish Republic; and what plans there are to enhance co-operation and promote more jointly funded projects. [17096]

Mr. Ancram: The chairmen and chief executives of the four Arts Councils in the United Kingdom meet from time to time to consider matters of common interest. Close co-operation has also evolved between the four councils in relation to their function as distributing bodies for the proceeds of the national lottery, with regular meetings at official level.

The chief executives of the Arts Councils in Northern Ireland, in the Republic of Ireland, in Scotland and in Wales meet annually to exchange information and ideas. Officers of the Arts Council of Northern Ireland are in frequent contact with officers of all four of the other Arts Councils about areas of mutual interest and individual projects which extend to more than one territory.

The Arts Councils of Northern Ireland and of the Republic of Ireland have held annual joint meetings since the mid-1970s at which areas of co-operation are explored. In 1994, the two councils established a joint committee, with four representatives from each council, which meets twice a year to explore and develop a variety of further cross-border initiatives with particular emphasis on the involvement of youth. The two Arts Councils already jointly fund a number of all-Ireland activities and organisations, and have agreed to make joint appointments of staff as and when necessary. They currently jointly employ an arts co-operation officer to encourage north/south co-operation and co-ordinate touring arts events in both territories.

Mr. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many times the chairman of the Northern Ireland Arts Council met the chairmen of the arts councils in (a) Scotland, (b) England, (c) Wales and (d) the Irish Republic in 1995. [17097]

Mr. Ancram: The chairman of the Arts Council of Northern Ireland met his Scottish, English and Welsh counterparts on one occasion in 1995 while he had three meetings with the chairman of the Arts Council of the Republic of Ireland.

In addition to the above, the vice-chairman of the Arts Council of Northern Ireland substituted for the chairman at one meeting with the chairmen of the Scottish, the English and the Welsh councils.

Mr. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what projects were jointly funded between the Northern Ireland Arts Council and the arts council in (a) Scotland, (b) England, (c) Wales and (d) the Irish Republic in 1995; and at what cost. [17098]

Mr. Ancram: In 1995, the four UK Arts Councils and the Arts Council in the Republic of Ireland funded a five cities tour of poetry readings. The cost to the Arts Council of England was £22,000, with the other four councils contributing £1,000 each.

Jointly funded projects between individual councils were as follows:

(a) The Arts Council of Northern Ireland and the Scottish Arts Council jointly commissioned from Piers Hellawell a musical composition for the Highland festival in June 1996 at a cost of £650 to each Council.

(b) There were no projects jointly funded between the Arts Council of Northern Ireland and the Arts Council of England.

(c) There were no projects jointly funded between the Arts Council of Northern Ireland and the Arts Council of Wales.

(d) There were a large number of projects jointly funded between the Arts Council of Northern Ireland and the Arts Council in the Republic of Ireland. My officials are currently gathering the information requested and I will write to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as it is available, and place the information in the Library of the House.

Community Work Programme

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate the number of applicants against the available places on the community work programme at the latest available date; and if he will make a statement. [18078]

Mr. Ancram: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr Ian Walters. I have asked him to arrange for the reply to be given.

letter from Ian Walters to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 1 March 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency to reply to your question about applicants for the pilot Community Work Programme.

At 23 February 1996, the Partnerships established to manage the pilot Community Work Programme had received 708 applications for the 1,000 places targeted. At the same date 509 places were filled.

I hope that you find this reply useful.

Action for Community Employment Scheme

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to replace the action for community employment scheme with the community work programme; and if he will make a statement. [18090]

Mr. Ancram: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Ian Walters. I have asked him to arrange for the reply to be given.

Letter from Ian Walters to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 28 February 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency to reply to your question about the pilot Community Work Programme and ACE.

There are no plans to replace the Action for Community Employment programme with the Community Work Programme (CWP). The Training and Employment Agency will undertake during 1996/97 an evaluation of the CWP pilot as well as an in depth review of its policies and measures aimed at helping the long term unemployed back to work. It is not possible at this stage to say what changes, if any, to present programmes might result from these exercises.

I hope that you find this reply useful.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the impact of the proposed reduction in the funding of the action for community employment scheme on the achievement of the objectives of the policy appraisal and fair treatment initiative. [17676]

Mr. Ancram: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Ian Walters. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Ian Walters to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 4 March 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency to reply to your question about the PAFT initiative and ACE.

Policy Appraisal and Fair Treatment guidelines were applied to decisions regarding the future funding of the Action for Community Employment programme. The affect of the reduction in funding should not have a differential impact on the overall balance of the programme to PAFT target groups.

A report of the assessment which was made will be submitted for inclusion in the 1995 PAFT Annual Report due to be published later this year.

I hope that you find this reply useful.

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much has been allocated to the Northern Ireland ACE training scheme to protect the jobs of core workers; for how long such protection will be extended; and which Department provided the funds. [18682]

Mr. Ancram: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Ian Walters. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Ian Walters to Mr. Eric Illsley, dated 4 March 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency to reply to your question about the Action for Community Employment programme.

In her announcement on 19 February 1996 Baroness Denton indicated that up to £2 million would be made available in 1996–97 to allow ACE schemes more time to manage the reduction of their activities. It is not possible at present to say exactly how much of this sum will be used to help schemes which are losing core workers to phase them out over the year. The Agency is continuing to consult the Northern Ireland Federation of ACE Schemes on the implementation of the assistance package.

Until actual expenditure patterns become clearer during 1996–97 it will not be possible to say with certainty which Department has provided the funds. The Agency will seek to provide at least some of the funding from savings in other Agency programmes.

I hope that you find this reply helpful.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of the funding of the action for community employment scheme came from the European structural funds in the last 12 months; how much of this money is to be allocated to the company development programme; and if he will make a statement. [17677]

Mr. Ancram: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Ian Walters. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Ian Walters to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 4 March 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency to reply to your question about European Union funding for the Action for Community Employment Scheme.

During the past 12 months, no European Union funding was awarded to the ACE scheme and therefore nothing was reallocated to the Company Development Programme from this source.

I hope that you find this reply useful.

Household Formation

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the rate of new household formation in each year since 1993; and what is the projected rate to the end of 1996. [18630]

Mr. Moss: Latest information available shows the following rates:

Year	Rate of new household formation
July 1993–June 1994	3.1 per cent. (17,530 new households)
July 1994–June 1995	2.5 per cent. (14,570 new households)
July 1995–June 1996	2.7 per cent. (15,870 new households)

Homelessness

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list by county the total numbers of (a) families, (b) single men, (c) single women and (d) men and women under the age of 18 years, who were registered as homeless during (i) 1994 and (ii) 1995. [18631]

Mr. Moss: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. I am advised by the chief executive that figures can be provided only for those applicants who were accepted as homeless and awarded A1 priority status. The information is available only on a financial year basis and by Housing Executive region, not by county.

The information is as follows:

Housing executive region awarded A1 status

	1993–94	1994–95

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what was the percentage change of the number of A1 applicants in each Housing Executive region between 1994 and 1995; [18680]

(2) if he will list by Housing Executive region the total numbers on housing waiting lists and the number of A1 applicants. [18681]

Mr. Moss: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. I am advised by its chief executive that the total numbers on the housing waiting list, the number of applicants granted A1 status and the percentage change in A1 status at 31 March 1994 and 1995, by Housing Executive region, were as follows:

Northern Ireland housing executive region

	A1 Status		Percentage change

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Arts (Public Funding)

19. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment she has made of overall public funding provision for the arts. [16371]

Mr. Sproat: Funding for the arts in this country is at a higher level now than ever before. Through the four arts councils, the Government are giving £229 million this year. Local authorities across England, Scotland and Wales are providing revenue funding of around £237 million. Support last year from the business community reached a new peak at nearly £83 million. On top of this, the lottery has provided more than £277 million towards improving and increasing the availability and quality of the arts for everyone in the UK.

National Lottery

20. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many charities which assist young people have been awarded funds from the national lottery. [16373]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Over 1,000 awards, to a value of £75 million, have been made to organisations directly concerned with young people, 114 of which, worth more than £16 million, have been made directly to schools.

Helping the nation's young people is an investment in our future. That is why I have recently announced plans to widen the distribution of lottery proceeds—with a particular emphasis on youth. My proposals will give the lottery distributors the ability to provide revenue support for initiatives to help develop sporting and artistic excellence in our country's young people.

21. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the conclusions of monitoring the distribution of national lottery funds in relation to charities. [16374]

Mrs. Bottomley: Monitoring of the distribution of lottery proceeds is on going. To date 4,394 awards worth £556.2 million have been made to charities and voluntary organisations.

23. Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what steps she is taking to overcome the difficulties for lottery funds applications in inner city areas arising from the need to identify partnership funding. [16376]

Mrs. Bottomley: I recently met the chairmen of the lottery distributing bodies and encouraged them, within the existing directions issued under section 26 of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993, to take a flexible approach on partnership funding requirements, particularly when considering applications from areas in need of regeneration and in remote rural areas. The Sports Council has recently announced that it would be setting a lower limit for applicants based in any of 70 areas throughout England of economic and sporting deprivation. The partnership requirement can also be met by contributions in kind, such as voluntary labour, or the donation of land or equipment.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To asks the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will provide a breakdown of ticket sales for the national lottery on the same regional basis as the breakdown of value of all awards published in the December 1995 report on the distribution of national lottery proceeds; and if she will include such a breakdown of ticket sales in future monthly lottery reports. [16972]

Mr. Sproat: The breakdown of national lottery ticket sales is an operational matter for Camelot Group plc. The Director General of the National Lottery has licensed Camelot to run the national lottery and he regulates its operations. I have therefore asked the director general to write to the hon. Member, placing copies of his response in the Libraries of the House.

Sport (Televising)

22. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations she has received since the publication of her consultation document on the televising of sport. [16375]

Mr. Sproat: My Department has received representations from members of the public, Members of Parliament and from organisations representing consumers, broadcasters, sports bodies and regulatory authorities.

Film Industry

24. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what recent consultations she has had with representatives of the film industry. [16377]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I meet film industry representatives on a regular basis and had meetings last week with Sir David Puttnam and Sir Sydney Samuelson.

National Stadium (Manchester)

25. Sir Fergus Mongomery: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations she has received about the siting of a new stadium in Manchester for the Commonwealth games in 2002. [16378]

Mr. Sproat: I have received a number of representations about Manchester's plans for the Commonwealth games stadium but have not been directly involved in the decision making process. However, my officials have been kept in touch with progress.

Tourism Industry (Deregulation)

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what progress she has made in reducing excessive regulation in the tourism industry. [16365]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Good progress has been made. Measures such as the reforms of liquor licensing law, Sunday trading law and food hygiene regulation have all benefited tourism. My Department worked closely with the Department of Transport on the recent relaxation of the rules governing white-on-brown road signs. This will help a wide range of tourism-related businesses.

River Thames (Tourism)

Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has for developing the tourist potential of the River Thames. [16370]

Mr. Sproat: In January my right hon. Friend launched the "Focus London" initiative to revitalise London's image as a tourist destination. Four million pounds of public money will be made available to be matched by the private sector. This will undoubtably boost tourism to the river area. We are working closely with the London tourist board and the Government office for London and private sector partners to ensure that we take full advantage of the excellent opportunities for sustainable tourism offered by the river.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will place in the Library a list of all overseas visits made by all Ministers of her Department since 1992, including (a) details of the places visited and brief reasons for the visit, (b) details of the size, composition and cost to public funds of the delegation and (c) the names of non-ministerial members of each delegation and the capacity in which each was present. [17488]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 1 March 1996]: I have today placed in the House Libraries a list detailing all overseas visits made by all Ministers of my Department since 1992.

Total overseas travel and subsistence costs for Ministers and accompanying private secretaries were £15,807.57 in 1993–94; £46,125.09 in 1994–95; and £23,800.89, so far in 1995–96. Figures for 1992–93 are not available.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Allen: To ask the Attorney-General what consultations he has had with the Secretary to the Cabinet concerning the Government's response to the Scott inquiry; and where and when such consultations took place. [16607]

The Attorney-General [holding answer 22 February 1996]: Successive Governments have not disclosed the nature or the specific sources of the advice they receive from the civil service.

Confiscation Unit

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Attorney-General (1) if he will review with the service heads the resources allocated to the confiscation unit; [17146]

(2) if he will review with the Director of Public Prosecutions the resources allocated to the confiscation unit. [17143]

The Attorney-General: The central confiscation branch is part of the central casework area of the Crown Prosecution Service. Whilst the allocation of resources within the service is primarily a matter for the Director of Public Prosecutions I regularly discuss with her the allocation of resources to the service as a whole.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Attorney-General how many full-time staff there are in the confiscation unit of the Crown Prosecution Service. [17141]

The Attorney-General: The central confiscation branch, which is part of the central casework area of the Crown Prosecution Service, has eight lawyers, two accountancy technicians, and eight caseworkers working full time. In addition, there are two lawyers and one accountancy technician working part time.

Public Interest Immunity Certificates

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Attorney-General what monitoring is undertaken of the documents relating to PII claims; and if he will make a statement. [17792]

The Attorney-General: It is for the Minister or other responsible person advancing a PII claim to satisfy himself that the documents fall within the scope of the claim as formulated.

Mr. Carlile: To ask the Attorney-General (1) what is the definition his Department follows of public interest in relation to a PII certificate; and if he will make a statement; [17555]

The Attorney-General: The law on public interest immunity is judge-made. The courts have held that a PII claim may be advanced with respect to a document either on the basis of its contents or because it belongs to one of the established PII classes.

As to the future, I have announced that the Government are considering carefully the recommendations in the Scott report in relation to PII and are seeking the views of interested parties. The Government intend that the House will have an opportunity to consider the circumstances in which PII should be claimed by Ministers and the criteria for those claims, Official Report, 26 February 1996, column 684.

Prince and Princess of Wales

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Attorney-General on what occasions he has advised, or acted as an interlocutor, for (a) Her Majesty the Queen and (b) the Prince and Princess of Wales in relation to, or about their respective private property and/or other rights consequent on the separation of the Prince and Princess of Wales. [18885]

The Attorney-General: The matters raised by the hon. Member are confidential.

WALES

Health Care Budget

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage of the total annual budget in Wales is designated for health care; and if he will make a statement. [17516]

Mr. Richards: Provision for the national health service in Wales currently represents about 33 per cent. of total expenditure within the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

A470

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on his Department's future plans concerning the improvement of the A470 in Powys. [17528]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Plans for major improvements on the A470 in Powys in 1996–97 and future years will be included in the 1996 Welsh Office departmental report to be published later this month. In addition there are five schemes in the medium—under £3 million— programme for construction in the next three years. Further schemes are planned.

Gwent Health Commission

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he was (a) consulted or (b) informed beforehand about the decision to appoint Maggie Aikman as director of finance of the Gwent Health Commission. [17545]

Mr. Richards: An official from the Welsh Office was one of two independent assessors present during the interviews. The decision to appoint Mrs. Aikman was taken by Gwent health authority on the basis of appropriate information about each of the candidates.

Inward Investment

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet the director of Invest in Britain to discuss trends in the number of inward investment company visits arranged by Invest in Britain which led to visits by these companies to Wales. [17228]

Mr. Hague: No. My Department and the Welsh Development Agency work closely with the bureau on this and other matters. I am keen to see as many company visits to Wales as possible.

Sheep

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the percentage and the number of lame sheep in the national flock. [17504]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Government have been funding the Royal Veterinary college to carry out a study into ovine lameness. The first part of the study, a survey of a random sample of sheep holdings, found a reported incidence of lameness of about 8 per cent. in 1993–94. This is now being followed up by on-farm investigations into the different causes of lameness with a view to developing improved methods of control.

Abattoirs

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assistance he has given the abattoir industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [17439]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Seven companies have accepted grant aid for assistance towards the abattoir industry in Wales under regional selective assistance and agricultural and marketing grants, with a total value of £2.3 million. These projects were forecast to create or safeguard 408 jobs and involve £10.5 million of private investment.

Wales European Centre, Brussels

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what financial assistance is being made available this year by his Department towards the maintenance of the Wales European Centre in Brussels. [17886]

Mr. Hague: None.

Electricity Supply

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will examine the reasons for the interruption to electricity supplies in Wales during the recent severely cold weather; and if he will make a statement about the adequacy of the electricity supply network in Wales and of the quality of maintenance and frequency of replacement of parts of that network. [18363]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I met SWALEC's chief executive recently to discuss these matters. Action on the issues you raise is properly the responsibility of the company itself and the Director General of Electricity Supply.

Telecommunications Masts

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he is pursuing in Wales to regulate the construction of telecommunications masts, electricity towers and wind generators in areas of outstanding natural beauty and on high ridges. [18364]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Government are committed to the protection of the countryside generally and to high quality landscapes in particular, while providing for the growth of telecommunication systems and renewable energy sources. Policy guidance to local planning authorities on these matters is contained in planning policy guidance note 8 "Telecommunications" and note 22 "Renewable Energy". The regulation of overhead electricity lines is a matter for my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

Urban Design

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to encourage higher standards of urban design in respect of new developments in towns and villages in Wales. [18365]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend and I want to see a high standard of design which contributes to the quality of people's lives and can help to revitalise our urban areas and attract business and investment to them. Responsibility for good design rests with designers and developers. What Government must do is to encourage and not prescribe. Planning policy guidance note 1 advises planning authorities that good design should be the aim of all involved in the development process.

Domestic Services (Prices)

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) by what percentage the price of gas for industrial and commercial customers has changed in Wales over the past five years, on a year-by-year basis; and what assessment he has made of the reasons for the changes; [18462]

(2) by what percentage the price of electricity for commercial and industrial customers has changed in Wales over the past five years, on a year-by-year basis; and what assessment he has made of the reasons for the changes; [18464]

(3) by what percentage the price of telecommunications for industrial and commercial customers has changed in Wales over the past five years, on a year-by-year basis; and what assessment he has made of the reasons for the changes; [18460]

(4) by what percentage the price of telecommunications for domestic customers has changed in Wales over the past five years, on a year-by-year basis; and what assessment he has made of the reasons for the changes; [18461]

(5) by what percentage the price of gas for domestic customers has changed in Wales over the past five years, on a year-by-year basis; and what assessment he has made of the reasons for the changes; [18463]

(6) by what percentage the price of electricity for domestic customers has changed in Wales over the past five years, on a year-by-year basis; and what assessment he has made of the reasons for the changes. [18465]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is not available separately for Wales.

Water Services

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) by what percentage the price of water and water services for domestic customers has changed in Wales over the past five years, on a year-by-year basis; and what assessment he has made of the reasons for the changes. [18466]

(2) by what percentage the price of water and water services for commercial and industrial customers has changed in Wales over the past five years, on a year-by-year basis; and what assessment he has made to the reasons for the changes. [18372]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The yearly average percentage increases in water and sewerage charges to household customers in Wales served by Dwr Cymru Cyfyngedig are as follows:

Financial year	Annual percentage increase
1991–92	15.92
1992–93	8.11
1993–94	9.41
1994–95	9.45
1995–96	3.25

Source:
Office of Water Services.

Meaningful average increase figures are not available for commercial and industrial customers as the average commercial customer and average commercial use can change significantly from year to year.

Sample bills for non-household customers are provided in Ofwat's report on tariff structure and charges, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

M4 (Fencing Contract)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will make final settlement to Haycan Ltd. in respect of the fencing contract for the M4 Brynglas tunnels which was completed in May 1995. [18510]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: This is a matter between Haycan Ltd. and the main contractor for the scheme.

Housing Development (Gelliwion)

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will examine the circumstances surrounding the decision by Taff Ely district council to proceed with a planning application to develop private housing on a greenfield site at Gelliwion, next to a listed site of special scientific interest, in Pontypridd. [18366]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend has received requests to call in this planning application for his own determination. After careful consideration he has issued an article 14 direction. This prevents the local planning authority from granting planning permission, but does not prevent it continuing to process the application, or refusing planning permission. I will ensure that the hon. Member is informed of the final decision on call-in.

Town and Village Centres

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the measures proposed by the Welsh Office to revitalise town and village centres in Wales. [18368]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: A wide range of existing Welsh Office measures, in conjunction with local authorities, development agencies and other bodies are being used to promote the regeneration of town and village centres in Wales. These measures include the strategic development scheme; urban investment grant; the programme for the valleys; the Wales tourist board's historic towns and resorts integrated development programme; the Land Authority for Wales; and the Welsh Development Agency's urban and rural development programmes.

The forthcoming White Paper for rural Wales represents a comprehensive review of the Government's policies as they affect life in rural Wales. Reflecting the responses to the extensive White Paper consultation exercise which has been undertaken, it will address the need to support communities, to encourage economic diversification and enterprise and to protect and conserve the Welsh countryside.

Landfill Tax

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the environmental impact in Wales of the proposed landfill tax; and if he will make a statement. [18369]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The landfill tax will contribute towards reducing the impact of waste on the environment by encouraging businesses and consumers to produce less waste and to recover value from more of the waste that is produced.

Housing Stock (Valleys)

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the measures proposed by the Welsh Office to underpin financially the improvement of existing housing stock in the south Wales valleys. [18370]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Around £85 million is being made available in 1996–97 for capital improvements to the housing stock in the south Wales valleys.

Energy Conservation

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures have been proposed by the Welsh Office to improve domestic energy conservation in Wales. [18371]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Domestic energy conservation can currently be improved under the renovation grant system and the home energy efficiency scheme. In 1997 Welsh councils will prepare energy conservation reports to meet the requirements of the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995.

Antisocial Tenants

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to help local authorities in Wales deal with anti-social tenants. [18513]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Part V of the Housing Bill, which would apply to England and Wales, contains a number of such proposals including:

(a) giving councils a discretionary power to introduce a scheme of one year introductory tenancies allowing for quicker and easier repossession where new tenants behave irresponsibly;

(b) extending the grounds for possession to include nuisance or annoyance by anyone visiting or in the locality of a tenant's property;

(c) introducing a new ground for possession relating to domestic violence;

(d) allowing a power of arrest to be attached to injunctions where there is actual or threatened violence.

Farmers Charter

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on what date he published his farmers charter; and how many copies have been distributed to farmers. [18876]

Mr. Hague: "Helping Farmers in Wales", the charter standard for farmers in Wales, was published on 5 October 1995. Approximately 7,300 copies have been issued through the offices of the Country Landowners' Association, the Farmers' Union of Wales, the National Farmers' Union and my Agriculture Department.

Health Promotion Wales

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the guidelines to health authorities on the repatriation to them of funds hitherto allocated to the Health Promotion Authority for Wales; if such guidance will cover the impact of rental payments by the HPAW for its headquarters buildings on its (a) operating costs and (b) total costs in bidding for health promotion work from health authorities; and if he will make a statement. [18838]

Mr. Hague: My Department issued a circular letter (DGM(96)(12) on 30 January 1996, giving guidance to health authorities on the future arrangements for health promotion in Wales and the role of Health Promotion Wales. Copies of the letter have been placed in the Library of the House.

Health Promotion Wales will be expected to meet all of its costs through the contracts it secures with health authorities, the Welsh Office and other organisations.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list capital projects in excess of £0.5 million gross cost under consideration by Welsh training and enterprise councils in which some expenditure may be committed in the final quarter of the 1995–96 financial year. [18592]

Mr. Hague: There are no projects with a gross capital cost in excess of £0.5 million being considered by Welsh training and enterprise councils which will entail capital expenditure commitments during the last quarter of the current financial year.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the EU Commissioner responsible for regional development and his departmental officials concerning a review of objective 2 status in industrial south Wales. [18593]

Mr. Hague: I met Commissioner Wulf Mathia on 4 October 1995 when I discussed continued objective 2 status for industrial south Wales and the Government have made clear to the Commissioner that we see no case for changing the current UK objective map.

My officials, together with the partnerships, are already developing the new single programming document for industrial south Wales.

Emergency Medical Admissions

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 27 February, Official Report, column 498, on emergency admissions and elective surgery, if he will place in the Library a copy of the emergency admissions action plan. [18623]

Mr. Hague: A copy of the outline action plan agreed by senior NHS representatives has been placed in the Library of the house. The action plan continues to be developed and I expect to receive a further report later this month.

GP Fundholders

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, (1) pursuant to his answer of 27 February, Official Report, column 497, if he will give the available figures since 31 March 1995 for the levels of unspent balances of general practitioner fundholders (a) broken down by family health service authority and (b) for Wales to the latest available date; [18626]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 27 February, Official Report, column 498, if he will list the figures indicating balances as at 31 December 1995; and what assessment he has made of how these figures related to business plans provided to his Department before the start of the financial year. [18629]

Mr. Hague: GP fundholder health plans are not submitted to the Department. It is for FHSAs in Wales to assess the plans against national and local priorities for improving health and health services.

Information on fundholder balances is shown in the annual accounts of family health services authorities. The Department does not collect this information during the financial year.

Cardiff Bay Barrage

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 27 February, Official Report, column 496, what assessment he has made of the impact of containing the total outturn expenditure figure on the Cardiff bay barrage project on completion of (a) the environmental island in the lake, (b) the announced number of water mixers, (c) the sea angling pier, (d) the combined rain and foul sewer outfalls to a standard of not more than three spills per summer, (e) three boat locks, and (f) the reduction of the lake water depth to 1.5 m; and if he will make a statement. [18627]

Mr. Hague: An assessment of these costs is an operational matter for the Cardiff Bay development corporation. I have asked the chief executive of the corporation to respond and will place a copy of that response in the Library of the House.

Hospital Trusts (Job Plans)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales which Welsh NHS hospitals trusts have completed and agreed job plans for all their consultants. [18839]

Mr. Hague: This information is not held centrally. It is up to local management to ensure that consultants have an agreed job plan setting out their fixed commitments and other responsibilities.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 27 February, Official Report, column 496, which two non-executive directors of the South East Wales Ambulance trust have their terms of office expiring on 30 April. [18679]

Mr. Hague: The two non-executive directors whose terms of appointment expire on 30 April 1996 are Mr. Ian Gray and Mr. Brian John Webb. Information on all current public appointments is contained in "Appointments by the Secretary of State for Wales", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Written Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT

Cement Kilns

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 27 February, Official Report, column 474, if he will now contact other member states of the European Union to request information on the emission regulations applicable to cement plants burning secondary liquid fuels. [18549]

Mr. Clappison: Member states have already adopted a directive—94/67/EC—on the incineration of hazardous waste which will also apply to any other plant that burns such waste. Cement plants burning wastes will thus have to comply with the relevant provisions of this directive in all member states.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans the Environment Agency has to carry out a detailed analysis of the precipitator dust from cement kilns which burn secondary liquid fuel, with particular reference to the potential of such dust to contaminate soil and groundwater. [18869]

Mr. Clappison: The Environment Agency will require the operators to carry out appropriate analysis for all releases to air, water and land.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans the Environment Agency has to issue guidance to cement kiln operators on meeting the requirements of the hazardous waste incineration directive. [18868]

Mr. Clappison: Chief inspector's guidance notes reflect the requirements of all relevant directives and will remain applicable in the Environment Agency.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans the Environment Agency has to consider the overall environmental impact of the burning of secondary liquid fuel in cement kilns, including the deposition of kiln dust at landfill sites. [18870]

Mr. Clappison: The Environment Agency will take into account the overall environmental impact of releases to air, water and land.

Domestic Premises (Commercial Use)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the number of domestic properties that are used for commercial purposes. [18501]

Mr. Clappison: The Department does not collect information on the number of domestic properties that are used for commercial premises.

Home Energy Efficiency Scheme

Sir Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if people who receive attendance allowance will be added to the list of those eligible for a 100 per cent. home energy efficiency scheme grant after 31 March. [18334]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Yes. We intend that householders over the age of 65 receiving attendance allowance should be able to claim full grants under the home energy efficiency scheme in the same way as householders receiving disability living allowance.

Industrial Processes (Pollution)

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the Environment Agency's policy in relation to the continued authorisation of industrial processes operated by companies which have failed to implement solutions to pollution problems within the time scale agreed with the agency or with a predecessor authority. [18871]

Mr. Clappison: Without prejudice to its powers under the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to vary an authorisation, the Environment Agency will require the operators to meet the conditions in their authorisations issued by it or its predecessor authorities.

Water Research Council

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the conclusions of the 1992 report from the Water Research Council. [18565]

Mr. Clappison: The report "Economics of Lead Pipe Replacement (TMU 9030)" giving the results of research funded by my Department and undertaken by the WRC has been publicly available since the work was completed in 1992. A copy was also placed in the Library of the House.

Derelict Buildings (Westminster Hospital)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the environmental impact of the derelict buildings of the former Westminster hospital. [18853]

Sir Paul Beresford: None. This is a matter for Westminster city council as local planning authority.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy that proposed variations to authorisations granted under part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 shall in all cases be subject to the same consultation procedures as apply in respect of new authorisations. [18872]

Mr. Clappison: There is no need to change the existing regulations—the Environmental Protection (Applications, Appeals and Registers) Regulations 1991—No. 507—which deal with consultation.

Pollution Abatement Measures

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers he has to require companies to invest in pollution abatement measures in circumstances where savings accrue to such companies from the use of new fuels or processes which emit quantities of pollutants in excess of those emitted by the fuel or process which has been replaced. [18866]

Mr. Clappison: Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution does not allow fuel or process changes that lead to a net adverse environmental effect. Any increased profitability due to fuel or process change is taken into account in assessing the operators' improvement programmes to meet new plant standards under the best available technology not entailing excessive cost criteria of the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Internal Combustion Engines (Pollution)

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in respect of each major toxic element the levels of pollution in the United Kingdom caused by all internal combustion driven transport for each of the years since 1970. [18874]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 4 March 1996]: I have taken major toxic element to refer to the heavy metals lead, cadmium, mercury, nickel, chromium, arsenic, copper, zinc, selenium and vanadium. The table shows the emissions of each of the above heavy metals due to fuel combustion from all road vehicles since 1970 expressed in tonnes per annum. The latest year for which data are available is 1993.

Ocean Policies

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer of 29 November 1995, Official Report, column 737, what consideration the workshop gave to the sustainability of the oceans, ocean science, linking science to management and global arrangements for ensuring effective implementation of ocean policies. [16814]

Mr. Clappison: The London international workshop on decision making on ocean issues, which was held on 30 November to 2 December 1995, considered the key pressures affecting the sustainability of the oceans. The conclusions dealt with possible changes to improve the effectiveness of the current international arrangements for obtaining scientific advice and formulating strategies and priorities for action. A copy of the workshop report has been placed in the Library.

Water Pollution (Nitrates)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a copy of the fiche d'impact prepared in connection with Council directive 91/676/EEC concerning the protection of waters against pollution caused by nitrates from agricultural sources. [18636]

Mr. Clappison: A copy of the explanatory memorandum was placed in the House of Commons Library at the time of the publication of the proposals for a directive. This did not contain a fiche d'impact.

Local Agenda 21

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the annual spending by his Department on Local Agenda 21 work; how much is distributed to local authorities; what allowance is made in standard spending assessments for Local Agenda 21 to each local authority; and if he will make a statement. [19067]

Mr. Clappison: In 1995–96, my Department is contributing up to £12,000 for local authorities to set up round table discussions with different groups interested in Local Agenda 21. It is also giving £20,554 to the local authority associations for the provision of guidance to local authorities on auditing sustainable development, and £25,000 for the development and promotion of the eco-management and audit scheme for local government. Many of the projects funded by the Department's environmental action fund, which totals £4 million in 1995–96, also support Local Agenda 21. Standard spending assessments take account of the wide range of local authorities' spending, including Local Agenda 21 work, but do not include a specific element for such expenditure.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the Local Government Commission's future programme of work; and if he will make a statement. [19550]

Mr. Curry: The Local Government Commission has today announced a programme for the next three years of periodic electoral reviews of district and county councils. We want the commission to give priority to those reviews which it has an independent duty to carry out, but we will direct it to carry out a small number of other reviews—of Southport in Merseyside and of the parish arrangements in four local authority areas: Milton Keynes, Hampshire, Surrey and the new unitary authority of the East Riding of Yorkshire.

Depending on our decisions on the recommendations for unitary authorities, which the commission made in its report of December 1995, we may also direct it to carry out electoral reviews of those areas in time for elections in May 1997.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council what consultations he had with the Secretary to the Cabinet concerning the Government's response to the Scott inquiry; and where and when such consultations took place. [16600]

Mr. Newton [holding answer 22 February 1996:]: Successive Governments have not disclosed the nature of the specific sources of the advice they receive from the civil service.

Parliamentary Televising Operator

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Lord President of the Council what progress has been made towards the selection of an independent parliamentary televising operator for the five-year period from 1 August. [19078]

Mr. Newton: The Broadcasting Committees of both Houses have accepted the recommendation of a tender board, following a public tender process, that CCT Productions Ltd., the current operator, should be awarded the parliamentary televising contract for a further five-year period from 1 August 1996. The contract is formally between CCT Productions Ltd. and Parliamentary Broadcasting Unit Ltd.—PARBUL—and is subject to the successful negotiation of detailed terms by the parties. A copy of the tender submitted by CCT Productions Ltd. will be placed in the Library shortly, after the removal of any commercially sensitive information. The two Select Committees have also agreed the terms of new copyright licences required by PARBUL under the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 to cover the same five-year period as the operating contract with CCT Productions Ltd. The decision of the House of Commons Broadcasting Committee is in the form of a recommendation to Madam Speaker who, under the terms of the Act, exercises the House's function as owner of the copyright in its televised proceedings.

New Parliamentary Building

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee when he plans to make an announcement about the award of the cladding contract for the new parliamentary building. [17810]

Mr. Ray Powell: In accordance with the House's policy that the receipt of a contract may not be treated as a commercial endorsement of the successful company and that the contract should not be used in any promotional material, it is not the practice to make an announcement when contracts are awarded.

The placing of the fenestration contract for the new building is very much dependent on current negotiations, particularly on the willingness of the companies to accept the conditions of the contract. It is not possible therefore to forecast when this might be achieved.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Murders

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many terrorist-related murders in Northern Ireland since 1969 have yet to result in prosecution. [17100]

Sir John Wheeler: Unfortunately, in the time available, it is not possible to answer this question. I shall write to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as the information is available and place a copy in the Library of the House.

Childless Couples

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which health boards provide NHS treatment for (a) assisted; and (b) surrogate pregnancy to childless couples; and if he will make a statement. [17967]

Mr. Moss: Health service treatment for assisted pregnancy is available to the residents of all health and social boards in Northern Ireland. Surrogate pregnancy, on the other hand, is not a matter for which boards have—or have sought—any provision.

Road Safety

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for what reasons he has not included in the Northern Ireland road safety plan the Local Authority Association's recommendation contained in its road safety code of practice, of a ratio of one road safety education officer per 50,000 of population; and how many road safety education officers there would be in Northern Ireland if this ratio were adopted. [18228]

Mr. Moss: Northern Ireland's road safety education officer service is a part of an integrated effort involving education, engineering and enforcement. Resources devoted to this effort are being increased considerably year-on-year.

Road safety instruction in schools in Northern Ireland is carried out by schools' own teaching staff, with the advice and guidance of road safety education officers, rather than directly by road safety education officers—as has been the practice throughout most of Great Britain. This substantially increases the effective output of road safety education in Northern Ireland. In view of the different arrangements for the delivery of road safety education, it was decided that this recommendation from the code of good practice was not appropriate.

Were the ratio advocated in the code to be adopted, 31 road safety education officers would be required.

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the reasons for the reduction in the complement of road safety education officers from 1 April. [18227]

Mr. Moss: Funding for the road safety education officers service has been critically examined in the light of competing demands for resources throughout the Department of the Environment. As a result, the number of road safety education officers is to be reduced from 13 to 11 with effect from 1 April 1996.

While resources allocated to the road safety education officer service have been reduced, the service will continue to make a real and significant contribution to our drive to reduce the toll of deaths and injuries on our roads. The reductions should be seen against considerable increases in other areas of the Department's road safety effort such as engineering and enforcement.

Employment (Irish Nationals)

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of people born in the Irish Republic who presently live, in and work, in Northern Ireland, broken down by gender, how many of each sex are employed in each sector of the economy; and how many are employed in each council area. [18223]

Sir John Wheeler: The 1991 census of population contains the most recent information on the breakdown of the resident population of Northern Ireland by country of birth, sector of the economy and place of employment. The information requested is as follows:

Population aged 16 years and over, born in the Republic of Ireland, in employment in Northern Ireland, by sex, by sector of the economy.

Civil Service

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps will be taken to ensure that senior posts in the Northern Ireland civil service are subject to open competition. [17896]

Sir John Wheeler: It is the policy of the Northern Ireland civil service, when filling senior posts, to consider the appropriateness of open competition for all posts. In 1995, more than 50 per cent. of senior posts were filled through open competition.

Tree Preservation Orders (Fines)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the maximum fine for cutting down a tree which has a tree preservation order (a) in Northern Ireland and (b) in England; and what plans he has to increase the fine in Northern Ireland. [18265]

Mr. Moss: In Northern Ireland, contravention of a tree preservation order can, on summary conviction, attract a fine not exceeding level 5 on the standard scale, which is currently £5,000. In England, the statutory maximum is also level 5, or twice the sum which appears to the court to be the value of the tree, whichever is the greater. There are no plans to increase the maximum fine in Northern Ireland at present.

TREASURY

Reinvestment Relief

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to make the criteria for reinvestment relief more easily comprehensible. [17137]

Mr. Jack: The Inland Revenue is preparing a help sheet on investment relief as part of the work being done to assist taxpayers with their self-assessment returns. The Revenue is also exploring ways in which further help can be given in this area.

Statistics (Gender Breakdown)

Ms Jowell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps his Department is taking to collect statistics broken down by gender where relevant. [17691]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 29 February 1996]: Statistics collected by the Central Statistical Office—CSO—are designed to improve decision making, stimulate research and inform debate within government and the wider community. Where it is relevant to this purpose to collect statistics broken down by gender, the CSO will consider doing so. For example, last year, to coincide with the world women's conference in Beijing, the CSO published "Social Focus on Women", which provided statistics on women from a wide variety of sources.

Statistics concerning staff employed in the Treasury are normally based on pay and personnel records, which include information on sex. Statistical information about personnel can therefore usually be broken down by sex.

Arms Exports

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information the Bank of England holds about the financing by British banks, using their customers' balances, of arms supplied to Iraq and Iran; which British banks were involved; what proportion of such financing went on the supply of Valmara 69 anti-personnel land mines; and if he will make a statement. [17973]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 29 February 1996]: To the best of its knowledge, the Bank of England holds no information about the financing by British banks of exports of lethal equipment, including anti-personnel land mines, to Iraq or Iran.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 21 February, Official Report, column 156, if he will place in the Library a copy of the memorandum of understanding between the US and United Kingdom of 6 July 1989 on customs co-operation. [18532]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Gambling (Taxation)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will instigate a review of the level of taxation on different forms of gambling. [18477]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The levels of taxation on different forms of gambling are considered annually by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reaching his Budget judgment.

Waste

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the suitability of using the waste classification system proposed by the Department of the Environment to allocate particular waste streams to the different landfill tax bands. [19139]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Two hundred and twenty-four representations were received in response to Customs and Excise's recent consultation exercise on scope of the lower rate of landfill tax. These are being analysed and the findings will be submitted to Ministers shortly.

Customs consulted on a proposal that all wastes falling within category 1, the inactive category, of the Department of the Environment's national waste classification scheme should be liable to the lower rate of landfill tax. Nevertheless, there are wastes currently listed in other categories of the scheme where the risk of pollution is minimal. We will consider such cases in the light of the replies to the consultation exercise. An announcement will be made in due course and the order containing the list of items to be included in the lower rate will be laid during the summer.

Barlow Clowes

Ms Lynne: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action has been taken by his Department to improve the regulation of the financial industry since the publication of his Department's inquiry into the Barlow Clowes financial fraud case. [18322]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Department of Trade and Industry inspectors' report was published in July 1995, but the Government did not wait until then to address the regulatory issues raised by the Barlow Clowes case. Barlow Clowes operated under the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958. The deficiencies of that regulatory regime were recognised when it was replace by the Financial Services Act—FSA—1986. The introduction of the FSA saw an improvement in investor protection: it raised requirements for authorisation and widened the categories of business for which firms required authorisation. Following the review in May 1993 by Andrew Large of the role and functions of the Securities and Investments Board, greater emphasis was given to investor protection by using all the available enforcement powers. More recent developments, such as the new training and competence regime, have also played their part. As a consequence of these changes, the additional protections suggested by the report have, where appropriate, already been made available.

Post Office (External Financing Limit)

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the formula used by the Treasury to determine the Post Office external financing limit. [18847]

Mr. Waldegrave: The Post Office external financing limit is set, as part of the annual public expenditure survey, at a level which reflects an appropriate balance between the needs of the Post Office's business and its ability to contribute to public finances.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Civil Servants

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proportion of staff employed in the home civil service are (a) women, (b) people of ethnic minority origin and (c) disabled people. [19445]

Mr. Freeman: I have published today the second in a series of annual data summaries on equal opportunities in the civil service. The Government are committed to equality of opportunity for all people. Figures show improvements in the representation of women and members of ethnic minorities and, for the first time, include information on registered and non-registered disabled staff. Copies of the data summary have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

"Getting a Good Deal in Europe"

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what arrangements he has introduced to monitor the implementation of the guidance contained in the booklet "Getting a Good Deal in Europe". [18633]

Mr. Freeman: Departmental Ministers are responsible for ensuring that the guidance in the booklet "Getting a Good Deal in Europe" is applied in their Departments.

Capita Group

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list all those (a) facilities management consortiums, (b) private finance initiative bids, (c) management buyout consortiums, (d) contractorisation schemes and (e) market testing schemes in each Department in respect of which the Capita Group is currently involved in bidding. [19177]

Mr. Freeman: There are none in the Cabinet Office. Information about other Departments is not held centrally.

Civil Service Pensions

Mr. Derek Foster: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on discussions held between his Department and that of the Paymaster General regarding the impact of the prior options review of Paymaster on the administration and payment of civil service pensions. [19055]

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General announced on 4 December 1995 the start of a prior options review of the Paymaster agency, with a focus on options for moving the agency into the private sector.

The agency provides pensioner payroll and associated services for the civil service pension scheme. A market test of these services had been announced earlier by my Department. Discussions taking place between the Departments concerned are directed at securing early savings for my Department without prejudice to any future move of the agency into the private sector.

DEFENCE

Bosnia

12. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next expects to visit Bosnia to inspect British troops; and if he will make a statement. [16849]

Mr. Portillo: I regularly visit British troops in the former Yugoslavia and was last there in December. I hope to make another visit in the spring.

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the logistic plan to establish and support the implementation force with particular reference to the prices which IFOR is paying for essential services. [18616]

Mr. Soames: It is not possible to assess separately the costs of the logistic support to IFOR. Logistics costs are, however, included in the total estimated cost which is currently in the region of £300 million.

The prices which are being paid for essential services used by the UK forces contributing to IFOR are consistent with market prices. Wherever possible, we seek savings through competition, buying in bulk and exemption from taxes under the status of forces agreement.

International Peacekeeping

13. Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the effect on Britain's contribution to international peacekeeping operations of reducing United Kingdom defence spending to the European average. [16850]

Mr. Portillo: If any Government were to reduce spending to the European average of 2.3 per cent. of gross domestic product, they would be forced to cut spending on defence by as much as £4.5 billion. This would severely undermine our capacity to undertake operations of any kind.

Defence Industry

14. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British jobs are sustained by the defence industry; and if he will make a statement. [16851]

16. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the level of employment in the defence industry in the United Kingdom. [16855]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The most recent figures available are for 1993–94, when an estimated 395,000 UK jobs depend on defence expenditure. About 80 per cent. of these—315,000—were sustained by my Department's spending, on both equipment and non-equipment items; the other 20 per cent.—80,000—depended on defence exports.

Home Ownership

15. Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has in respect of home ownership among younger service personnel following the publication of the Bett report. [16852]

Mr. Soames: My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement announced on 1 March, Official Report, columns 766–67, a replacement for the married quarters discount sales scheme, which will end following the proposed sale of the married quarters estate. The new long service advance of pay scheme provides an interest-free loan and will promote home ownership more widely in the services.

Interoperable Equipment

17. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if future orders for new or replacement equipment will be interoperable with NATO partners' equipment. [16856]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Interoperability with the equipment of our NATO partners is an important consideration in our assessment of the procurement options for meeting the equipment needs of our armed forces.

Low Flying

18. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on possible damage to children's hearing caused by low-flying aircraft. [16857]

Mr. Soames: My Department has not conducted specific research into the subject. We do, however, closely monitor and evaluate scientific research on noise and hearing, including that relating to possible hearing loss in children due to aircraft noise. We believe that the restrictions we place on heights, speeds and operating procedures of military aircraft should ensure that the level of noise experienced on the ground is not harmful, particularly given the brief exposure involved.

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy over low training flights taking place over cities and towns. [18859]

Mr. Soames: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) on 10 February 1995, Official Report, column 463.

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons two RAF fighter aircraft were allowed to fly fast and low over central London at 10.57 am on 28 February and four more at 12.30 pm on the same day; and if he will make a statement. [18858]

Mr. Soames: The RAF Tornado GR1 aircraft were authorised to perform low-level flypasts of St. Paul's cathedral as part of the ceremony and service to mark the unveiling by HM the Queen of a memorial commemorating British service men who died in the Gulf war.

Army Training Regiment

19. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the operation of the Army Training Regiment. [16858]

Mr. Soames: The Army Training Regiment, Lichfield is one of five such regiments providing initial training to Army recruits. The regiment at Lichfield trains recruits for the Army Medical Services, the Parachute Regiment and the Prince of Wales Division of Infantry.

The initial training provided at the Army training regiments is designed to meet the Army's requirements in a progressive and professional way which recognises the abilities of recruits on entry. All recruits at the Army training regiment are trained to the high uniform standard laid down in the 10-weeks common military syllabus (recruits) prior to undertaking phase 2 (special to arm) training at the appropriate phase 2 training centre.

Type 23 Frigate

20. Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent representations he has received on the time scale for orders for the type 23 frigate. [16859]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing) on 21 February 1996, Official Report, column 165.

RAF Valley

21. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make an announcement on the award of the contract following the market-testing exercise carried out at RAF Valley. [16860]

Mr. Soames: Tenders for the maintenance work at RAF Valley are currently being evaluated. I expect to be in a position to announce the award of the contract in April.

Dual-use Technology

22. Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to strengthen the controls over nuclear and related dual-use technology. [16861]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Nuclear and related dual-use technology is controlled under an EC Council regulation and in UK implementing regulations, under the Dual Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulations 1995. The control list is amended when necessary to reflect changes agreed in the relevant non-proliferation regimes.

Recruitment

23. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what improvements he plans in recruiting procedures for new members of the armed services. [16862]

Mr. Soames: The most important new procedure introduced on 10 January is that of the use of jobcentres for armed forces recruiting. I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer I gave on 9 January, Official Report, column 5.

A number of other new improvements to recruiting procedures have been introduced or will be introduced in the next few months. These include a new armed forces eligibility questionnaire which allows candidates to see at a glance if they are eligible for entry into the armed forces and the introduction later this year of a standard application form for use by all three services.

In recognition of the reduced physical fitness of some young people, a physical development course is being trialled at the Army Training Regiment, Glencorse. The aim of this course is to take borderline physical fitness failures from the recruit selection centres and offer them a progressive three-week physical fitness programme to bring them up to the required entry standards.

The armed forces are also in the process of developing new formal links with the career service to help produce a wide network of well-informed careers advisers to help promote careers in the armed forces.

Arms Sales (Information)

24. Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what further steps he is taking to provide Parliament with greater access to information on arms sales; and if he will make a statement. [16863]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the speech made by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade on 26 February, Official Report, columns 589–604.

Procurement

25. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of Ministry of Defence defence equipment is procured in the United Kingdom and in Europe. [16864]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The "Statement of Defence Estimates 1995", chapter 5, figure 13, provides a breakdown of the proportion of equipment expenditure in the UK, overseas and on collaborative projects over the last five years. This indicates that, including the UK share of collaborative work, 91 per cent. by value of our direct equipment expenditure is placed with UK industry, and 9 per cent. overseas. The Department does not compile the data to break this figure for overseas expenditure down by individual countries.

Europe

26. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans next to meet his French counterpart to discuss the future defence of Europe. [16865]

Mr. Soames: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State meets his French counterpart on a regular basis and they discuss a wide range of European security and other issues.

Land Mines

27. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions he has had with representatives from the United Nations concerning the UN Secretary-General's call for a ban on the export of anti-personnel land mines. [16866]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My right hon. Friend has had no discussions on this issue with representatives of the United Nations.

Joint Service Command and Staff College

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are his plans for the provision of a joint service command and staff college; and if he will make a statement. [19446]

Mr. Soames: Further to the answer I gave the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) on 6 February, Official Report, column 169, we have now completed our appraisal of the options for staff training from September 1997 until the opening of the permanent site of the joint service command and staff college.

RAF Bracknell, Queen Elizabeth Park barracks Guildford, and the Royal Military Academy, Sandhurst were examined as possible temporary sites for the new college.

We have chosen RAF Bracknell and propose, subject to formal consultation, to open the new joint service command and staff college there in September 1997. The consultation document is available in the Library of the House.

The Government intend to dispose of the Bracknell site by the end of 1999, by which time the new college should be well established at its permanent site.

Condor Missile Programme

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his assessment of the threat posed to UK interests by the Condor missile programme; which countries have participated in it; and whether missiles developed in respect of the programme are still in position. [17208]

Mr. Soames: While we remain extremely vigilant to the potential for ballistic missile technology proliferation, we do not consider Condor II to be a threat to UK interests. The Condor II ballistic missile programme developed by Argentina in partnership with a number of European technical consultants in the 1980s, was deactivated in May 1991 when Argentina acceded to the missile technology control regime. Although both Egypt and Iraq were customers for Condor missile technology and associated production facilities, we do not believe that Condor was ever flight tested or deployed anywhere in the world.

RAF Chivenor (Iraqi Pilots)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Iraqi pilots were trained at RAF Chivenor during the 1980s. [17717]

Mr. Soames: From 1980 until 1986, a number of Iraqi pilots received training at Ministry of Defence establishments; none received weapons training or training in combat techniques. Full details of students trained at individual establishments are not available.

Asbestos-related Conditions

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel or former personnel have been awarded war pensions for asbestos-related conditions resulting from their service (a) between 1967 and 1987 and (b) since 1987; and how many of those in (b) were also awarded compensation. [18168]

Mr. Soames: No compensation payments have been made to service or ex-service personnel for asbestos-related conditions under my Department's common law liability. War pensions are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Sir Peter Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of his Department's civilian employees or former employees have been awarded compensation for asbestos-related conditions resulting from their service (a) between 1967 and 1987 and (b) since 1987. [18167]

Mr. Soames: I will write to my right hon. Friend.

Married Quarters Estate

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what have been the increases in rents for service family quarters in each of the last five years; and what are the planned increases. [18253]

Mr. Soames: The average percentage increases in accommodation charges recommended by the Armed Forces Pay Review Body for service family quarters owned by the Ministry of Defence are given.

1992–93: 3.9–9.2 per cent.

1993–94: 1.5 per cent.

1994–95: 5 per cent.

1995–96: 5–8 per cent.

1996–97: 10–25 per cent.

Charges are recommended annually by the AFPRB, who have always followed the principle that charges levied on service personnel should compare fairly with the costs civilians have to incur for comparable housing. The AFPRB acknowledged this year that family quarter charges had slipped significantly behind comparable rents in the private sector and as such had recommended a significant increase in charges. It sees this as the beginning of a number of increases over the forthcoming years to close the gap, but these are not expected to be of the same magnitude as those recommended this year. The higher percentage increases have been applied to senior officers, while increases for junior personnel have generally been in the region of 10 per cent.

Mr. John Townend: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his written answer to the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) of 26 February, Official Report, column 320, if he will place a copy of the information memorandum in the Library. [18944]

Mr. Arbuthnot: As I explained in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), the information memorandum has been issued to prequalified bidders on a commercially confidential basis. It would not, therefore, be appropriate to place a copy in the Library of the House.

Gulf War Syndrome

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the matters discussed and decisions taken at the meetings held between Ministers and officials in his Department and US congressman Steve Buyer on Gulf war-related illnesses. [18551]

Mr. Soames: Constructive meetings were held with Congressman Buyer and a range of issues were discussed. In particular, Congressman Buyer was given a progress report on the findings to date of our Gulf medical assessment programme and was advised of our plans for a series of Gulf-related epidemiological studies. Congressman Buyer was also assured of our intention to maintain close liaison with the US authorities investigating Gulf war illnesses.

RAF Aircraft Crashes

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the current provisions governing the publication of investigations into crashes of RAF aircraft. [18491]

Mr. Soames: A military aircraft accident summary, outlining the circumstances and cause of each RAF aircraft accident, together with any significant flight safety lessons learnt, is published when the board of inquiry has been completed and, when there has been a fatality, after next of kin have been made aware of the inquiry's findings. Copies of the MAAS are sent to the hon. Members in whose constituency the accident occurred as well as to those in whose constituency the aircraft involved was based. Copies are also placed in the Library of the House and published in the specialist press. This arrangement applies equally to Royal Navy aircraft accidents.

Mr. Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what provisions exist for (a) the payment of compensation for the (b) awards in recognition of gallantry, shown by RAF personnel who have died while directing a crashing aircraft away from populated areas. [18492]

Mr. Soames: Compensation would be paid in accordance with common law principles to dependants of service personnel whose death resulted from negligence on the part of the Ministry of Defence or someone acting on its behalf. If the fatal accident had been caused by the negligence of members of the aircrew, dependants of those who had been negligent would not receive compensation.

Where RAF personnel die in service and are members of the armed forces pension scheme, benefits are payable either to their dependants or to the estate of the deceased. In addition, where the cause of death is accepted as attributable to service, additional benefits will be paid even if the person had opted out of the AFPS and had made their own personal pension arrangements. These additional benefits would include a tax-free war widow's pension, where appropriate, under the scheme operated by the Department of Social Security.

The Air Force cross and Queen's commendation for bravery in the air are available to recognise acts of non-combatant gallantry by RAF personnel while flying. Higher levels of gallantry in the air may be recognised by the George cross or George medal. Each may be awarded posthumously. Recommendations for these awards are made by commanding officers when appropriate.

Mr. Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the crash of a Harrier at Burnworthy, Somerset; and what measures he is taking (a) to avert crashes of RAF aircraft and (b) to improve training instructions to avert casualties to (i) RAF personnel and (ii) civilians on the ground. [18490]

Mr. Soames: Investigations into all the aircraft accidents that have occurred this year, including the accident involving a Royal Navy Harrier T4 in my hon. Friend's constituency on 23 February, are still continuing. Action will be taken to ensure any flight safety lessons are communicated widely within my Department as soon as they become apparent. All aircrew must reach specified professional standards before they are permitted to take part in any military flying activity. There is no question that either the RAF or the Royal Navy would ever jeopardise the safety of its aircrew or civilians on the ground by allowing inadequately trained personnel to fly an aircraft.

RAF Northolt

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to increase (a) the size and capacity of RAF Northolt and (b) the number of flights into and out of that airport; and if he will make a statement. [18341]

Mr. Soames: Following the rejection of the proposal to create a civil enclave at RAF Northolt, the Government have consulted further with the business aviation industry to identify working arrangements at RAF Northolt which could improve the service offered to civil users and to business in the south-east more generally. Such arrangements could result in some limited increase in non-MOD use of RAF Northolt, but my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence and my noble Friend Viscount Goschen will of course take into account the views of local communities and other interested parties before any final decisions are made.

Armed Forces Pensions Scheme

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment his Department has made of the probable cost of making payments under the armed forces pensions scheme to the widows of service men who retired before 6 April 1978, and subsequently remarried. [18333]

Mr. Soames: My Department has no record of the number of marriages which were contracted before 1978 by former service men after their retirement, and it is not possible, therefore, to provide an accurate estimate of the cost of awarding pensions to their widows from these marriages. In broad terms, however, my Department has assessed that the final cost of recognising all service prior to 1978 in the case of post-retirement marriages could amount to about £60 million in total for the armed forces.

Empty RAF Stations

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the empty RAF stations in the United Kingdom and the acreage covered by such stations. [18294]

Mr. Soames: The following RAF stations are in the course of disposal:

	Acres
RAF Greenham Common	1,029
RAF Upper Heywood	1,250
RAF Elvington	400
RAF Bentwaters	1,042
RAF West Raynham	685
RAF Swinderby	628
RAF Binbrook	576
RAF Medmenham	35
Former RAF Kenley	15
RAF Kemble	500
Former RAF Burtonwood	136
RAF Alconbury (enclave retained)	1,050

Additionally, there are a number of other stations currently under consideration for alternative defence use and which may ultimately be passed for disposal, and others where some land is surplus to requirements and is either in disposal or may be passed for disposal.

Finningley Airport

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons the bid by Virgin to operate Finningley airport was refused. [18824]

Mr. Soames: No formal bid has been received by my Department from Virgin Airways in regard to RAF Finningley.

Eurofighter

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what aircraft he plans to purchase as an interim measure before the Eurofighter enters service. [19099]

Mr. Arbuthnot: None.

Korean War (British Prisoners)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his oral answer of 6 February, Official Report, columns 129–30, what communication he has had on the issue of the possibility of Korean war British prisoners-of-war being still held in Russian camps, with Mr. Malcolm Mackintosh CMG, formerly senior fellow in Soviet studies at the Institute of Strategic Studies; and if he will make a statement. [17032]

Mr. Soames: My officials have discussed the subject with Mr. Mackintosh. If any new information emerges, we will of course pursue it.

Changing the Guard (Buckingham Palace)

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many changing the guard ceremonies there have been outside Buckingham palace in each of the past three years; at what cost in 1996 prices; what was the average number of (a) men and (b) women on parade in each case; and if he will make a statement. [17170]

Mr. Soames: There were 236 changing the guard ceremonies outside Buckingham palace in 1993, 245 in 1994 and 247 in 1995. Of the 142 service personnel involved in the ceremony, 60 are engaged in the provision of music. The bands sometimes include female personnel, but a record of the specific numbers on specific occasions is not maintained.
